

Select Constitutions

U.K., U.S.A., CANADA
SWITZERLAND, U.S.S.R.
CHINA JAPAN, PAKISTAN AND INDIA.

ANUP CHAND KAPUR

SELECT CONSTITUTIONS

SELECT CONSTITUTIONS

[U.K., U.S.A., CANADA, SWITZERLAND, U.S.S.R., PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA, JAPAN, PAKISTAN AND INDIA]

By

ANUP CHAND KAPUR, M.A., Ph.D.

Deputy Director of Public Instruction, Punjab, Chandigarh.

SEVENTH EDITION - 1971
(Reprint)

1971

S. CHAND & CO. (Pvt.) LTD.

DELHI—NEW DELHI—JULLUNDUR—LUCKNOW—BOMBAY
CALCUTTA—MADRAS—HYDERABAD—PATNA

S. CHAND & CO. (Pvt.) LTD.

H.O. : Ram Nagar, New Delhi-55

Branches :

Fountain, Delhi
Mai Hiran Gate, Jullundur
Aminabad Park, Lucknow
102, Prasad Chambers, Behin
Roxy Cinema, Bombay-4

32, Ganesh Chandra Ave., Calcutta-13
35, Mount Road, Madras-2
Sultan Bazar, Hyderabad Exhibition Road, Patna

LIBRARY OF S. CHAND & CO. (PVT.) LTD.
Date 19.7.05
Acc. No. 11607

Price : Rs. 25.00

Published by S. Chand & Co. (Pvt.) Ltd., Ram Nagar, New Delhi-55 and printed at Rajendra Printers, Ram Nagar, New Delhi-55

PREFACE TO THE SEVENTH EDITION

For this Seventh edition of the Select Constitutions, I have endeavoured to make such changes as were necessitated by the rapidly developing circumstances in the countries under discussion, especially in India and Pakistan. The whole body of material has been brought up-to-date as in April, 1970. Almost all Chapters have benefited from the revision though certain sections required more work than others. No fundamental change, however, has been made in the approach and the patterns progressively developed through preceding editions.

Chandigarh,
June 10, 1970.

Anup Chand Kapur

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION

This book is an attempt to explain the working of the governmental systems as obtainable in England, United States of America, Switzerland,^a USSR, and India, and has been designed to meet the needs of students appearing for university and various competitive examinations. Efforts have been made to keep the text as nearly abreast of the times as the rapid changes in events in every country have permitted. Endeavour has, also, been made to make comparative study of the forms, structure and organisation of modern constitutional governments. Wherever possible case-law has been cited. In fact, no book on Constitutions can serve a useful purpose, whether it is meant for the legal profession or statesmen and parliamentarians or students of Political Science and Comparative Governments unless it is adequately supplemented by judicial decisions. A Constitution is what the judges make it. Chief Justice Hughes of the Supreme Court of the United States observed, "The Constitution is what the Supreme Court says of it."

I have tried to consult the best available sources of information in respect of the various subjects dealt within the book and I take this opportunity of acknowledging my indebtedness to the renowned authorities from whom I have borrowed so profusely and drawn the inspiration for preparing this book.

With a view to encouraging students to read as widely as possible, I have placed at the end of each Chapter a selected bibliography dealing with the subject treated in the Chapter, and have cited many additional authorities in the footnotes.

My cordial thanks are due to Shri R. L. Nirola, Secretary, Pepsu Vidhan Sabha, for permission to make use of his Secretariat Library, and Shri Thakar Das Jand, Librarian, Mahendra College, and his assistants for their unfailing courtesy in making available library books at all odd hours. My wife helped me, as usual, in pushing the book through the press.

Civil Lines,
Patiala.

Anup Chand Kapur

June 15, 1956.

CONTENTS

UNITED KINGDOM

Chapter	Pages
I. Nature and Content of the Constitution.	3—23
Nature of the Constitution; Component parts of the Constitution; Conventions of the Constitution; Salient features of the Constitution; Suggested Readings.
II. Development of the Constitution.	24—40
Laying the foundations; Period of reconstruction; Period of fructification; Suggested Readings.
III. King and Crown.	41—68
The King and the "Crown"; Powers of the Crown; King can do no wrong; Justification of Monarchy; Suggested Readings.
IV. Privy Council, Ministry and Cabinet.	69—91
The Privy Council; The Ministry; The Cabinet; Features of the Cabinet Government.
V. Cabinet at Work.	92—124
Cabinet Committees; Functions of the Cabinet; Dictatorship of the Cabinet; The Prime Minister; Suggested Readings.
VI. The Machinery of Government.	125—143
Departments at work; Civil Service; Civil Service evaluated; Suggested Readings.
VII. Parliament.	144—177
Origin and growth; Sovereignty of Parliament; House of Lords; Powers and functions of the House of Lords; Reforming the Lords; Reform proposals; Suggested Readings.
VIII. Parliament (Continued).	178—221
The House of Commons; The Speaker; Functions of the House of Commons; Delegated legislation; Decline of Parliament; Suggested Readings.
IX. Law and the Courts.	222—241
Kinds of law; The Courts; Features of judicial system; Rule of Law; Administrative Law and Justice; Suggested Readings.

Chapter	Pages
X. Political Parties.	242—253
Reasons for a party system; Conservative Party; Liberal Party; Suggested Readings.
XI. Local Government.	254—263
Fundamental aspects; Principal types of Local Authority; Suggested Readings.
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
I. Birth of a Nation.	267—273
Towards America; Declaration of Independence; Movement for revision; Philadelphia Convention; Suggested Readings.
II. Essentials of the American Constitutional System.	274—299
The Constitution; Federal System; Separation of powers, checks and balances; Growth of the Constitution; Federal centralization; Suggested Readings.
III. The Presidency.	300—336
Qualifications, election and term; Vice-Presidency; Powers and duties of the President; President as a Leader; Suggested Readings.
IV. Cabinet and Executive Departments	337—348
Origin and nature of Cabinet; Administrative organization; Federal Personnel and merit system; Suggested Readings.
V. Congress.	349—367
Bicameralism; House of Representatives; Speaker; Senate; Special functions of the Senate; Senate's strength—causes; Suggested Readings.
VI. Congress (Continued).	368—391
Functions and powers; Making of Laws; General appraisal of Congress; Strengthening the Congress; Suggested Readings.
VII. Federal Judiciary.	392—411
Need for Federal Judiciary; Federal Jurisdiction; Types of Federal Courts; Judicial review; Suggestions for reform; Suggested Readings.
VIII. Political Parties.	412—419
Opposition to the party system; Two-party system; Democratic Party; Republican Party; Suggested Readings.

Chapter	Pages
CANADA
I. Nature and Content of the Constitution.	423—436
Historical background; Nature of Federalism; Nature of the Constitution.
II. The Executive	437—448
The Crown; Governor-General; The Cabinet; Prime Minister.
III. Dominion Parliament.	449—464
Legislative authority of Parliament; Senate; House of Commons.
IV. The Judiciary.	465—468
V. Political Parties.	469—472
VI. Constitutional Development in the Commonwealth.	473—487
British Empire; From Colonies to self-governing Dominions; Imperial Conferences; Balfour Declaration; Statute of Westminster; Suggested Readings.
SWITZERLAND
I. The Country and its People.	491—497
II. Basic Features of the Confederation.	498—512
Swiss Confederation; Amendment of the Constitution; Civil Rights.
III. Cantonal and Local Government.	513—518
Communes and Cantons; Constitutional position of the Cantons; Types of Cantons; Communes and Districts.
IV. Federal Executive	519—537
Federal Council; President; Executive subordinate to Legislature; Nature of the Executive; Advantages of the Collegial Executive; Federal Administration.
V. Federal Legislature	538—549
Council of States; National Council; Legislative procedure; Powers of the Federal Assembly.
VI. Federal Judiciary.	550—554
Federal Tribunal; Compared with American Judiciary.

Chapter	Pages
VII. Referendum and the Initiative.	555—566
Referendum; Working of direct democracy; Arguments for and against Referendum; Arguments for and against Initiative.
VIII. Political Parties.	567—572

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

I. The Revolution and After.	575—585
The World War; The Revolution; Consolidation of the Communist system; Early Constitutions; The Soviets.
II. The Nature of the Soviet State.	586—603
Basic elements of Marxism; Lenin's doctrine—"Leninism"; Socialism in a single country; Stalin cult; New Thesis of the Communist Party; The New Revolution.
III. Stalin Constitution.	604—627
✓ Constitution of 1936; Amendment; Features of the Constitution; Soviet Federalism; Fundamental Rights and Duties.
IV. Supreme Soviet.	628—637
Bicameral Legislature; Composition and Organization; Powers and Functions; Legislative procedure; Role of the Supreme Soviet.
V. The Presidium.	638—642
A Plural Presidency; Powers of the Presidium; Chairman of the Presidium; Real authority of the Presidium.
VI. Council of Ministers.	643—649
Nature of the Council of Ministers; Kinds of Ministries; Advisory and Planning Boards.
VII. The Judiciary	650—658
Soviet concept of law; Salient features; System of Courts; Procurator-General.
VIII. Regional Government.	659—662
Units of the federation; Administration of the Union Republic; Administration of Autonomous Republics; Administration of Autonomous Regions.
IX. The Communist Party.	663—678

PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

I. The People and the Country.	681—687
Importance of the study; History of the Constitution.
II. Salient Features of the Constitution.	688—698
Gains of the Revolution; A People's democratic State; Fundamental Rights and Duties.
III. National People's Congress.	699—706
Highest organ of State authority; Powers and functions; Legislative procedure; Standing Committee.
IV. State Council.	707—713
Chairman of the Republic; Functions and powers of the State Council; Appraisal of the State Council.
V. Judicial System.	714—718
VI. Administrative Areas.	719—721
VII. Communist Party of China.	722—725

JAPAN

I. Historical Background.	729—741
Geography; The People; Constitutional development.
II. The New Constitution (1947).	742—756
Potsdam Declaration; MacArthur Constitution; Basic features of the Constitution; Rights and Duties.
III. The Executive.	757—774
Emperor in History; Emperor as he is today; Cabinet; Prime Minister; Civil Services.
IV. The Diet.	775—796
Bicameralism; House of Councillors; House of Representatives; Legislative procedure; Committee system.
V. Judiciary.	797—802
Judiciary under Meiji Constitution; Features of the Judicial system; Supreme Court; High Courts and District Courts; Summary Courts.

Chapter	Pages
VI. Political Parties.	803—812
Historical background; Post-war Political Parties; Parties and their policies.
VII. Local Government.	813—817
Pre-war Local Government; Local Autonomy; Conclusion.
PAKISTAN
I. Country and its People.	821—836
Genesis of Pakistan; Partition and Pakistan; New State of Pakistan.
II. Political Background.	837—845
Governor-General of Pakistan; Making of the Con- stitution; Features of 1956 Constitution; 1958 Re- volution.
III. Constitution of 1962.	846—855
Political background 1958-1962; Salient features; Principles of Law-making; Principles of Policy.
IV. Structure of Government at the Centre.	856—864
President; Powers of the President; Council of Ministers; Position of the President.
V. Structure of Government (Contd.).	865—871
Unicameral Legislature; National Assembly; Func- tions of the National Assembly; National Assem- bly examined.
VI. Supreme Court.	872—874
Appointment of Judges; Powers and jurisdiction; Estimate of the Supreme Court.
VII. Provincial Government.	875—879
Provinces of Pakistan; Structure of Government in Provinces; Provincial Legislature; High Courts.
VIII. Ayub goes, Constitution abrogated.	880—883
Index	884—889

The Government of the United Kingdom

CHAPTER I

NATURE AND CONTENT OF THE CONSTITUTION

Nature of the British Constitution. In almost every country in the world except the United Kingdom, 'The Constitution' means a selection of the legal rules which govern the government of that country and which have been embodied in one or several documents. Such a document or documents may have been drawn up either by a Constituent Assembly, or it may be the handiwork of a legislature, or it may have been granted by a King binding himself and his successors to govern according to the provisions of the proclamation. The Constitution is, thus, understood to mean a written, precise and systematic document containing the general principles under which government functions. It is distinct in character and is held in special sanctity. The 'Constitution' is amended and altered by a procedure different from that required in amending the statutory or ordinary law. The statutory law must be consistent with the letter and the spirit of the Constitution otherwise it is held unconstitutional or ultra vires.

But the British Constitution has never been devised and reduced to writing.¹ It remains undefined, unsystematized and uncoded. It lacks precision and coherency. The Englishmen never drew out their political system in the shape of a formal document and, consequently, there is no single place in which 'The Constitution' as a whole is clearly and definitely written down. Many books may be found which describe the British Constitution, but no one of them can be said to contain it. There are, no doubt, some enactments of Parliament which make the British Constitution, but these enactments do not bear the same date. They were made as and when they were needed and the circumstances demanded. But the most important part of the British Constitution is just what is kept out of the written law and given over to the sole guardianship of custom. Nor is there any law in the United Kingdom of which we can say that since it is a part of the Constitution, it can be altered by a procedure different from the one required for altering the ordinary law. Here, the Constitutional Law and the Ordinary Law stand at par with one another. Both emanate from the same source and undergo the same procedure in passing and amending them. Obviously, then, no British Court or any other authority can legally refuse to enforce and set aside any enactment of Parliament.

The British Constitution is, therefore, to a large extent an unwritten

1. Except for the Instrument of Government of 1653. The Instrument of Government which made Cromwell Lord Protector and established a new legislature was, however, the British Constitution for a few years only. Restoration put an end to it and England returned to the old form of government.

Constitution. It is the product of history and the result of evolution. It has grown with the growth of the English nation, changed with its wants, and adapted itself to the needs of various times. Jennings has aptly remarked, "If the Constitution consists of institutions and not of the paper that describes them, the British Constitution has not been made but has grown—and there is no paper."² The institutions necessary for carrying out the functions of the State were established from time to time as the need arose. "Formed to meet immediate requirements they were then adapted to exercise more extensive and sometimes different functions. From time to time political and economic circumstances have called for reforms. There has been a constant process of invention, reform and amended distribution of powers. The building has been constantly added to, patched, and partly reconstructed, so that it has been renewed from century to century; but it has never been razed to the ground and rebuilt on new foundations."³ In other words, the British Constitution is "the child of wisdom and chance;" it is the result of a process in which many elements, like charters, statutes, judicial decisions, precedents, usages and traditions, have entered piling themselves one upon the other from age to age and shaping the political institutions of the country according to the exigencies of time. The British Constitution is ever growing and always undergoing modifications. It is a dynamic constitution with its roots in the past and branches in the future. Lord Morrison has aptly said, "But as a whole, ours has been a peaceful development, learning as we moved on, establishing the foundation of further progress."⁴ No man in 1688 could have foretold, with any measure of accuracy, what the Constitution of present day Britain would be, and no man of our times can predict how the Constitution will evolve a few decades hence.

Briefly, the British Constitution is a body of basic rules indicating the structure and functions of political institutions and the principles governing their operation. It is just the same in nature as the constitution of any other country, the only difference being that the British Constitution has never been systematized, codified and put in an orderly form. Probably no attempt will be made in future, too, to bring all these rules and principles together to make the Constitution a consistent and coherent whole. In fact, it is an impossible task, for not only do the usages and traditions cover a wide range, but many of them are not sufficiently definite to be reduced to writing. Moreover, the Englishman, as a political animal, has never favoured a system of government based upon fixed principles involving the application of exact rules. He is practical, matter of fact, and zealous for business. Expediency is the guiding principle of his life and he seizes opportunity by the forelock. He, thus, knows no logic and the British Constitution lacks all logic. The result, as Ogg says, "is a constitutional structure which lacks symmetry, governmental system which abounds in the illogical." But it does not mean that it is a mere hotchpotch of heterogeneous elements. The

2. Jennings, W. Ivor, The Law and the Constitution (1948), p. 8.

3. Ibid.

4. As Strachey has called it in his Queen Victoria and quoted by F.A. Ogg in his English Government and Politics, p. 68.

5. Lord Morrison, British Parliamentary, Democracy, p. 2.

rules and principles which govern the governmental machinery have been deduced from British experience and consciously adhered to and applied.

Views of Paine and De Tocqueville. Thomas Paine and Alexis de Tocqueville were the prominent among many writers who were of the opinion that the British Constitution does not exist. Thomas Paine, a great champion of written constitutions, categorically declared that where a Constitution "cannot be produced in a visible form, there is none." In a spirited reply to Burke, who eminently defended the English Constitution in his Reflections on the French Revolution, Paine asked, "Can Mr. Burke produce the English Constitution? If he cannot, we may fairly conclude that though it has been so much talked about, no such thing as a Constitution exists or ever did exist." De Tocqueville, the celebrated French writer on foreign Governments, a generation later said that in "England the Constitution may go on changing continually or rather it does not exist."⁶ Whatever be their reasons for making these assertions, Paine and De Tocqueville were both wrong. There can be no State without a Constitution. It is true that there is no single document intended to comprise the fundamental rules of constitutional practices to which a student of the British Constitution may turn for reference, as one does in the United States or in India. But there is no Constitution which is either wholly written or entirely unwritten. Written and unwritten elements are present in every Constitution. All written constitutions grow and expand with the passage of time either as a result of customs or judicial interpretations. Written constitutions, remarked Bryce, become "developed by interpretation, fringed with decisions, and enlarged by customs so that after a time the letter of their texts no longer conveys their full effect." Nor can the makers of a written constitution foresee the future and shape the constitution to fulfil the needs of the people to come. Man is dynamic and so are his political institutions. The conventional element, therefore, in any system of government is inevitable. Finally, a written constitution does not contain all the rules relating to all the institutions of government. A selection is made of both. For instance, the Constitution of the United States of America contains only seven Articles, and occupies about ten pages. The Constitution of India, on the other hand, is the lengthiest Constitution in the world containing 395 Articles and nine schedules covering 273 pages. The difference between the two Constitutions is suggestive, for it shows that within limits a written constitution may contain as much or as little as is thought desirable by the father-framers. And yet no constitution is complete by itself. "It is a framework, a skeleton which had to be filled out with detailed rules and practices. It is concerned with the principal institutions and their main functions, and with the rights and duties of citizens which are, for the time being, regarded as important. It may contain more or less, according to the circumstances of the moment and the special problems being faced by the State while it is being drafted." All written constitutions provide for amendments in order to cater to the future needs of the people. Customs and judicial decisions, too, supplement the constitutional provisions. The difference between a written and unwritten constitution is, therefore, one of degree rather than of kind. Wherever there are rules determining the creating and operation of governmental institutions, there exists a constitution. Britain has such institutions and such rules; "and certainly long before the times of Paine and De Tocqueville England had such a body of rules, with Englishmen equally conscious of its existence and proud of its history."

6. "En Angleterre la constitution pent changer sans cesse: Ou plutot elle n'existe point." It will be observed that De Tocqueville's emphasis is more on the flexible character of the English Constitution. He could not reconcile himself to the fact that the constitutional law and the statutory law should emanate from the same source and both be amended by ordinary legislative process. He, accordingly, concluded that the English Constitution does not exist.

COMPONENT PARTS OF THE CONSTITUTION

The sources from which the British Constitution is drawn are many and diverse and we divide them into seven main categories or groups.⁸ There are, in the first place, certain great Charters, Petitions, Statutes and other landmarks such as Magna Carta (1215), the Petition of Rights (1628), the Act of Settlement (1701), as modified by the Abdication Act (of 1936), the Act of Union with Scotland (1707), the Great Reform Act (1832), the Parliament Act of 1911, as amended in 1949, the Government of Ireland Act of 1920, the Public Order Act of 1936, the Ministers of the Crown Act of 1937, Representation of the People Act, 1949, the Life Peerage Act, 1958, the Peerage Act, 1963, the Statute of Westminster 1931, the Indian Independence Act, 1947, etc. Most of these are Acts passed by Parliament. But a document like Magna Carta is considered to be a part of the Constitution as it makes a great landmark in national history, and various Acts of Parliament "may, without undue violence to the facts, be regarded as in direct line of descent from Magna Carta."⁹ Elder William Pitt called Magna Carta, the Petition of Rights and the Bill of Rights as the Bible of the British Constitution. One thing, however, very significant about these Charters and Statutes is that they were the product of political stress and crisis and they contain the terms of settlement of that crisis. They are a part of the Constitution because of what they deal with. It is the context of the constitutional struggle within which they originated that they bear the impress of the constitutional law.

Secondly, there are a good number of ordinary Statutes, which Parliament has passed from time to time, dealing with suffrage, the methods

7. Ogg, F.A., and Zink, H., Modern Foreign Governments (1953), p. 26.

8. Sir Maurice Amos divided the rules of the Constitution into three kinds: (i) Rules of Law; these included Rules of the Common Law, Rules of Statute Law, and the law, or so-called "privileges" of Parliament; (ii) the conventions of the constitution; and (iii) principles which relate to the liberty of the subjects. Amos, Sir Maurice, The English Constitution, p. 24.

9. Gooch, R.K., The Government of England, p. 64. "Magna Carta," writes Dr. Gooch, "is technically an enactment of the King, with the advice of his great council; Parliament grew out of the great council; and, even at present, an Act of Parliament is technically enacted by the King with the advice and consent of Parliament." Similarly, Gooch tries to prove that the Petition of Rights does not differ in principle from an Act of Parliament, "the Bill of Rights is, in the most literal sense, itself an Act of Parliament." Ibid., pp. 64-65.

of election, the powers and duties of public officials, etc. These Statutes, unlike the constitutional landmarks enumerated in group one, are not the outcome of a constitutional struggle. They were passed as and when the exigencies of time demanded them under the ordinary process of things. For example, none of the laws extending the right to vote, which were passed between 1867 and 1948, aroused popular excitement as the Reform Act of 1832. Nonetheless, all these Statutes are vitally important for the development of political democracy and any attempt to repeal them would now be regarded against the "constitutional sense" of the nation. In fact, the system of Government obtainable in Britain, would become unworkable if ever an attempt is made to repeal any one of such Statutes, though Parliament is a sovereign body and it has "the right to make or unmake any law whatever."¹⁰

The third source of constitutional rules is to be found in the decisions of judges on cases heard by them in the law courts. When judges decide cases, they interpret, define and develop the provisions of the great Charters and Statutes. While doing so, their judgments create precedents which succeeding judges respect. Since many of these judgments related directly to constitutional matters, and the legal principles and judicial precedents of these judgments are an important element in the British Constitution, they resemble and correspond to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States which have helped to clarify and expand the provisions of the American Constitution. The decision in the case of the Sheriff of Middlesex in 1840 established the principle that Parliament had the right to punish its own members for a breach of privilege, no other legal authority being necessary. The judgment in Bradlaugh v. Gossett in 1884 established the supremacy of Parliament over the courts in all matters concerning the internal affairs of Parliament.

In the fourth place, are the principles of the Common Law and several matters of major constitutional importance covered by them. It is from the Common Law, for example, that the King derives his prerogative,¹¹ and that Parliament derives its supremacy. The civil liberties of the people, which in America are embodied in the Bill of Rights, are ensured in Britain by the rules of the Common Law. Freedom of speech, of press and of assembly, the sanctity of a citizen's home, and the right of jury trial are Common Law rights which to-day have their effective meaning in the long line of decisions judges have made. The laws of Parliament may redefine or modify the manner of exercising these rights, but such laws are in their turn subject to judicial interpretation made in the light of the many precedents of the past.

The principles of the Common Law are not established by any law passed by Parliament or ordained by the King. They grew up entirely on the basis of usage. Common Law, according to Blackstone, consists of customs "not set down in any written statute or ordinance, but depending on immemorial usages for their support." The judges recognised "the customs of the realm", applied them in individual cases, and set precedents for decision in later cases. As these decisions were "broadened down from precedent to precedent there grew up a body of principles of general application which stand as a bulwark of British freedom and an essential part of the British Constitution."¹² The Common Law, like Statutory law, is, thus, "continually in the process of development by judicial decisions."¹³

10. Dicey, A.V., Introduction to the Study of the Law of Constitution, p. 10.

11. The term prerogative was in origin used to denote the sum of the rights ascribed to the King as a feudal overlord. But the expression is used today to refer to the Crown's discretionary authority, that is, to what the King or his servants can do without the authority of an Act of Parliament.

Another source of constitutional rules is to be found in usages or conventions. The conventions of the constitution, as they are called, are the centre and soul of the constitutional law in Britain. The fundamental convention, from which practically all others flow, is the convention of the Cabinet Government. Although the validity of the conventions of the constitution cannot be the subject of proceedings in courts of law, yet they cover some of the most important parts of the British political system and are most scrupulously observed. "Conventions are", Finer observes, "rules of political behaviour not established in statutes, judicial decisions, or parliamentary customs but created outside these, supplementing them, in order to achieve objects they have not yet embodied. These objects, in the British Constitution, can be summed up thus: to make the executive and the legislature responsible to the will of the people. To add concreteness we could use the terms Crown, Government, or Cabinet in place of Executive and Parliament, meaning the House of Commons (especially) and the House of Lords, in place of Legislature."¹⁴

Next, are the commentaries by eminent writers whose works have come to be regarded as authoritative expression on the British Constitutional Law. These commentators have systematised the diverse conventional rules, established a definite relation of one to another, and, then, linked them into some degrees of unity by reference to central principles. In certain cases such writers have provided compendious and detailed accounts of the operation of particular categories of rules and their works have acquired the status of constitutional documents. Probably, the most authoritative of such works is Erskine May's Treatise on the Law, Privileges, Proceedings and Usages of Parliament. It is the classic guide to the procedure and privileges of Parliament and is constantly referred to by the Speakers of the House of Commons on the formulation of their rulings on question of privilege and procedure. Also (although to a much lesser extent) A.V. Dicey's Law of the Constitution has acquired over the years an authority that makes it more than merely a commentary on constitutional practice.

Finally, the exercise of the Royal Prerogative forms another aspect of constitutional practice. The power to declare war, make treaties, 12. Carter, M.G., and others, The Government of Great Britain, p. 41.

13. Common Law may be regarded as that part of the law of the land which is traditional and judge-made. "The explanation of the adjective 'common' is that in medieval times the law administered by the King's superior courts was the 'common custom of the realm', as against the particular customs with which local jurisdictions were concerned." Harrison, W., The Government of Britain, Appendix B, pp. 161-62.

14. Governments of Greater European Powers, p. 46.

pardon criminals, and dissolve Parliament are important functions performed by Royal prerogative. They are executed through Orders in Council or through proclamations and writs under the great seal. Today, these functions are performed by Ministers on behalf of the Monarch, and, as such, the authority for the decision comes from the Crown rather than from Parliament.

The nature of the British Constitution may be summed up in the words of Anson. It is, he wrote, "a somewhat rambling structure, and like a house which many successive owners have altered just so far as suited their immediate wants or the fashion of the time, it bears the marks of many hands, and is convenient rather than symmetrical. Forms and phrases survive which have long since lost their meaning, and the adaptation of practice to convenience by a process of unconscious change has brought about in many cases a divergence of law and custom, of theory and practice."¹⁵ The British for the most part think that the nature of their Constitution "is most sensible and that a codified constitution like the American is more trouble than it is worth...."¹⁶

CONVENTIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION

The Conventions of the Constitution,¹⁷ the name given by Dicey to the indefinite number of customs, traditions and precedents, form an integral part of the British Constitution.¹⁸ So deep-rooted have these conventions been found in the habits of the Englishmen, and so firmly the mechanism of government is erected on their foundation that without them the Constitution becomes maimed if not absolutely unworkable. And yet they are not the law of the Constitution; they are nowhere written down in any formal or official document.

Laws and Conventions. A distinction is very often made between laws of the Constitution and conventions of the Constitution. But conventions are not really very different from laws and it is frequently difficult to place a set of rules in one class or the other. Jennings has rightly said that "The Conventions are like most fundamental rules of any Constitution in that they rest essentially upon general acquiescence. A written constitution is not law because somebody has made it, but it has been accepted." Conventions are based on usage and acquiescence and their binding force, like laws, is derived from the willingness of the people to be so bound. If obedience to law is deemed a fundamental duty, obedience to conventions is among the political obligations, because they help the wheels

15. Law and Custom of the Constitution, Vol. I, p. 1.

16. Bogdan, D.W., and Verney, D.V., Political Patterns in Today's World, p. 87.

17. John Stuart Mill referred to them as "the unwritten maxims of the constitution", while Anson referred to them as "the customs of the constitution." None of the phrases, according to Jennings, exactly expresses what is meant. Dicey's phrase has, however, now been sanctioned by common use. The Law and the Constitution, op. cit., p. 80.

18. "Though in 1837 the term 'conventions of the constitution' had not attained regular currency, the thing meant thereby was in effective operation and had been so in essence since the revolution." Keith, A.B., The Constitution of England from Queen Victoria to George VI, Vol. I, p. 12.

of political machine going in accordance with the will of the people. Both, law and conventions, are inevitably similar as they serve the common purpose of regulating the structure and functions of Government aiming at the good of the people and are the result of common consent. "What is law and what is convention," Jennings maintains, "are primarily technical questions. The answers are known only to those whose business it is to know them. For the mass of the people it does not matter whether a rule is recognised by the judicial authorities or not. The technicians of Government are primarily concerned."

For the technicians the difference between laws and conventions spreads to three aspects. In the first place, laws emanate from a legally constituted body and carry with them greater sanctity. Conventions are extra-legal and they grow out of practice. Their existence is determined by usage. In the second place, law is usually expressed in more precise terms and it has the added dignity of extracting unquestioning obedience from everybody. Conventions are never formulated. They grow out of practice, they are modified by practice, and at any given time it may be difficult to say whether or not a practice has become a convention. Finally, law is enforced by the courts and it is the duty of judges to consider whether Acts are legally valid and to take such steps that the law is obeyed. Conventions are not enforced by courts and judges cannot force their obedience as they have no legal sanction.

But even from the technical point of view no definite boundary line can be drawn between legislation, on the one hand, and conventions, on the other hand. If a given provision is a part of the British Constitution, it is either law or convention and the fundamental conventions have well nigh been recognised by many Acts of Parliament. The Preamble to the British North America Act, 1867, an enactment of British Parliament, reads: "The Provinces of... have expressed their desire to be federally united into one Dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom... with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom." The Constitution of the United Kingdom is a body of rules determining the structure and functions of political institutions and the principles governing their operation. These rules and principles of political governance are primarily unwritten and lie scattered in the various Charters, Statutes, judicial decisions and conventions and mark a steady transference of power from the King as a person to a complicated impersonal organisation called the Crown. The King has become the Crown and that is the core of the constitutional system in the United Kingdom and around it revolves the entire machinery of government. Recognition to constitutional conventions was, again, accorded by Article 2 of the Agreement for a Treaty between Great Britain and Ireland in 1921, when the law, practice, and constitutional usage governing the relationship of the Crown, or of its representatives, or of the Imperial Parliament to the Dominion of Canada, were made applicable to the Irish Free State. In Section 4 of the Status of the Union Act, 1934, of the Union Parliament, specific reference is made to the constitutional conventions regulating the use by the Governor-General of his legal power of summoning and dissolving Parliament, and of appointing ministers.¹⁹ Some of the conventions regulating relationship between the Dominions and the United Kingdom have been inserted in the Preamble to the Statute of Westminster, particularly those relating to alterations in the law touching the Succession to the Throne, or the Royal Style and Titles,²⁰ and the legislative authority of the British Parliament.²¹ The importance of the first of these conventions was demonstrated in the abdication of Edward VIII. The change in the Royal Style and Titles after the Indian Independence Act, 1947, was brought about by the full assent of the Dominion Parliaments.

19. Refer to H.V. Evatt, The King and his Dominion Governor, Appendix, pp. 229-306.

The Cabinet system of government presupposes the pre-eminence and leadership of one single person and he is the Prime Minister. Abolish the institution of the Prime Minister or diminish any part of his powers, the entire political structure would be destroyed. And yet neither the institution of Cabinet nor the office of the Prime Minister²² were known to law before 1937. The Ministers of the Crown Act, 1937, provided for the payment of a salary of £10,000 a year "to the person who is the Prime Minister and the First Lord of the Treasury."

The same Act provided for the salaries of the Ministers who are "members of the cabinet". It also recognised "Party", "Opposition" and "the Leader of the Opposition". It may, however, be remembered that the provisions of the Ministers of the Crown Act do not validate or legalise these conventions. What it does is to recognise them that they exist. But once their existence is recognised by legislation, conventions do not really remain very different from laws. Jennings asserts that the "conventional system of the British Constitution is in fact much like the system of the common law."²³

Kinds of Conventions. Conventions are essentially of three kinds. First, those which ensure a proper harmony between Parliament and the Executive in the light of Parliamentary Sovereignty. The Glorious Revolution of 1688 settled once for all that Parliament had supreme power and it could control every aspect of national life. The powers of the King were limited and the constitutional development was the emergence of the Cabinet. Convention, therefore, alone provides for the essential rules of the Cabinet Government. It demands that the Ministers of the

20. "Inasmuch as the Crown is the symbol of the free association of the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations, and as they are united by a common allegiance to the Crown, it will be in accord with the established constitutional position (Italics mine) of all members of the Commonwealth in relation to one another that any alteration in the law touching the succession to the Throne or the Royal Style and Titles shall hereafter require the assent as well as of the Parliaments of all the Dominions as of the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

21. "It is in accord with the established constitutional position (Italics mine) that no law hereafter made by the Parliament of the United Kingdom shall extend to any of the said Dominions as that of the law of that Dominion otherwise than at the request and with the consent of that Dominion."

22. In fact, the office of the Prime Minister came to be recognized by legislation in 1917 when the Chequers Estate Act enabled the official "popularly known as the Prime Minister" to occupy the Chequers Estate as a furnished country residence.

23. Cabinet Government, op. cit., p. 5.

King must be the Members of Parliament, they should belong to the majority party in the House of Commons and function under the party leader designated as the Prime Minister. It further demands that the Cabinet is responsible to Parliament for its actions and it remains in office so long as it retains the confidence of the House of Commons. If the majority is reduced to minority and the Commons withdraw their support, the Cabinet either resigns or appeals to the electorate for mandate. The Ministry must resign if the verdict of the electorate is against it, allowing the Party in Opposition to form the government. If there are more opposing parties than one, and the result of the general election does not give clear majority to one single party, it may meet Parliament and allow a vote of the House of Commons to decide its fate as the Conservative Ministry did in 1924. "But it cannot ask another dissolution, nor should the Crown concede it if it were asked."²⁴ Conventions insist on the collective responsibility of Cabinet to Parliament for all its public acts, and that its duty is to initiate legislation. Convention, again, determines that the Ministry should combat domestic crisis with all the authority at its disposal, but it must summon Parliament immediately to consult with it. Similarly, the Ministry shall have full regard to the will of the Commons in the conduct of foreign affairs, and "shall not declare war, or neutrality or make peace, or enter into important treaties without securing as soon as possible endorsement by the Commons, which so far as possible should be taken into counsel before the Crown is committed to any definite course of action."²⁵

Secondly, there are conventions which relate to legislative procedure and the relations between the two Houses of Parliament. That Parliament meets annually and that it consists of two Houses rest on custom. The essential principle of the initiative of the House of Commons in matters of finance, under the authority of the Cabinet, and the subordination of the Lords rested solely on convention until the Parliament Act of 1911. The Act of 1911 as amended in 1949 put definite limitations on the legislative powers of the House of Lords which had hitherto been regulated by convention only. The principle that no peer other than a Law Lord sits when the House of Lords is acting as a Court of Appeal is also customary. Then, there are many conventions regulating parliamentary procedure. It is a matter of convention that every Bill must have three readings before finally voted upon. It is, again, a convention which determines that a speech from the Government benches is to be followed by a speech from the Opposition. Indeed, the whole idea of His or Her Majesty's Opposition is a product of convention. Convention, too, demands that the Speaker of the House of Commons should become a no-party man and he must resign from the membership of the party to which he belonged on his election as Speaker. It is another convention that the retiring Speaker must be returned unopposed and he should be elected Speaker as many times as he pleases.

Finally, there are conventions which aim at securing harmony between government and legislative action on the one hand and the verdict of the electorate on the other. One convention of this character is that government should not initiate legislation of a controversial nature unless they have a mandate from the electorate. The "mandate convention", as it has now come to be known, is vindication of the principle of popular sovereignty.²⁶ It makes necessary that any item of policy which involves radical changes must have been a part of the programme on which government fought the previous election, or, "if it was not, that the Opposition should show by its action or inaction that this is not a matter of keen controversy." The Conservative majority in the House of Lords in the years immediately following Labour victory in 1945, approved bills embracing such measures as nationalization on the ground that Labour had received a mandate from the electorate.²⁷ This convention does not apply only to legislation, but also to foreign policy. Another example of this nature is that when an appeal to the electors goes against the Ministry they are bound to retire from office and have no right to dissolve Parliament a second time. "Behind these conventions", according to Greaves, "there is something of a political sanction."²⁸

24. Keith, A.B., The British Cabinet System (Second Edition by N.H. Gibbs), p. 2.

25. Ibid., p. 3.

Another kind of conventions are those which determine the relations between the Dominions and the United Kingdom. As said before, the Statute of Westminster 1931, embodies in a legal form the conventions which at one time regulated inter-Imperial relations thereby giving a constitutional sanction to the legislative independence of the Dominions. But the methods of inter-Commonwealth co-operation are still essentially conventional. For example in matters relating to the Dominions the King acts on the advice of the Ministers of the Dominion concerned and not on that of his Ministers constituting the Government in Britain. Then, the British Parliament does not pass any law for a Dominion unless it has been expressly authorised by the Dominion concerned to do so. The rules for making of treaties by any part of the Dominions are still to be found in the Reports of the Imperial Conferences of 1923, 1926 and 1930. Similarly, the position of the Dominion Governor-General was determined by agreements at the Conferences of 1926 and 1930. The co-operative link between the Commonwealth countries and, thus, their func-

26. In 1945 Labour Party's manifesto read, "...we give clear notice that we will not tolerate obstruction of the people's will by the House of Lords."

27. Viscount Cranborne, the leader of the Conservative Party in the House of Lords, said, "Whatever our personal views, we should frankly recognise that these proposals were put before the country at the recent General Election and that the people of this country, with full knowledge of these proposals, returned the Labour Party to power. The Government may, therefore, I think, fairly claim that they have a mandate to introduce these proposals. I think it would be constitutionally wrong, when the country has so recently expressed its view, for this House to oppose proposals which have been definitely put before the electorate." The idea of the electoral mandate is by no means new, although the concept of the mandate had been much more vague with the Liberals and the Conservatives. But the Labour has always believed since 1918, that a party should go to the electorate with a set of concrete proposals which, if successful, it is thereby mandated to put it into practice. Refer to A.H. Birch's Representative and Responsible Government, An Essay on the British Constitution, pp. 116-122.

28. Greaves, H.R.G., The British Constitution, p. 18.

tioning as a single organism are matters of common understanding and mutual agreements.

Sanction behind Conventions. It is generally asked why conventions are so scrupulously obeyed in Britain? This has been partly explained by Dicey.²⁹ His conclusion was that violation of conventions ultimately means breach of law. He takes the example of convening a session of Parliament every year and argues if no session of Parliament is summoned annually, it is only a breach of convention and not a violation of law. But if no session of Parliament is called annually, it is not possible to raise revenues and pass the Army and Air Force (Annual) Act. In that case it becomes illegal to maintain army and air force on money raised from unauthorised taxes. Any one doing so can be brought before a court for breach of law and punished accordingly. It, therefore, becomes essential rather imperative that Parliament should be summoned at least once a year. If it is not, it means indirect collision with the laws of the land. Similarly, the Ministry may come to grief, if it does not resign after it has lost the confidence of the House of Commons.³⁰

But this does not cover the whole case. Lowell has correctly pointed out that Britain is not obliged for ever to hold annual sessions of Parliament. Being a sovereign body, Parliament can pass a permanent Army and Air Force Act and grant the existing annual taxes for a number of years. Moreover, there are some conventions the violation of which does not necessarily lead to breach of law. For example, no breach of law would follow if the Speaker does not resign from the membership of his party after his election to that office, or if the government does not recognise His Majesty's Opposition, or if all the conventions relating to the conduct of business in the House of Commons are not observed. Similarly, there is no breach of law if the Prime Minister is taken from the House of Lords. At the same time, precedents may be broken if the altered political conditions of the country demand that. The Labour Government violated convention of ministerial collective responsibility when members of the Cabinet in 1931 agreed to differ. It was justified by Baldwin and he maintained that conventions were altered by circumstances. One of the merits of the conventions is the flexibility they impart in the governance of the country. Disraeli, in 1868, disregarded the well-established usage by resigning without meeting Parliament on defeat at the general election. In 1929, Baldwin reverted to the old convention and considered it wholly constitutional for him to meet Parliament and receive its verdict. The conventions, as Jennings points out, "do not exist for their own sake they exist because there are good reasons for them."³¹

29. Law of the Constitution, op. cit., Ch. XV.

30. But a Ministry can continue to remain in office for a sufficiently long time even if it has lost the confidence of the House of Commons. When Parliament has passed the annual budget, and it is usually done by the beginning of July, the House of Commons does not exercise any control over the Ministry. For, no session of Parliament may be summoned until April next and the Ministry may continue to remain in office without breaking the law, though it no longer enjoys the confidence of the House of Commons. There are other means, too, by which the Ministry can retain office. Cf. H.J. Laski, Democracy in Crisis, Ch. II.

31. Cabinet Government, op. cit., p. 7.

The conclusions of Dicey, therefore, do not command unqualified support.

Lowell says that conventions are supported by something more than the realization that their violation may mean the violation of some law. Unlike the laws of the constitution, conventions go to constitute a moral code for the guidance of public men in the field of practical politics. "In the main," he says, "the conventions are observed because they are a code of honour. They are, as it were, the rules of the game, and the single class in the community which has hitherto had the conduct of English public life almost entirely in its own hands is the very class that is peculiarly sensitive to obligation of this kind. Moreover, the very fact that one class rules, by the sufferance of the whole nation, as trustees for the public, makes that class exceedingly careful not to violate the understandings on which the trust is held."³² The additional sanction for conventions comes from public opinion. The power of government rests in the last resort on the consent of the electorate and the powers of different departments of government must be exercised in accordance with that principle. Any deviation therefrom will go to make the action of government unconstitutional, though not illegal. Legally, there is nothing wrong if conventions are violated. But a legal truth in Britain may become a political untruth. Even a popular and dynamic personality like Edward VIII could not go against the wishes and advice of his Ministers in marrying the woman of his choice. The conventions are really obeyed because of the political difficulties which follow if they are violated. To raise the question of their violation is, therefore, in large measure, fruitless, for conventions are not violated. If one is at all violated, as it was done by the House of Lords in 1909, by rejecting the famous Lloyd George budget, there is an immediate demand to have this convention enacted into law. The electorate gave to the Liberal Party their unequivocal consent in defining the financial and legislative powers of the House of Lords and the result was the Parliament Act of 1911, which made it impossible for the Lords to delay Money Bills for more than one month. The same Act limited its legislative powers too.

"Government," according to Jennings, "is a co-operative function, and rules of law alone cannot provide for common action."³³ It implies integration of the activities of many individuals. Each individual must follow certain rules if he is to play his part well, and rules are generally obeyed because of the habit to obey them, no matter whether they are laws or conventions.³⁴ Conventions are, therefore, rules of political behaviour, first established to meet with specific problems and subsequently they were followed as they seemed just and reasonable to follow. They

32. Government of England, Vol. I, pp. 12-13.

33. The Law and the Constitution, p. 98.

34. "A usage in constitutional matters, it will be found on investigation, is normally based on some definite convenience or utility in relation to the constitutional system of the day, and with the passing of the years it is followed under the influence of the normal psychological principle of imitation and willingness to follow precedent." The British Cabinet System, op. cit., p. 5.

thus, established intelligent practices and continue their authority as such. Dicey's view is that the conventions contrive that the prerogatives of the Crown shall be converted into the privileges of the people. "Our modern code of constitutional morality," he observed, "secures through in a round-about way, what is called abroad the 'sovereignty of the people'."³⁵ It is in this context that Jennings wrote that "conventions are obeyed because of the political difficulties which follow if they are not." Marshall and Moodie give a more matter of fact explanation. They say, "conventions describe the way in which certain legal powers must be exercised if the powers are to be tolerated by those affected."³⁶ The conventions have democratised the Executive by making Parliament the centre of gravity enabling thereby the democratic system operate in a unitary government. Parliamentary practices emerging out of this process of democratization enable the Government and the Opposition to sit together, discuss, and work together for the development of national welfare. Conventions have also revolutionised the Judiciary by making the Law Lords to constitute the highest Court of Civil Appeal in Britain. They have also enabled inter-Commonwealth relations and the collaboration of the member nations to the common advantage.

Conventions are not static like law. They, indeed, "provide the flesh which clothes the dry bones of law" and consequently conventions have enabled a rigid legal framework of government to keep an organic pace with the changing political ideas and needs of the people. "New needs demand a new emphasis and a new orientation even when the law remains fixed. Men have to work the old law in order to satisfy the new needs" and conventions are motive power of the British Constitution. They lubricate the machinery of the Government and keep the machine going more smoothly. In their absence the structure of the Government is sure to collapse and the nature of the British Constitution might well be very different from what it is now. The British system is the best example of democracy and especially of Parliamentary democracy.

Something more is served by the conventions. "No written Constitution," aptly remarks Dr. Finer, "any more than the ordinary law, can express the fulness of life's meanings and demands, because the human imagination, even at its most talented, falls far short of reality." The real Constitution is a living body of general prescriptions carried into effect by living persons. Conventions are flexible and growing and they can be easily adjusted to the future requirements without creating a political stir which an amendment of the Constitution creates. They harmonise relations where a purely legal solution of practical problems is impossible. "In converting a monarchical into a democratic constitution and in passing from the seventeenth to the twentieth century, the British eschewed writing the new articles: they preferred to rely on the growth and inheritance of customs—that is, conventions."³⁷

35. Law of the Constitution, p. 431.

36. Marshall, Geoffrey, and Moodie, Graeme C., Some Problems of the Constitution, pp. 16-18.

37. Finer, Herman, Governments of Greater European Powers, pp. 49-50.

SALIENT FEATURES OF THE CONSTITUTION

From the nature of the British Constitution, we get the following important features:

1. It is partially written. The British Constitution to a large extent is of an unwritten nature. It is not a pre-arranged pattern according to which government must be carried on. Nor is it the result of conscious creation. Its sources are several and the course of its development "has been sometimes guided by accident and sometimes by high design." Being a child of wisdom and of chance, its growth has been piecemeal and gradual expressing itself in different Charters and Statutes, precedents, usages and traditions whatever the exigencies of time demanded. There is, accordingly, no single document which can be said to contain the general principles of political governance. In fact, no attempt has ever been made to embody these principles in a documentary form. They remain scattered. Some of these rules and principles have been reduced to writing and are embodied in the Acts of Parliament, but a greater part still remains unwritten and is "simply carried in men's minds as precedents, decisions, habits, and practices." The written elements taken by themselves do not comprise the Constitution, though they have considerably affected it.

2. A specimen of development and continuity. The British Constitution not having been made at a particular time in history has grown like an organism and developed from age to age. It fulfils Sir James McIntosh's dictum that constitutions grow instead of being made. It is, thus, the product of evolution and the result of slow and steady development and successive accretions spreading over a thousand years. And all through this period, Britain has never witnessed political upheavals of a revolutionary character. In fact, all political revolutions, if they may be characterised as revolutions, have been of a conservative nature. Britain has all through moved along an essentially continuous constitutional pathway readjusting her institutions slowly and cautiously to the changing conditions and needs of the country and its people. The political changes, as Ogg says, "have as a rule been so gradual, deference to traditions so habitual, and the disposition to cling to accustomed names and forms even when the spirit has changed, so deep-seated, that the constitutional history of Britain displays a continuity hardly paralleled in any other land."³⁸ Lord Morrison is of the opinion that such a peaceful evolution of the British Constitution is "more permanent, more satisfactory and less painful, than if it were the result of violent and bloody revolution." And he thinks that his "country has been lucky in that respect."³⁹

3. Difference between theory and practice. The gradualness of the constitutional evolution and the English habits of retaining traditional

38. English Government and Politics, op. cit., p. 68. Even the war and revolution of the seventeenth century have not been deemed a catastrophic change from the past. On the other hand, "closer examination reveals that what was really happening was only the winning of full and lasting triumph for principles and usages that had long been growing up." Ibid.

39. British Parliamentary Democracy, pp. 1-2.

forms, despite radical changes in the position of power, have produced a marked difference in theory and practice. The Government in the United Kingdom in ultimate theory is an absolute Monarchy, in form, a limited constitutional Monarchy, and in actual character, a democratic republic. In theory, or, to be accurate, legally, the Government of the United Kingdom is vested in the Monarch. The officers of the State, civil and military, are appointed and dismissed in Her Majesty's name. The Ministers are Her Majesty's Ministers and they remain in office during the Royal pleasure. The Monarch is the source of law and fountain of justice. Her Majesty summons, dissolves and prorogues Parliament. No parliamentary election can be held without the Royal writ. Laws made by Parliament are not valid and cannot be enforced without the Royal assent and if the Monarch so wishes may veto any law passed by Parliament.

The Monarch is also the Commander-in-Chief of all the British forces during peace and war. War is declared in Her Majesty's name, peace and treaties are negotiated and concluded in the name and on behalf of the Monarch. Government documents are published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office. All people in the United Kingdom are the loyal subjects of the Monarch and their National Anthem is "God save the Queen." In short, there is no act of Government which is not attributed to the Monarch's name and person. Her Majesty's powers, in terms of law, are uncontrolled, unrestricted and absolute.

But all this is in theory. In practice, the Monarch does nothing by doing everything. The Revolution of 1688 finally settled that in the last resort the King must give way to Parliament. Since then, the whole development of the British Constitution has been marked by a steady transfer of powers and prerogatives from the Monarch as a person to the Crown as an institution. The King has now long ceased to be a directing factor in government and he virtually performs no official act on his own initiative. If the King were to exercise any of the powers which he exercised in the past, and this he can legally do even now, he will be signing the warrant of his own abdication. The real power rests with the King's duly constituted Ministers and His Majesty remains only a symbol of authority, or to put it in the language of the British Constitution, 'The King can do no wrong.'

The Ministers of the Monarch are members of Parliament and they remain in office so long as Parliament wishes it. But the real power of Parliament rests with the House of Commons, a representative House of the people. The responsibility of the Ministers is to the House of Commons. The Prime Minister and other principal Ministers belong to it. All this means the supremacy of the House of Commons and ultimately that of the people, for the people decide the complexion of the House at a general election. It is, therefore, the verdict of the people which determines the government. No government can remain oblivious of public opinion, if it is to continue in office, man administration and to maintain support for the future too. Such a government is a government by consent. "Government with us," says Jennings, "is government by opinion, and that is the only kind of 'self-government' that is possible."⁴⁰ Practice, thus, outruns theory in Britain and she presents one of the most democratic systems of government in the world. The Webbs⁴¹ used for the system of government as obtainable in the United Kingdom the phrase a "crowned republic". While defending British Monarchy, Lord Morrison succinctly observed, "But it takes good countries to run monarchies and it takes good monarchs to be the heads of States. And may I add that it takes a good Republic to appreciate a good monarch."⁴²

4. Sovereignty of Parliament. The British Constitution establishes the supremacy of Parliament. It means that Parliament is supreme. It can make and unmake any kind of law and no court in the realm can question its validity. The authority of Parliament is, thus, transcendental and absolute, and it embraces both the enactments of ordinary laws and the most profound changes in the government itself. There is no judicial review and no authority can declare that the laws made by Parliament are ultra vires. Even the veto power has become obsolete and the King must signify his assent to all measures passed by Parliament. Whether Parliament is really sovereign or not, it is a separate question. So far as law, pure and simple, is concerned, it is.

5. A flexible Constitution. As already pointed out, there is no codified and basic constitutional law having superior sanctity to statutory law. The power to make and amend the constitutional law is vested in Parliament and no special procedure is required than that attends the enactment of an ordinary bill. Furthermore, the popular ratification of constitutional amendments, required in countries like Switzerland and Australia in the nature of referendum, is entirely unknown in Britain. The Constitution of United Kingdom is, accordingly, flexible and responsive. It carries with it the advantage of centring public opinion according to the needs of the time. There is in it a facility of reform, an adaptability superior to written and more rigid constitutions.

The supremacy of Parliament and the ordinary easy method of changing constitutional law has been the subject of some legal controversy. Supremacy of Parliament, it has been asserted, is a legal fiction, for it is exercised in the spirit of responsibility and responsibility in actual practice means the maintenance of majority in Parliament. So long as a party can maintain its majority in Parliament, it can get anything done. But this is really not so. How easy it is to make constitutional changes depends on the general nature of the political system prevailing in a country and the attitude of the people towards constitutional amendments. Democratic principles and responsible institutions are the heritage of Englishmen and Parliament, as such, has never changed the law lightly and casually. There are profound psychological checks and voluntary res-

40. Cabinet Government, op. cit., p. 19. The Joint Select Committee on Indian Constitutional Reform (1934) observed that there "arise two familiar-British conceptions, that good government is not an acceptable substitute for self-government and that the only form of self-government worthy of the name is government through ministers responsible to an elected legislature." Vol. II, part I, p. 5.

41. Sidney and Beatrice Webb.

42. Morrison, Lord, British Parliamentary Democracy, p. 5.

straints on the exercise of its legal authority, whatever be the extent of majority the Party in power may command. "Parliament, after all," cogently remarks Ogg, "is composed of men who, with few exceptions, are respected members of a well-ordered society, endowed with sense, and alive to their responsibility for safeguarding the country's political heritage. They live and work under the restraint of powerful traditions and will no more run riot with the Constitution if it were weighed down with guarantees designed to put it beyond their control."⁴³ The "mandate convention" is indicative of the political temperament of the people. It enjoins that no far-reaching changes in the governmental system should be made until the voters have had a chance to express their opinion upon the proposals at a general election. Asquith's Liberal Government went to the country with the scheme of second Chamber reform. In 1923, Stanley Baldwin appealed to the electorate on the issue of tariff. In 1931, general elections were held to elicit support of the people for the National Government under Ramsay MacDonald. The Labour Party in 1945, fought general elections on the issues of nationalisation and granting self-government to India and other subject countries. Similarly, in the elections of 1964, the Labour Party put before the electorate its programme of re-nationalization. Although the Party secured a precarious majority, yet Harold Wilson told the people immediately after forming the government: "Having been charged with the duties of Government we intend to carry out those duties. Over the whole field of Government there will be many changes which we have been given a mandate by you to carry out. We intend to fulfil that mandate."⁴⁴ Legally, therefore, the Constitution of Britain is undeniably the most flexible in the world, but actually "it is considerably less fluid than might be inferred from what the writers say." The flexibility of the Constitution does not depend wholly, or even largely, upon the simplicity of its amending process.

6. A Unitary Constitution. The British Constitution is unitary and not like that of the United States of America and India federal. There is, of course, devolution, but all authority flows from the central government centred at London. The local areas, as they exist in Britain, derive their powers from the Acts of Parliament which may be enlarged or restricted at its will. Parliament is, therefore, constitutionally supreme, and the local government machine is merely an agent of the Central Government. The essence of a federation, on the other hand, is union and not unity and the powers and jurisdiction exercised by the units, which compose a federation, are original, clearly demarcated, and are derived from the constitution. Neither the central government nor governments of the federating units can encroach upon each other's sphere. If any change is desired to be brought about, it must be done by amending the Constitution and the process of amendment is prescribed therein. This establishes the supremacy of the constitution. It means that the distribution of powers is maintained by a constitution-amending authority which is superior to both central and local governments. In Britain Parliament is supreme and the local areas are subordinate units with such powers as it chooses to bestow. It could, if it wished, abolish the whole complex structure of local government by simple enactment. The existence of a unitary form of government is one of the reasons why Britain is able to manage without a written Constitution. A written and rigid Constitution are the pre-requisites of a federal polity.

43. English Government and Politics, op. cit., p. 72. Dr. Munro in this connection maintains, "Legislators come from the people; they think and feel as the people do; they are saturated with the same hopes and fears; they are creatures of the same habits and when habits solidify into traditions or usages they are stronger than laws, stronger than the provisions of a written constitution." The Governments of Europe, op. cit., p. 23.

44. The Statesman, New Delhi, October 19, 1964.

7. A Parliamentary Government. The British Constitution has a Parliamentary form of Government as distinct from the Presidential type of Government. The King, who is a legal sovereign, has been deprived of all his powers and authority. The real functionaries are the Ministers who belong to the majority party in Parliament and they remain in office so long as they can retain its confidence. The Ministers are both the executive heads and members of Parliament and, as such, co-ordinate the Legislative and Executive departments of Government. The Cabinet in Britain, as Bagehot defines it, is a "hyphen that joins, the buckle that binds the executive and legislative departments together." There can therefore, be no disagreement between the Executive and the Legislature. They work in agreement and the dangers involved in deadlock between the law-making, tax-granting authority and the Executive are absent. If ever the House of Commons votes against the Executive and defeats its policy or if ever it should pass a legislation which has not the favour of the Cabinet, one of the two things would happen. The Cabinet must either resign and enable the Opposition to form Government, or it should advise the King to dissolve Parliament and order new elections and, thereby give an opportunity to the electorate to approve or disapprove the action of the Cabinet. There can therefore, be no continued conflict of policy between the Executive and the Legislature as it may happen in the United States, where there is complete divorce between the Executive and the Legislative departments. The right to govern in Britain, observes Greaves, "flows through the legislature to the Cabinet; is not separately conferred on a popularly elected Chief Executive and in a popularly elected Parliament; the right is not capable therefore of conflicting interpretation by two bodies having an equal moral claim to speak for the public. The risks of conflict or of inanition which result from such a separation of power are attested by a wide experience, whether it be the Weimar Constitution of Germany, the federal Constitution of America, or the 1848 Constitution of France."

8. Two-Party System. Parliamentary Government means party government as it provides the machinery to secure a stable government under a unified command of the politically homogeneous and disciplined leaders. The members of the Government rise and fall in unison and they are individually and collectively responsible for the policy which the Cabinet initiates and they carry out. Since Parliamentary Government is a party government, without political parties Parliamentary Government is impossible. Such a system of government, which combines responsibility with representation, functions best when there are two parties, one forming the Government and the other forming the Opposition. Two-party system enables the views of the electors to have coherent expression and

19.7.05
11607

Britain provides the classical example of a two-party system. It originated in the seventeenth century and for two hundred years thereafter only two parties functioned. Now with the collapse of the Liberal Party the two-party system again exists. Britain hates a coalition government because it contradicts the fundamental principle that Cabinet represents a party united in principle.

9. The Rule of Law and Civil Liberties. One of the fundamental principles of the British Constitution is the Rule of Law. It is based on the Common Law of the land and is the product of centuries of struggle of the people for the recognition of their inherent rights and privileges. In Britain, unlike the United States of America, and the Republic of India, the Constitution does not confer specific rights on citizens. Nor is there any Parliamentary Act which lays down the Fundamental Rights of the people. Yet there is maximum liberty in Britain and, according to Dicey, it is due to the existence of the Rule of Law.

The Rule of Law, as said before, has never been enacted as a Statute. It is implicit in the various Acts of Parliament, judicial decisions and in the Common Law. According to Lord Hewart, the Rule of Law means the "supremacy or dominance of law, as distinguished from mere arbitrariness, or from some alternative mode, which is not law, of determining or disposing of the rights of individuals."⁴⁵ It is sufficient for the present to say, that when powers of Government are exercised according to settled and binding rules and not arbitrarily, then, the subjects of that government are living under the Rule of Law. Such conditions of life can be possible only when there is equality of all before the law, its supremacy, uniformity, and universality. The citizens, the courts, the administrative officials, are all subject to it. "In other words, under the rule of law, obligations may not be imposed by the State, nor property interfered with, nor personal liberty curtailed except in accordance with accepted principles of law and through the action of legally competent authorities." These principles are recognised by the courts and hence judiciary is the unfailing guardian of the liberties of the people.

Sovereignty of Parliament and the Rule of Law are closely connected. By its sovereign power, Parliament can curtail or suspend the liberties of the people and, thus, set aside the Rule of Law itself. Parliament has very often done it, but it always did it at times of national emergency. Drastic restrictions were imposed upon commonly recognised rights of the people during World War I. In 1934 and 1936, Incitement to Disaffection Act and Public Order Act were passed which imposed stringent restrictions on the rights to speech, assembly and press. Throughout World War II, drastic restraints were imposed under Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939. But the traditions of the country and political temperament of the people do not tolerate such infringement of their liberties when conditions of national emergency or danger are not prevailing. There is, therefore, a sense in which Parliament itself is subject to the Rule of Law. It cannot and, in fact it does not, make laws which unnecessarily encroach upon the liberties of the people. Laws in Britain are passed to promote liberty and not to restrict liberty. "Freedom of speech is as truly a part of the British way of life as is the responsibility of ministers. Neither rests upon written law: neither would be observed more consistently if it did so."

⁴⁵. The New Despotism, p. 19.

10. Hereditary Character in the Constitution. Another specially distinctive feature of the British Constitution is the expression which it contains of the hereditary principle, which has been for so long discarded by the great majority of other countries. Monarchy rests on the hereditary principle and the House of Lords is primarily composed of hereditary peers. It is true that neither the King nor the House of Lords play any effective role in the political set up of the country, yet their continuance appears hardly reconcilable with the democratic ideals which Englishmen cherish so fondly. And still Englishmen had never been in a mood to abolish these historic institutions. "I would claim," Lord Attlee observes, "that, despite the maintenance of monarchical and oligarchical elements, the British system is the best example of democracy and especially of parliamentary democracy."

SUGGESTED READINGS

- | | |
|------------------------------|--|
| Amos, M. | : The English Constitution , Chaps. I, II. |
| Amery, L.S. | : Thoughts on the Constitution . |
| Anson, W.R. | : Law and Customs of the Constitution , Vol. I, pp. 1-13. |
| Bagshot, Walter | : The English Constitution . |
| Birch, A.H. | : Representative and Responsible Government, An Essay on British Constitution , Chap. 1, pp. 116-122. |
| Dicey, A.V. | : Law of the Constitution , Chaps. I, II, XIV, XV. |
| Gooch, R.K. | : The Government of England , Chaps. VI, VII. |
| Greaves, H.R.G. | : The British Constitution , Chap. I. |
| Finer, H. | : Governments of Greater European Powers , Chap. 2. |
| Jennings, W.I. | : Cabinet Government , pp. 1-19. |
| Jennings, W.I. | : The Law and the Constitution , Chaps. II, III. |
| Keith, A.B. | : The Constitution of England from Queen Victoria to George VI , Vol. I, pp. 12-19. |
| Keith, A.B., and Gibbs, N.M. | : The British Cabinet System , pp. 1-21. |
| Laski, H.J. | : Parliamentary Government in England , Chaps. I, II. |
| Laski, H.J. | : Reflections on the Constitution . |
| Low, S. | : The Governance of England , pp. 1-14. |
| Lowell, A.L. | : Government of England , Vol. I, pp. 1-15. |
| Morrison, Lord | : British Parliamentary Democracy . |
| Munro, W.B. | : The Governments of Europe , Chap. II. |
| Ogg, F.A. | : English Government and Politics , Chap. III. |
| Philips, O. Hood | : Constitutional and Administrative Law . |
| Wheare, K.C. | : Modern Constitutions . |
| Yardley, D.C.M. | : Introduction to British Constitutional Law . |

CHAPTER II

DEVELOPMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION

Constitutional Growth. In the preceding Chapter we noted one leading characteristic of the British Constitution, that it is the result of continuous development. Freeman has emphasised this feature with unquestionable accuracy. He says, "The continual national life of the people, notwithstanding foreign conquests and internal revolutions, has remained unbroken for fourteen hundred years. At no moment has the tie between the present and the past been wholly rent asunder, at no moment have Englishmen sat down to put together a wholly new Constitution in obedience to some dazzling theory. Each step in our growth has been the natural consequence of some earlier step; each change in our law and constitution has been, not the beginning in anything wholly new, but the development and improvement of something that was already old. Our progress has in some ages been faster, in others slower; at some moments we have seemed to stand still, or even to go back but the great mark of political development has never wholly stopped; it has never been permanently checked since the days when the coming in of the Teutonic conquerors first began to change Britain into England."¹ The starting point of the British institutions and the principles which govern their working lie scattered into the past and the present mechanism of government can only be understood if we briefly analyse the process of this growth; how the British Constitution came into being and how it assumed its present form.

It is customary to divide this growth into six distinct periods, but we divide them into three for purpose of convenience and practical utility. The first period extends from the time of the Angles and Saxons through the Norman and Angevin dynasties to 1485. This period may be called the period in which were laid the foundations of the constitution. The second period extends from 1485 to 1689 and covers the establishment of the Tudor dynasty through the early and later Stuart periods and embraces the Puritan Revolution and Commonwealth. This period is called the period of reconstruction of the Constitution. The third period extends from 1689 to the present and it is of more direct interest to the students of British Government today. In this period came the rounding out, or fructification of the constitution.

LAYING THE FOUNDATIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION

Anglo-Saxon Institutions. The institution of kingship developed in England among the early Angles and Saxons who came first to ravage and then to settle in the country. They drove the original people, who had become weak and defenceless after the Romans had departed from the Island, westward and occupied the greater part of England. The victorious Anglo-Saxon tribes established seven districts or "Kingdoms"; historically known "heptarchy". Then, followed a period of internal warfare, the more powerful absorbed the weaker and the "heptarchy" was reduced to three Kingdoms of Northumbria, Mercia and Wessex. Northumbria and Mercia fell to the Danes, but Wessex stemmed the tide and ultimately established its supremacy in the ninth century and, thus, the English nation was formed. From the time of Alfred (871) till the Norman conquest (1066) the House of Wessex supplied England with most of her Kings.

1. Freeman, E.A., Growth of the English Constitution, p. 19.

The institution of Kingship during this period was strong. The King did not occupy the throne by strict hereditary right. He was elected by the witangemot or "Council of wisemen", and although preference was shown "for members of a given family, they did not hesitate to pass over an eldest son if they considered him incompetent or otherwise undesirable." The King was, no doubt, a leader, but his strength and his position naturally varied according to his personal qualities.

The witangemot or witans exercised large powers and to some extent acted as a "check" even on a strong King. The Council consisted of the chief officers of the royal household, the bishops, the aeldormen of the Shire and other wisemen of the country whom the King was pleased to summon. It had no fixed number and hence it varied in size from time to time. The King presided at its meetings and directed its 'business' which included enacting of laws, levying of taxes for public service, making alliances and treaties of peace, raising of land and sea forces whenever occasion demanded, appointing and deposing the bishops, aeldormen of Shires and other great officers of Church and State, authorising of ecclesiastical decrees, etc. It also acted from time to time as a Supreme Court of Justice both in civil and criminal cases.

The functions of the witan, from modern point of view, were primarily administrative. Although its composition depended upon the choice of the King and it met whenever the King chose to summon it, yet it was a potential check on the arbitrary power of the King, particularly when it possessed the authority to elect and depose him. This is one of the reasons why Kingship never became absolute in the Anglo-Saxon period. "It has been a marked and important feature in our constitutional history," wrote Anson, "that the King has never, in theory, acted in matters of state without the counsel and consent of a body of advisers."² To put it in modern terminology, it appears as if the King acted "in Council," and in a rudimentary sense it was the beginning of a constitutional monarchy. Similarly, the witan was a Parliament in embryo, because the King sought the advice of his "wise men" when he had occasion to modify existing law or to cause existing law to be reduced to writing. "As a prototype of the Great, or Common, Council of later times, and even, more remotely, of the present cabinet," observes Ogg,

2. The seven "Kingdoms" were: East Angalia, Mercia, Northumbria, Kent, Sussex, Essex and Wessex.

3. Anson, W.R., Law and Custom of the Constitution (23rd ed.), Vol. II., Pt. i., p. 7.

"the witangemot is interesting and important." At the same time, this assembly cannot be deemed to have possessed the character of either a modern cabinet or a parliament.

Another important contribution of the Anglo-Saxon times is the institution of local government. The mass of the population in those days lived in villages and their principal occupation was agriculture. Each village, with the land belonging to it, formed a tunscip or township. Each township led a corporate life, social, political and economic. The government machinery consisted of a mote or town meeting, and certain elected officers, chief among whom was a reeve. Some important hamlets situated at the junction of the trade routes or near to fortified posts grew into burghs or boroughs which enjoyed still more local autonomy. A group of townships formed a hundred. Each hundred had its own mote. The hundreds were formed into shires. A shire may be accepted the progenitor of modern county. It had its own assembly and in the earlier states the shire mote consisted of all free men who cared to attend. With the lapse of time, however, it came to be made up of the larger landowners, principal officials of the Church, reeves and other representatives of the townships. The shire-mote met twice a year and chiefly transacted judicial business, especially those cases which were too important to be decided in the hundred-mote.

There are three significant features, according to Munro, about this Saxon system of local government. In the first place, it was a uniform system throughout the whole kingdom which helped to create a bond of national unity. Secondly, it was in the township and shire assemblies that the English people learnt their first lessons in the art of self-government. Finally, "and, perhaps most significant of all, is the fact that the government of the shire was based, in theory at least, upon the principle of representation. It was there that the idea of choosing representatives first gained a firm foothold. Men were chosen by their fellow freemen to sit in the court of the shire long before there were any elections to Parliament. So when representation in parliament came, the people were ready for it. It is no wonder that the people of the English tongue have become skilled in the art of government. There has been no time during the past thousand years when they have not been electing somebody to represent them somewhere—in townships, shire, or borough, in parish, county, or Parliament."⁵ Blackstone, while referring to the democratic element in the British Constitution, said, "The liberties of England may be ascribed above all things to her free local institutions. Since the days of their Saxon ancestors, her sons have learned at their own gates the duties and responsibilities of citizens."

Norman-Angevin Contributions. A new chapter in the development of British political institutions began in 1066 when William of Normandy conquered England after defeating the English King Harold. There were two tasks before the conqueror. First, his anxiety to establish a vigorous centralised rule to which he was accustomed in his Continental possessions, and second, his anxiety to win the goodwill of the people.

4. English Government and Politics, op. cit., p. 6.

5. The Governments of Europe, op. cit., pp. 32-33.

His first step, therefore, was to permit the people to retain their ancient laws, institutions and customs, except in so far as the change seemed necessary to stabilise his own position and authority. With a view to achieve the second object, William curbed the powers of the Saxon earls, confiscated their estates, and distributed them among his own supporters to be held by them under feudal tenure as his vassals. According to the terms of the new feudal tenure the tenant's foremost duty and obligation was obedience to the King. Hitherto feudalism involved relationships of an economic nature. William's mechanism gave it "a highly organised and decidedly political character quite definitely to the interest of the crown."

Another step which William took towards unification of his authority was in the direction of the Church. He made himself the head of the Church and assumed the right to appoint bishops, and exercised his veto on the acts of ecclesiastical councils, thereby, asserting the supremacy of the State. Then, both William and his successors increased the authority of the Crown by sending King's judges from one county to the other, hearing cases, deciding them on uniform principles common to all and facilitating the growth of "a common law" on which hinge the liberties of the people. Finally, William and his successors brought local administration under their control by increasing the powers of the shire reeves or sheriffs. The sheriffs came to be appointed by the King and were made responsible to him alone. In this way, they became the vigilant enforcers "of the royal will, charged with maintaining law and order and with collecting the revenues due to the King, which twice a year were carried to the designated place and turned over to the custodian of the treasury."

William, thus, made himself every inch a King by concentrating greater powers in his own hands than the Saxon Kings had known. This process of royal centralization was a blessing in disguise, because "the growth of the royal power under the Normans and their successors paved the way for the ultimate triumph of democracy. Representative government did not achieve its first victories in England because the barons and lords were strong, but because they were weak. Restraints upon the King's authority in England could not be imposed by individual dukes and counts as in France, for there were none powerful enough. The curbing of the King, when the time came, had to be a joint enterprise, participated in by all. In other words, the noblemen and lesser land owners of England were compelled to pool their strength against the monarchy, and they seized upon parliament as the agency through which this right be effected."

Magnum Concilium. In spite of the great powers which William concentrated in his own hands, he summoned a Magnum Concilium or Great Council thrice a year at regular intervals. The Magnum Concilium was the successor of the old Saxon witangemot. It was composed of the leading men of the realm: archbishops, bishops and abbots, earls thegns and knights. None of them was elected. They were individually summoned by the King. The powers exercised by the Council were more or less identical to those of the witan, but in actual practice it was not so for two reasons. The increasing powers of the King, in the first place, eclipsed the authority of the Council, and, secondly, all its members were the vassals of the King whose foremost obligation was allegiance, loyalty and obedience to him. At the same time, it cannot be denied that the Council was the High Court of the King and his chief Advisory Council. "Presided over and guided by the King, the Council helped to decide upon policies of State, supervised the work of administration, sat as the highest court of justice, and made or modified laws on the rather rare occasions when such action was required. An august body it obviously was with functions which spread promiscuously over the entire field of government."⁸

6. Ogg, F.A., English Government and Politics, op. cit., p. 10.

7. Munro, W.B., The Governments of Europe, op. cit., pp. 34-35.

Curia Regis. Out of the Magnum Concilium emerged the Curia Regis or the Small Council. Its function was to help the Sovereign carry on the government during the interval when the Magnum Concilium was not in session. It consisted of the chamberlain, the chancellor, the constable, the steward, and other officers of the royal household who accompanied the King wherever he went so that they could at all times help in transacting the business of the State. The powers of the Curia Regis, as such, were similar to those of the Council. But weightier matters of policy, justice, and finance were generally left for the consideration of the Council whereas administrative and routine matters were decided by the Curia. It, however, depended entirely on the discretion of the King to refer matters indiscriminately to either body, or, indeed, to neither of them if he so preferred.

How far the King was bound to follow the advice given to him by his counsellors, it depended upon the personality of the King himself. As most of the Norman-Angevin rulers were vigorous men who exercised absolute powers, both Council and Curia were less of a check upon his sovereign powers as compared with the witan of the Saxon times. Nevertheless the King did gather a group of individuals round him to seek their advice and get their confirmation on such important actions as the declaring of war and peace and of the passing of laws. "This habit, under the later Kings who were not so strong, hardened into a usage and the usage became a constitutional principle. Out of the plenary sessions of the Great Council the British Parliament arose; out of the Curia grew the Privy Council, the exchequer, and the High Courts of justice. So the frame of government in twentieth century England owes much to this ancient council with its big and little sessions."

The work of Henry II (1154-1189). Henry II, William's greatgrandson, who founded the Angevin or Plantagenet dynasty, marked the great advance in English Government. Anarchy during the reign of Stephen (1135-54) had almost wrecked the entire system of government so admirably established and strengthened by the Conqueror. With the coming of Henry II all what had been lost was recovered. He waged a relentless war both against the rebellious nobility and the independent clergy. He was successful in his efforts and brought administration on a stronger footing. Henry II brought the King's law into a stronger footing by reviving the scheme of travelling or itinerant justices. At the same time, trial by jury replaced the earlier methods of trial by ordeal, battle, or compurgation. He, also, inaugurated a distinction between the administrative and the judicial functions of the Curia Regis. By separating these two functions the membership of the Curia was divided into two separate parts, one section acted as a Royal Council, later known as the Privy Council, and the other section confined itself to judicial functions only and became the parent of the exchequer and the High Courts of justice.

8. Ogg, F.A., English Government and Politics, op. cit., p. 11.

- Magna Carta. Then, came the Magna Carta, the Greater Charter of 1215. The orderly and firm governmental authority established by Henry weakened in the hands of his sons, Richard I and John. By his high-handed acts John provoked rebellion of the barons and clergy and on many occasions he was forced to accept humiliating surrenders. Taking advantage of his weak position, the barons ultimately compelled the King to accept their terms embodied in the Magna Carta or the Great Charter on June 15, 1215, at Runnymede, between London and Windsor. The Great Charter has been characterised to be the most famous, if not the most "effective of those restraints upon political authority which is the essence of constitutionalism". The Charter was wrested by the barons from the King with the object to secure as large advantages for themselves as they could get. It was in no sense a people's Charter, but subsequent tradition transformed it into a Charter of English liberties. The famous Article 39 that no freeman might be arrested, imprisoned, dispossessed, outlawed or exiled, or harassed in any other way save by lawful judgment of his peers or the law of the land provided a cause for democratic interpretation and application than its sponsors imagined. The document reiterated the principle that the authority of the King was not unlimited and arbitrary and that abuse of power might be resisted. It also stipulated that certain kinds of taxes could not be imposed by the King without the assent of the Great Council.

The Magna Carta together with the Petition of Rights and the Bill of Rights constitute, according to Chatham, "the Bible of the English Constitution," and the veracity of this statement can be fathomed from the fact that the Charter was confirmed six times by Henry III, three times by Edward I, fourteen times by Edward III, six times by Richard II, six times by Henry IV, and once each by Henry V and Henry VI. "What the charter did," said Adams, "was to lay down two fundamental principles which lie at the present day, as clearly as in 1215, at the foundation of the English Constitution and of all Constitutions derived from it. First, that there exist in the State certain laws so necessarily at the basis of the political organisation of the time that the King, or as we should say today the government, must obey them; the second that, if the government refuses to obey these laws, the nation has the right to force it to do so, even to the point of overthrowing the government and putting another in its place.... In every age of British history in which the question has arisen, in every crisis in the development of English liberty, this double principle is that upon which our ancestors stood and upon which, as a foundation, they built up little by little the fabric of free government under which we live."⁹

9. Adams, G.B., Constitutional History of England (Revised by Robert L. Schuyler, 1951), pp. 138-139.

The Rise of Parliament. Schools of thought differ as to origin of Parliament. The most popular view traces it from the Magnum Concilium of the Normans. It was a meeting of the great nobles and ecclesiastics of the Kingdom and somewhat resembling to the House of Lords of modern times. From time to time, and generally for winning popular approval for levying taxes, Kings would summon representatives of the common people. In 1213, King John hard pressed for money addressed writs to the Sheriffs directing that "four discreet knights" be sent from each county to attend a meeting of the Great Council at Oxford. In 1254, Henry III, urgently needing money for wars in Gascony, summoned two knights from each county to participate in the meeting of the Great Council, and by that time the Great Council was coming to be known as Parliament. In 1265, Simon de Montfort, the victorious leader of the barons at Lewis, convened a Parliament which was attended not only by the barons, clergy, and two knights from each shire, but also by two burgesses from each of those twenty-one boroughs which were known to be friendly to his party. Simon de Montfort is said to be the father of the House of Commons because of the revolutionary representative complexion which he gave to his Parliament. But it is too much to agree to this point of view. Simon's Parliament was a partisan assembly packed up with his own supporters with the ostensible object of raising revenues to meet his needs. "Nevertheless, the meeting for which he was responsible brought the towns in a form of co-operation with barons, clergy, and country gentry and not previously attempted, and came nearer to bring a genuine national assembly than anything theretofore known." Another significant result of such a kind of representation was that unconsciously on the part of Kings, and on the unconscious minds of the people, a doctrine that there should be no taxation without representation was finding its impress. John simply found it easier to tax with representation than without it so that there may be least resistance. "But he builded better than he knew."

Next thirty years witnessed a backward swing. Henry III, who succeeded on ousting Montfort, discontinued the practice of summoning representatives of towns. Then, came Edward I. In 1295, he again resorted to the old practice of Montfort. Edward, too, like his predecessors found himself in the grips of war and naturally he needed money. He, therefore, summoned all elements in the country—barons, clergy, knights of the shire, and burgesses—and in fact all who could help him to tide over his financial embarrassments. His Model Parliament, as it is usually designated, consisted of more than 400 persons representing all shades of society. They met in one single body. But the King summoned the nobles, the clergy, and the commons or townsmen separately to hear his plea for grant of money and to give their consent. Since then the three groups of the "three estates" met and voted separately on many occasions and it seemed as if Parliament had definitely divided itself into three distinct Houses. Gradually, however, practical interests led to a different arrangement. The higher clergy, who were themselves great nobles, and the greater barons coalesced in a single body because of their affinity of interests. Similarly, the knights and the commons began sitting together. "The upshot was a gradual re-alignment of the membership in two great groups, of which one became the House of Lords, the other the House of Commons—the one composed of men who attended in response to individual summons, the other of persons, who, elected in counties and boroughs, attended in a representative capacity.”

By the end of fourteenth century the system of two Chambers, one for the Lords and one for the Commons, had become an accomplished fact. It was not designed as a result of some political theory. It came to be established by force of social and economic circumstances. “It was an important step, one of the most significant in the entire history of government, for it started the bicameral system on its way around the world. No one planned or guided this separation and coalescence; it was merely the natural working out of the social forces of the age. Regarded as of little or no consequence in the earlier centuries, this division of the English Parliament into two Chambers gave it a frame that has been transmitted to every other great legislative body on earth.”

But far more important was the development of the power of Parliament. From the thirteenth century onwards this power began to make itself felt in its control over the national purse. The King was in constant need of money. By calling his barons, and the representatives of the shires and towns he could get an estimate of what the country could give him. Edward I summoned his Model Parliament with the avowed object of getting money to fight French and Scottish wars. “What affects all,” he said in the writs of summons, “by all should be approved.”¹⁰ This was later seized upon by the people to press the regular summoning of Parliament and obtaining its approval of money grants. It also evolved the principle of no taxation without representation. This principle assumed a conspicuous form when in 1407, Henry IV agreed that all grants of taxes should be first made by the commoners and then assented to by the Lords. Thus, the financial initiative came to be vested in the representatives of the people.

Likewise with legislation. Hitherto laws were made by the King with the assent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal. The Commons simply presented petitions for the redress of grievances. Sometimes the laws so enacted turned to be something very different from the requests contained in the petitions. In 1414, Henry V granted that “from henceforth nothing be enacted to the petitions of the Commons that be contrary to their asking, whereby they should be bound without their assent.”¹¹ This rule was often violated. Late in the reign of Henry VI a change of procedure was brought about when measures began to be introduced in either House in the form of drafted bills. Statutes, thus, came to be made “by the King’s most Excellent Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same”¹² This form is still followed unless the measure is passed under the provision of the Parliament Act of 1911, when mention of the Lords is omitted. The obvious result of all this development is, as Ogg observes, “Once merely 10. Adams, G.B., and Stephens, H.M., Select Documents of English Constitutional History (1947), p. 82.

11. Ibid., p. 82.

12. Refer to Act declaring Valid Act of Lancastrian Kings. ibid., p. 202.

a modest petitioner for laws redressing grievances, the House of Commons, by the end of the fifteenth century, had become legally at all events a co-ordinated law-making assemblage."¹³

THE PERIOD OF RECONSTRUCTION

Tudor Absolutism. By the end of the fifteenth century Parliament had begun to show marks of its strength and the King's power had definitely eclipsed. The great institutional foundations of the Modern English Constitution had been firmly laid. The years to come were in the nature of further growth and adjustment of these institutions "leading to altered balances of power and mechanisms of control."

Beginning our account from 1485, when the War of Roses came to an end the Tudor House under Henry VII began to sway the destinies of England, much was done to readjust the balance of power in favour of the King. The times were propitious and the opportunities many. The country needed a firm and orderly government and the Tudors gave it. "By tact and a thorough grasp of the psychology of the popular mind Henry VII, Henry VIII and Elizabeth were able to lead the nation along their own desirable paths, leaving the people with the impression and satisfaction that the monarch was graciously gratifying their wishes."

The period beginning from 1485 to 1603 is referred to as that of Tudor absolutism. There is every truth in it. Parliament during this period had come to be the servant of the King rather than an independent force. Elections were held irregularly¹⁴ and the sessions used to be brief lasting for only a few days or at most a few weeks.¹⁵ Those laws which Parliament could not be induced to enact were made by royal proclamations, "and the sources of revenue over which Parliament as yet had no control were so numerous that government could be carried on for years without a subsidy." The real centre of gravity was the Privy Council, a group of advisers chosen by the King but drawn from the middle classes. The Tudors never relied upon the great nobility. By these means, keeping their fingers on the pulse of the people, and by thorough efficiency in administration, the Tudor Sovereigns concentrated power in themselves and thereby heightened the effect of Kingship.

Nevertheless the power of Parliament, though obscured, was far from being unimportant. "The overweening pride and assumed omnipotence of the Tudor monarchy received rough shocks from a Parliament that withstood Wolsely's demands and from one that presumed to remonstrate with Elizabeth on the question of monopolies." Parliament's prestige was also increased as a result of the struggle between Henry VIII and the Roman Catholic Church. Thus, the "Reformation Parliament," which sat from 1529 to 1536, "acquired political experience and importance and enjoyed a degree of freedom of speech which set powerful precedents for later times." This Parliament passed the legislation "completing the breach with the Church of Rome" and made King the Supreme head of the Church of England. Queen Elizabeth consulted Parliament more frequently than her predecessors and accepted its judgment on many important occasions. The members of the House of Commons, too, had become conscious of their duties as representatives and took pride in their growing political influence.

13. Ogg, F.A., English Government and Politics, op. cit., p. 26.

14. A Parliament which proved obliging was kept for years whereas one that showed independence was summarily dismissed. In the reign of Henry VIII, for example, nine Parliaments were elected, one sitting for seven years, two for three years, the other six were quickly dissolved.

15. Even during the forty years of Elizabeth, when Parliament counted far more than earlier, the Houses were in session, in the aggregate, something less than three years—an average for the reign was slightly over three weeks a year. One of the ten Parliaments of this reign lasted eleven years, but met only three times.

The King and Parliament under the Stuarts. After the death of Elizabeth (1603) the throne passed on to James Stuart of Scotland. He became James I of England and established the Stuart dynasty. James I soon came into conflict with Parliament. He believed in the Divine Right of Kings to rule their subjects and held his authority as absolute and unlimited. He even claimed that resistance to the King's authority was unlawful under every circumstance. "Monarchy," the King asserted in a speech before Parliament, "is the supremest thing upon earth....As to dispute what God may do is blasphemy....so is it sedition in subjects to dispute what a King may do in the height of his power." In defence of his Divine Right, James himself wrote a book entitled: The Trew Law of Free Monarchies. This concept of Monarchy was antagonistic to the constitutional sense of the Englishmen with which they had become familiar since the time of the Saxons and which had by that time become their proud heritage.

But there was no open rupture. It was the fate of his son Charles I, who, like his father, believed in the Divine Right of Kings. He was tactless and soon fell into the hands of rash and unwise counsellors. He dissolved his first two Parliaments in rapid succession. Unable to get money grants from Parliament he resorted to the method of getting forced loans. When Parliament was, again, summoned in 1628, it presented the famous Petition of Rights to the King asserting therein the ancient liberties of the people and denouncing the royal abuse of power. The King granted the Petition finding no other way to get out of the crisis.¹⁶ But he did not keep his word and very soon imposed various old levies without the sanction of Parliament. Charles, also, secretly tried to flare up the army against Parliament. Knowing all the designs of the King, Parliament presented to the King The Grand Remonstrance with the Petition accompanying it, on December 1, 1641.¹⁷ It contained a dignified assertion of its rights and privileges and appealed to the King to respect the same. The climax had, however, reached and the conflict between the King and Parliament developed into the Civil War. The King was defeated and put to death.

The Commonwealth. For eleven years England was without a King.

16. For the text of the Petition and the King's reply thereto refer to Adams, G.B., and Stephens, H.M., Select Documents of English Constitutional History, op. cit., pp. 339-42.

17. Ibid., pp. 376-79.

In 1649, Parliament formally proclaimed a "Commonwealth" or Republic. Monarchy and the House of Lords were abolished. A written constitution, the Instrument of Government, was put into operation in 1653 with Cromwell as Lord Protector. But the Protector, too, had trouble with his Parliament and he dissolved it. Republicanism failed to strike root. "Shrewder men, including Cromwell, had recognised from the first that the English people were monarchist at heart, and it is not too much to say that from the start the restoration of Kingship was inevitable. Even before the death of Cromwell, in 1658, the trend was decidedly in that direction, and after the hand of the great Protector was removed from the helm, the change was only a question of time and means."¹⁸

The Restoration and Abdication of James II. On May 25, 1660, Charles II, the third Stuart, was restored to the throne. It appeared that Charles had accepted the Supremacy of Parliament and the old conflict had come to an end. But like his father, Charles II also tried, later, to rule despotically. Parliament did not take any drastic step "as it was painfully reminded of the Commonwealth period." An important feature of Charles's reign was the passing of the Habeas Corpus Act in 1679.¹⁹

James II and the Glorious Revolution. James II succeeded his brother Charles II in 1685. Even before his accession to the throne many petitioners had demanded that he be debarred from the throne because of his avowed adherence to Catholicism. Within a short time after his accession, he quarrelled with Parliament over his right to exercise Dispensing Power.²⁰ In 1687, he issued a Declaration of indulgence²¹ which interfered with the powers of the established Church. All this was sufficient to precipitate the "Glorious Revolution" of 1688. A group of leading men representing the various political elements in Parliament invited William of Orange, son-in-law of the King, and his wife Mary to accept the throne. James fled from the country on December 2, 1688 and in this way the Stuart Monarchy came to an end.

Supremacy of Parliament. The "Convention Parliament"²² was held on January 22, 1689, and six days later it passed two resolutions giving reasons which led to the abdication of James and establishing William and Mary on the throne as joint sovereigns. These proceedings were validated by the "Confirmation of the Convention Parliament" Act of February 20, 18. Ogg, F.A. English Government and Politics, op. cit., p. 36.

19. The Act secured the personal liberty of every citizen and required production of the person committed and charged with any crime in a court of law, within three days on receipt of a complaint in writing, to stand a regular trial. Adams, C.B., and Stephens, H.M., Select Documents of English Constitutional History, pp. 440-48.

20. In the Hales' case Chief Justice Herbert, eleven Judges concurring, upheld the Dispensation Power of the King and, thus, enabling him to dispense with or to suspend the operation of certain laws. Judge Street, the only dissenting Judge, was of the opinion that the King could not dispense the provisions of the statutes passed by Parliament. Ibid., pp. 450-51.

21. Ibid., pp. 451-54.

22. The Convention Parliament was not in form a Parliament, because it was not summoned in the regular way by a King. This was inevitable by the flight of James II, and by the fact that William had not yet been crowned King.

1689.²³ Then, came the famous Bill of Rights embodying the Constitutional rules and principles which should guide the transactions of the King in his dealings with Parliament.²⁴ This Bill stated clearly and definitely the limitations on the powers of the King, and in one specific clause decreed that no future ruler of England could be a Roman Catholic or could marry a Roman Catholic. William and Mary sat on the throne by virtue of Parliamentary sanction, a sanction that was recognised for all times in the King's consent to the Bill of Rights. What the Bill of Rights did was to sum up the results of the Revolution, and the Glorious Revolution drew to a close the great constitutional struggle of the seventeenth century. "King in future held the throne by the grace of Parliament. Kings could be made and unmade by Parliament. Parliament was, therefore, supreme."²⁵

The Act of Settlement (1701)²⁶ still further limited the powers of the King thereby establishing the authority of Parliament beyond all doubt. The Act deliberately changed the hereditary principle, and to ensure against a Roman Catholic sovereign it was decreed that after the death of Anne (1702-1714) without heirs the Crown was to pass over to a small German family, the House of Hanover, the nearest Protestant branch of the Stuart line. George I, the first of the Hanoverians, thus, ascended the throne as a result of the Act of Settlement. In other words, he was a nominee of Parliament and, as such, a servant to the will of Parliament. The House of Hanover occupied the throne in hereditary succession from 1701 until Queen Victoria's death in 1901. Edward VII, succeeding his mother, began the House of Saxe-Coburg Gotha,²⁷ the name of which was changed to Windsor during the Great War of 1914.

THE PERIOD OF FRUCTIFICATION

The Bill of Rights, accordingly, marks the culminating point in the evolution of the fundamentals. The centre of gravity had shifted from the Crown to Parliament. But it was many years before the change became clearly understood. It took time for seeds which had been sown in earlier periods to germinate in this and to grow into fully matured institutions of popular government. Following are the main lines of growth and development in this direction which complete our account in making the British Constitution what it stands for today.

Diminished Powers of the Monarch. Parliamentary supremacy actually amounted to a little for a quarter of a century or thereabout after 1688. For nearly two decades the sovereigns continued to exercise the right to veto acts of Parliament.²⁸ William and Mary continued to appoint as

23. For the text of the Act refer to Select Documents of English Constitutional History, op. cit., pp. 454-56.

24. For the text of the Bill of Rights refer to idid, pp. 462-69.

25. Rosenberg, K., How Britain is Governed, p. 20.

26. For the text of the Act refer to Select Documents of English Constitutional History, op. cit., pp. 475-79.

27. Victoria married Albert of Saxe-Coburg Gotha.

28. The veto power was last employed in 1707 by Queen Anne in defeating a bill for settling the militia in Scotland. Since then no monarch has exercised veto and this power of the king has now become obsolete.

their ministers persons of their own choice regardless of the wishes of Parliament. They likewise continued to control the policies of their ministers and very often declined to follow their ministers' advice. The only means at the disposal of Parliament to oust an obnoxious minister or to force change in the ministerial policy was through the process of impeachment or attainder. The ministers were not required to be members of Parliament and they continued to be appointed, and to retire from office individually and collectively.

But this situation was completely changed with the coming in of the Hanoverians. George I (1714-27) and George II (1727-60) were not familiar with the language and the political institutions of England. They neither understood their prerogatives nor tried to assert those which they understood. They were, accordingly, willing parties to let the powers, which their predecessors had jealously guarded, slip out of their hands. By the middle of the eighteenth century, therefore, the Sovereigns had ceased to exercise their personal control over the Government. It went to those who were ever eager to have it: Ministers and Parliament. George III (1760-1820) endeavoured to live up to Bolingbroke's "patriot King" and tried to resist parliamentary power. But it was in vain; the clock could not be turned back, and with the loss of American Colonies and the insanity of the King the power of the monarch as an institution of government had departed for ever. The successors of George III had become accustomed to the new role of the monarch that he reigned and did not govern. Victoria (1837-1901) had her own notions, and, of course, very strong about the rights of the monarch even under a cabinet system of government. But she exercised those rights consistent with the new position of the Sovereign in England and in accordance with the principles of limited monarchy. "A satisfactory way of running the government with a minimum of personal participation by the monarch had been worked out, and no King or Queen could have induced or compelled the nation to give it up. Any effort in that direction would have meant a new dynasty—perhaps the end of monarchy itself."²⁹

The Responsible Ministry. The quarter of a century immediately following the Revolution of 1688 was a period of trial and error. The supremacy of Parliament, as pointed out in the preceding paragraphs, was hedged with practical limitations and it seemed as if the country was destined for another conflict. There was no intermediate agency which could act as a buffer between the King and Parliament. But by the middle of the eighteenth century circumstances brought into existence such an agency, its utility discovered, and it rapidly developed into a practical, effective and popular organ of government. It was the Cabinet. Responsibility for the actual exercise of executive functions gradually came to be vested in a group of ministers who belonged to one single political party, were members of Parliament, and directly responsible to it for all their official acts. The condition on which they could remain in office was the confidence of Parliament rather than the pleasure of the King, and they were expected to vacate office whenever Parliament ceased to have confidence in them. There was no law about it. Experience and utility were the unescapable truths and they had to be reconciled to theory and practice. The theory was absolute monarchy. The fact of constitutional development all through these centuries was a limited monarchy. Experience and utility had to be reconciled to facts in order to make it a matter of reality, and assumption of responsibility by the ministry for the executive acts of the sovereign was the essence of limited monarchy.

29. Zink, H., Modern Foreign Governments, op. cit., pp. 17-18.

This transformation of the King's ministers of the late seventeenth century into Parliament's ministers of the eighteenth century was facilitated by the rise of political parties, the Whigs and the Tories. In the beginning the King selected his ministers without reference to parties or to political conditions in Parliament. He included for a time both Whigs and Tories in the same ministry. But it was a combination of strange bedfellows as both parties held sharply contrasting views with regard to the kind of government the English people should have and what that government should do. It soon became clear that ministers could only carry on administration harmoniously and effectively, if they belonged to one single party possessing identical political views. At the same time, it became apparent that the ministers could not function successfully unless they possessed the confidence of Parliament, and had the support and confidence of a majority in the House of Commons. The House of Commons controlled the purse and had by that time become a dominating chamber. It was, therefore, natural to look to the House of Commons for active support in order to ensure stability of the ministry and efficient prosecution of the policies of government.

The Prime Minister. But collective responsibility of the ministry to Parliament could not be ensured in the absence of a leader. Parliament needed leadership and the ministry supplied it. But the ministry itself needed a leader and leadership there was slow in making its formal appearance. For a long time no minister was willing to accept primacy. Even Walpole, who had, ipso facto, assumed that role by dominating ministry and Parliament for more than twenty years, resented being called First or Prime Minister. Nevertheless Walpole actually held the position which later leaders came to hold and though unknown to law till 1937, the office of the Prime Minister "became a recognised and highly honourable term in the English political vocabulary." In course of time, Kings ceased to select all the ministers. They would simply summon the outstanding leader of the majority party in the House of Commons and commission him with the task of selecting his own colleagues.

The Cabinet and the Cabinet System. A rudimentary Cabinet had existed under some of the Stuart Kings. The Privy Council had grown so large by the seventeenth century that Charles II felt that the secret and expeditious affairs of the State could not be entrusted to such an unwieldy body. He, therefore, gathered a group of men, usually known as Cabal,³⁰ with whom he would confer. This group, very naturally, was regarded with suspicion by both the Privy Council and Parliament. The Cabal has, however, very little in common with the Cabinet as we know it today, though it is generally referred to in connection with its origin.

30. The word 'Cabal' was formed by the initial letters from the names, of its first members—Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington and Lauderdale.

William III, as said before, in the beginning of his reign formed a Ministry of Whigs and Tories both. The method was soon discarded because of certain practical difficulties and he began selecting his ministers from one single party. The Whig Junto of 1696 is regarded as the real beginning of the Cabinet system.

William III and Anne themselves presided at the meetings of the Cabinet. George I gave up this practice and designated Walpole to do so as he understood no English. This resulted into the management of the Cabinet passing into the hands of the most powerful man in the Cabinet. He would preside at Cabinet meetings, would control the Cabinet, would report from the Cabinet to the King and from the King to the Cabinet. Being a member of Parliament this minister had also become a link between the Cabinet and Parliament. This is how the position of Prime Minister was evolved. The evolution of the office of Prime Minister is closely connected with the rise of the Cabinet as we understand it today. In Walpole, indeed, we find all characteristics of the present-day Cabinet system. "It was Walpole who first administered the Government in accordance with the rise of the Cabinet as we understand it today. It was Walpole, who first conducted the business of the country in the House of Commons. It was Walpole who in the conduct of business first insisted on the support of his measure of all servants of the Crown who had seats in Parliament. It was under Walpole that the House of Commons became the dominant power in the State and rose in ability and influence as well as in actual power above the House of Lords. And it was Walpole who set the example of quitting his office while he still retained the undiminished affection of his king for the avowed reason that he had ceased to possess the confidence of the House of Commons."

At the same time, there had developed the principle of ministerial responsibility. The principle of ministerial responsibility, that is, a minister is responsible to Parliament for all his public Acts and can, therefore, be brought to book by Parliament, had become one of the accepted principles governing the working of Parliament and the Cabinet. In brief, the whole machinery of the Cabinet system is based upon well defined conventions. By the end of eighteenth century all such conventions had become clear cut and their significance generally understood as we understand them today.

Shifting of Power within Parliament. Important changes also occurred, during this period, in the relative importance of the two Houses of Parliament. Before the Glorious Revolution, the House of Lords exercised unquestioned supremacy and it was a dominating chamber for all intents and purposes. It was only by degrees that the House of Commons was able to win legal equality with the House of Lords chiefly by means of its control over the purse. But during the seventeenth and especially in the eighteenth century, the House of Commons increased in prestige and authority while the House of Lords sank into a secondary position. Several factors are responsible for it. The seventeenth century had settled for ever the right of the Commons to control taxes and appropriations. The Septennial Act of 1716 increased the life of the Commons from three to seven years and hence caused to make a "seat in the elective branch more attractive to able men and ensuring greater experience and a better morale on the part of members." The eighteenth century, also, witnessed the dominating figure of Walpole, who had been all through his political career a member of the House of Commons. We have seen how Walpole actually became the first Prime Minister of England and established all those principles on which hinges the Cabinet system of government today. Walpole, thus, made the House of Commons the recognised centre of legislative and political leadership.

The nineteenth century brought the democratization of the House of Commons by the enactment of a series of Reform Bills (beginning in 1832) which widely extended the right to vote and redistributed parliamentary seats among localities on a fairly equitable basis. All these measures made the House of Commons far more truly representative of the people than the hereditary House of Lords. The reforms in suffrage culminated in the epochal Representation of the People Act of 1918 supplemented by the Act of 1928. Both these Acts brought the House of Commons "to a point where it can easily be numbered among the most democratic parliamentary bodies in the world."

The House of Lords stood still all through this period. It had, in fact, begun to play a secondary role on its own initiative, though it possessed legal parity of powers with the House of Commons. But in the middle of the nineteenth century the peers, once again, became vigorous and adopted an independent attitude. This attitude was deplored by Gladstone, when Gladstone's second Home Rule Bill was rejected by the Lords. In his last speech in Parliament in 1894, the Prime Minister referred to the struggle that had begun between the two Houses and predicted that it would have to go forward to an issue. This issue came in the first decade of the present century when the House of Lords rejected the annual revenue bill. The result was the Parliament Act of 1911 which stripped the Upper Chamber of its right to veto even general legislation passed by the Commons. The Labour Party had always deemed the House of Lords a political anachronism and advocated its complete abolition. It has not been abolished, but in 1949, the Labour Party imposed by law further restrictions on its power of obstructing the passage of ordinary legislation. The Life Peerage Act, 1958, and the Peerage Act, 1963, have made a drastic change in the composition of the Lords; the peers can now disclaim their peerages. Further changes depriving the Lords of their privileged position are awaiting legislation. For more than two centuries, thus, the prestige and the power of the House of Commons have been steadily increasing and today it stands the supreme organ of the British Government.

Other Constitutional Developments. Many other constitutional developments have taken place since 1688. Scotland entered into a parliamentary union with England in 1707. Almost a century later came the Act of Union with Ireland. During the same period the overseas dominions of Great Britain expanded and developed until the British Empire acquired unrivalled proportions in world affairs. Local Government was reorganised and democratized. Similarly, the judicial system was overhauled through the Judicature Acts between 1873 and 1876. The Civil Service was transformed in spirit and method after 1870. And finally, there had been an ever-increasing multiplicity in the functions of the State necessitating creation of new administrative agencies. All these developments have not entailed a catastrophic change in the Constitution. Even the great constitutional changes which changed the character of the British Empire did not produce any radical reconstruction of the government at home. Burma was the first to achieve full independence. India, too, became a Sovereign and Independent Republic. Pakistan, too, had proclaimed herself a Republic. Many more Colonies have since become sovereign States and acquired the status of independent members of the Commonwealth. With the diminution of her territories and a consequent change in the character of the British Empire the basis of governance still remains the same. A very important feature of the British Constitution is its adaptability to the demands of time.

SUGGESTED READINGS

- | | |
|--------------------------------------|---|
| Adams, G.B. and Schy'er R.L. | : Constitutional History of England (1951). |
| Carter, G.M. and others | : The Government of Great Britain (World Press Ltd., Calcutta, 1933), pp. 24-34. |
| Hallam, H. | : Constitutional History of England , (1866), 2 Vols. |
| Jolliffe, J.E.A. | : The Constitutional History of Medieval England . |
| Keir, D.B. | : The Constitutional History of Modern Britain, 1485—1937 (rev. ed., 1946). |
| Keith, A.B. | : The Constitution of England from Queen Victoria to George VI (1940), Vol. II. |
| Mackenzie, K.R. | : The English Parliament . |
| Maitland, F.W. | : Constitutional History of England (1909). |
| Munro, W.B. | : The Governments of Europe (1947), Chap. III. |
| Ogg, F.A. | : English Government and Politics (1936), Chap. I. |
| Ogg, F.A. and Taswell-Langhead, T.P. | : English Constitutional History . |
| Pollard, A.F. | : The Evolution of Parliament . |
| Taylor, H. | : Origin and Growth of the English Constitution (2 Vols.). |
| Zink, H. | : Modern Foreign Governments (1935), Chap. I. |

CHAPTER III

THE KING AND THE CROWN

The King and the "Crown". In early days all the powers of the government were centred in the man who wore the crown, the state-cap of royalty. In the course of history those powers have been almost entirely transferred from the King¹ as a person to a complicated impersonal organization called the "Crown". It does not mean the exit of the monarch from the body politic of the country. The King is still there as head of the State and he wears, as before, the diadem or the crown. Now, as then, the King is the Chief Executive and the supreme legislative power rests with the King-in-Parliament. His Majesty is, as ever, the 'fountain of justice', and the 'fountain of honour'. He is the commander of the military forces of the realm by land, sea and air. Even postmen deliver His Majesty's mails. The King, in short, is still the source of all authority, the 'Great Leviathan' embodying in his own person the sovereignty, the dignity and the unity of the State.

Such are the legal powers of the King. But a legal truth is very often a political untruth in Britain. Down to 1688, the King was an efficient factor in the Constitution. He ruled as well as reigned. Thenceforward it became otherwise. The King still reigns, but he has gradually ceased to rule. And the fact of the Constitution today is that the King personally has nothing to do with any affairs of Government. The actual exercise of powers and rights connected with the office of the King belong to the Crown.

The Crown is not a living, tangible person. It is an artificial contrivance; an abstract concept. Sir Sidney Low calls it "a convenient working hypothesis."² Sir Maurice Amos says, "The crown is a bundle of sovereign powers, prerogatives and rights—a legal idea."³ Historically, the rights and powers of the Crown are the rights and powers of the King. Legally, this is still in general the case. But Parliament has now enchained the King and the Constitution requires these powers and rights to be exercised, in substance, not by the King personally. They are exercised in the King's name, as the personal bearer of the powers and rights comprised in the Crown, by ministers who derive their authority from Parliament and are solely responsible to Parliament. This somewhat intangible synthesis of authority is what we call the Crown. The Crown is, thus, "a subtle association" of King, Ministers and Parliament and all three combined make an abstract concept of supreme authority. The King is its physical embodiment whereas Ministry, a creature of Parliament, is its "most concrete visible" embodiment.

1. The word 'King' is here used as a term common to either sex. But the Head of the State is now a Queen.

2. Sidney Low, Government of England, p. 255.

3. Maurice Amos, The English Constitution, op. cit., p. 88.

There are two main stages which stand conspicuous in the transfer of powers from the King as a person to the Crown as an institution. The first is what we may call the "institutionalizing" of the King. As said earlier, kingship in Anglo-Saxon days was elective. Succession to the throne was not determined by hereditary principle. Every monarch reigned personally and independently of his predecessors and, consequently, when a King died there was an "interregnum" or break in government till another was established by a new King. After William, Duke of Normandy came to the English throne in 1066, but essentially in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries title to the throne became hereditary and the next in line succeeded to the rights and privileges connected with royalty.⁴ The result was the emergence of the institution of the kingship or the monarchy; a continuous political system which remained uninterrupted by the coming and going of individual monarchs.

A vital distinction was, in this way, made in the person and the office of the King. The distinction is now reflected in the maxim of the British Constitution: "The King is dead; long live the King." This announcement made at the time of the Royal demise; means in the words of Blackstone, "Henry, Edward or George may die, but the King survives them all", that is, the King as a natural person may die, but long live the office (the Crown) which one monarch passes on to another. The Crown, as an institution, never dies; it is permanent. There is no interregnum between the death of one Sovereign and the accession of another. Immediately on the death of his or her predecessor the new Sovereign is proclaimed at an Accession Council.

The distinction between the King as an individual and the King as an institution paved the way for the transfer of political functions from a personality to an institution and as the chance would have it, it began with King John. The pace was slow and the process was not fully complete till the middle of the nineteenth century. But the constitutional struggles of the seventeenth century transferred final authority from the King to Parliament and thereafter led by logical evolution to government by Ministers responsible to Parliament. The whole of this process has been beautifully explained in a fairy tale and it runs, "once upon a time there was a king who was very important and who did very big and very important things. He owned a nice shiny crown, which he would wear on specially grand occasion, but most of the time he kept it on a red velvet cushion. Then somebody made a Magic. The Crown was carefully stored in the Tower; the King moved over to the cushion and was transformed into a special kind of Crown with a capital letter;The name given to the Magic is the Constitutional Development." And the course of the constitutional development, during the past eight centuries, had been that most of the functions which were at one time performed by the King are now exercised on the advice of Ministers, though still in the King's name. George Ponsonby, speaking in the House of Commons (June 11, 1812), said that it is an essential principle of the Constitution "that the Sovereign shall be irresponsible, that the servants of the Crown shall be alone responsible." When a King speaks on political questions, he always speaks as the mouthpiece of his Ministry. The Duke of Windsor, the former King Edward VIII, began the radio address on the day after his abdication with these words: "At long last I am able to say a few words of my own. I have never wanted to withhold anything, but until now it has not constitutionally been possible for me to speak."⁵

4. King John was the first English King who styled himself Rex Angliæ (King of England) and not Rex Anglorum (King of the English) and it so happened that he was the first English King to be succeeded by his eldest son when that son was still a boy.

To sum up, the King is a natural person and he wears the Crown, the state-cap of royalty. But when we use a capital letter in writing the word Crown, it stands for the Kingship as an institution. The distinction between the King and the Crown, thus, becomes obvious. Broadly speaking, it is two-fold. First, the King is a person, the Crown is an institution. The King as a person dies or may abdicate or may even be dethroned whereas the Crown as an institution is permanent; it is neither subject to death nor abdication nor dethronement. This has been succinctly explained by Kerr. He says, "Nobody toasts the Crown or prays God to save it."⁶ Secondly the King does not exercise the powers which belong to the Crown on his own initiative and authority. They are exercised by the King at the behest of those who exercise the will of the people, i.e., Ministers responsible to Parliament. The King, Ministers and Parliament make a synthesis of supreme authority and it is called the Crown. The Crown is the keystone of the country's constitutional structure.

Title and Succession to the Crown. The events of 1688-89 finally established the supremacy of Parliament and determined that the Sovereign's right to rule rested upon the consent of the governed as expressed through Parliament. The basic Act in the matter of title to the Crown is the Act of Settlement passed by Parliament in 1701. It provided that the Crown shall be hereditary in the line of the Princess Sophia of Hanover,⁷ so long as it remained Protestant.⁸ The succession is now vested in the House of Windsor, a name adopted during World War I to relieve the House of Hanover of any suggestion of German connections. The principle of heredity is determined by the rule of primogeniture at Common Law. The basic rules are that an elder line is preferred to a younger and that, in the same line, a male is preferred to a female. If there are no sons, the daughters in order of their seniority succeed to the Throne. In any event the heirs must be Protestants. If all Protestant heirs are extinct or if there be no heir within the prescribed degrees

5. The Duke of Windsor, A King's Story (1951), p. 411.

6. Kerr, W.G., European Governments and their Backgrounds.

7. Sophia, the grand-daughter of James I, was the widow of the ruler of one of the smaller German States, the Electorate of Hanover.

8. The Act was passed in the reign of William III after the death of his wife, Queen Mary. It anticipated that neither William nor his cousin and sister-in-law, who became Queen Anne, might have children. The Act, accordingly, provided that in the event of such default of issue, "the Crown and regal government...., with the royal state and dignity....and all honours, styles, titles, royalties, prerogatives, powers, jurisdiction and authorities to the same belonging and appertaining, shall be, remain and continue to the....most excellent princess Sophia and the heirs of her body, being Protestants...." On the death of Queen Anne in 1714, Sophia's son, the King of Hanover, became King of Great Britain with the name of George I.

of relationship to succeed, Parliament is competent to bestow the Crown on another family and thereby start a new dynasty. But succession cannot now be altered, under a provision of the Statute of Westminster, 1931, except by common consent of the member nations of the Commonwealth which owe allegiance to the Crown.⁹

The Royal Marriages Act of 1872 provides that until the age of twenty-five, the consent of the King is necessary to a marriage that might affect the succession to the Throne. After twenty-five no consent is required except a year's notice to the Privy Council. But Parliament may disapprove such a marriage. The issue arose with respect to the possibility of a marriage between Princess Margaret, sister of Queen Elizabeth, and a commoner, Peter Townsend, who had divorced his wife. The Princess finally gave up the idea of marriage. When the heir to the throne is a minor (under 18 years of age) or whenever the reigning sovereign becomes physically or mentally incapacitated a regency is set up in conformity with the terms of the Regency Acts passed by Parliament. The latest of these Acts, the Regency Act, 1953, laid down that the first potential regent should be the Duke of Edinburgh and thereafter the Princess Margaret and then those in succession to the Throne who are of age. In the event of the Sovereign's partial incapacity or absence abroad, provision is made for the appointment of Counsellors of State (generally speaking, the wife or husband of the Sovereign, and the four adult persons next in succession to the Crown)¹⁰ to whom the Sovereign may delegate by Letters Patent certain royal functions. But Counsellors of State may not, for instance, dissolve Parliament except on the express instructions of the Sovereign, nor create peers.

The title of Her present Majesty Queen Elizabeth II depends on the Abdication Act, 1936. King Edward VIII abdicated in 1936 on the issue of His Majesty's marriage with Mrs. Simpson.¹¹ The Duke of York, then, next in succession to the throne, succeeded thereto as George VI.¹² George VI had no son and his elder daughter, Princess Elizabeth, became Queen in 1952, upon the death of her father.

Royal privileges and immunities. The Sovereign enjoys numerous

9. The Preamble to the Statute of Westminster, 1931, provides that "it would be in accord with the established constitutional position of all the members of the Commonwealth in relation to one another that any alteration in the law touching the succession to the throne or the Royal Style and Titles shall hereafter require the assent as well of the Parliaments of all the Dominions as of Parliament of the United Kingdom."

10. The Regency Act, 1953, provided that Queen Elizabeth, the Queen Mother, should be added to the persons to whom royal functions may be delegated as Counsellors of State.

11. Mrs. Simpson, a lady of United States origin, became a British subject by a second marriage after she had obtained a divorce from her American husband. Edward VIII, who was a bachelor till then, desired to marry Mrs. Simpson and the lady lodged a petition for divorce from her second husband. The Cabinet took exception to this marriage and eventually on December 10, 1936, the King executed an instrument of abdication renouncing the throne for himself and his descendants.

12. The Abdication Act was duly assented to by Parliaments of the Commonwealth countries, thus, fulfilling the requirements of the Statute of Westminster, 1931.

personal privileges and immunities. He may acquire, hold and dispose of property of all kind¹³ precisely in the same manner as any private citizen. But the King is above law. He cannot be called to account for his private conduct in any court of law or by any legal process, not even, as Dicey humorously observed, if he were to shoot his own Prime Minister. He is exempt from arrest. He cannot be made a defendant in a lawsuit, his goods cannot be seized by officers of law in default of any kind of payment, and no judicial processes can be served against him so long as a palace remains a royal residence.

The King receives a large annual grant from the State treasury. This grant is made available by Parliament in the form of an appropriation for the Civil List. The Civil List is granted by an Act of Parliament to the Sovereign for the duration of his or her reign and for a period of six months afterwards. The yearly Civil List allowed to the present Queen is £475,400. It is divided thus: privy purse £60,000, household salaries £185,000, household expenses £121,800, alms, etc., £13,200, and future contingencies £95,000. £40,000 are the annual grant of the Duke of Edinburgh. One informed source estimated that the Monarchy costs the nation about £2,000,000 per year.

POWERS OF THE CROWN

Powers of the Crown. The powers of the Crown are those which belong to the office of the King or to the Kingship as an impersonal institution. These powers, let it be repeated once again, are never exercised by the Monarch himself. They are exercised in the King's name by Ministers who derive their authority from Parliament and are responsible to Parliament for the use they make of these powers. As the Crown powers are not the King's personal powers, they may be described as nominal powers of the King as distinct from his actual powers. The nation is governed by Ministers who, acting in his name, exercise the nominal powers of the King. So extensive is the authority of the Crown that it embraces all fields and functions of government and yet it is still growing. The province of the State, during recent years, has increased considerably and keeping pace with these political developments, the activities and functions of Government, too, have enormously expanded. This means fresh duties of direction and control by the Government and consequently augmentation of powers of the Crown. Lowell, writing in the first decade of the present century, observed, "All told the executive authority of the Crown is in the eye of law, very wide, far wider than that of the Chief Magistrate in many countries, and well-nigh as extensive as that now possessed by the monarch in any government, not an absolute despotism; and although the Crown has no inherent legislative power except in conjunction with Parliament, it has been given by statute, very large powers of subordinate legislation."¹⁴ The powers of the Executive,

13. Queen Victoria handed down more than £2,000,000 and the personal fortune of the Royal Family is not diminished by death duties. In addition there are valuable Royal collections of jewellery, stamps and pictures. Estimates as to the total value of the Royal Family's personal wealth vary from £10,000,000 to £60,000,000. Anthony Simpson, The Anatomy of Britain Today, p. 22. Also refer to Martin, K., The Crown and the Establishment, p. 134.

14. Lowell, A.L., The Government of England, op. cit., Vol. I, p. 26.

under any system of Government, cannot be rigidly divided into water-tight compartments. Under the Parliamentary system of Government, as obtainable in Britain, Ministers of the Crown are the real functionaries. There is no divorce between the Executive and the Legislature. The Crown, has, therefore, as much to do with legislation as with the executive and administrative matters. It has, also, to do something with justice. The Crown, thus, forms a part of the Executive, Legislative and Judicial mechanism. It is indeed, the keystone of the country's constitutional structure. It may apparently seem paradoxical, although it is logical to the nature of the British Constitution "that the powers of the Crown have expanded as democracy has grown."¹⁵

Sources of Powers. The powers possessed by the Crown are derived from two sources: prerogatives and statutes. Statutory powers of the Crown refer to those duties which have been assigned to the Executive authorities by Acts of Parliament. They include not only the greater part of powers under which the different departments of the Government function, but also the powers by which Whitehall exercises control over the local government authorities and other bodies distinct from the Crown. The powers of the Crown under this head are various, wide, and, as said before, growing. Acts of Parliament have, really, become a prolific source of Crown power, particularly with the development of the practice of delegating legislative powers to the Executive.

The powers and privileges which the Crown derives from the Common Law constitute the prerogative. Dicey defines it as "the residue of discretionary or arbitrary authority which at any time, is legally left in the hands of the Crown."¹⁶ The prerogative was in origin the sum of the rights ascribed to the King as a feudal overlord and it continued to be the basis of authority till parliamentary control of public affairs became an established fact. The seventeenth century was one continuous struggle between the use of prerogative powers by the person of the King and the determined attempt of Parliament to control such powers either by Statute or by Ministers responsible to Parliament. Parliament emerged victorious out of this struggle and the King, to the most part, was deprived of the prerogative powers which inhered in his person. Some were abrogated by Statutes,¹⁷ some have been lost by disuse, and the residue which remain have been inherited by the Crown. It is impossible to draw a list of the prerogatives of the Crown. The existence and limits of some raise difficulties of constitutional law. But the undoubted prerogatives include the summoning of Parliament, declaration of war or neutrality, ratification of treaties, appointment to offices, to dismiss the servants of the Crown, and to regulate the conditions of their service, and the power to pardon offenders.

The expression prerogative is, then, used to refer to Crown's discretionary authority, that is, what the King or his servants can do without the authority of an Act of Parliament. It provides a convenient mechanism of various important activities of Government. Although the prerogative has no statutory authority, yet it is acknowledged by courts. Most of the prerogative powers derive authority from Common Law and the rules of Common Law form part of the Law of the Constitution in Britain. It may, also, be added that some prerogative powers have been conferred upon the Crown by statute¹⁸ and it is within the competence of the courts to determine whether an Act of Parliament is within the prerogative or to what extent royal power of prerogative has been abridged or abolished by Statute.¹⁹ In brief, the Crown possesses the prerogative powers that still inhere in the Monarch, and those powers conferred by Parliamentary legislation, in total constitute a vast reservoir of authority.

15. Ogg and Zink, Modern Foreign Governments, op. cit., p. 51.

16. Dicey, A.V., Law of the Constitution, p. 424.

17. Refer to the clauses of the Bill of Rights forbidding, suspending or dispensing with laws; the Act of Settlement, and various other Acts of Parliament of the like nature.

EXECUTIVE POWERS OF THE CROWN

The Crown as Executive. The Executive powers of the Crown are so numerous that only some of the most important can be mentioned here. They have increased in the past, are increasing in our own time and must continue to increase so long as the functions of the modern governments continue to expand. The Crown is the supreme Executive head and it must, as such, see that all national laws are duly observed and enforced. It directs the work of the administrative branches and national services; collects and expends, according to law, national revenues; appoints all higher executive and administrative officers, judges, bishops and the officers of the army, navy, and air force, regulates the conditions of services; and suspends and removes these officers, except judges,²⁰ and other employees of government from service. The Crown holds the supreme command over the armed establishments. The Crown supervises, and in some instances directs, the work of local government especially that of boroughs and counties. The officers of local government and other bodies, like the British Broadcasting Corporation, are not the officers of the Crown. No doubt, these bodies are created by the Acts of Parliament, but they do not represent the Crown. The Crown simply exercises supervisory functions over them. Its right to control and direction is limited to certain specified matters only.

The modern tendency is to assign powers to Ministers, or to civil servants, "without any necessity of royal intervention."²¹ The exercise of the prerogative of mercy, for example, is now primarily a matter for the Home Secretary, and the Royal share is mainly formal. In the same way, the practice of delegated legislation vests powers in the Ministers, rather than in the King-in-Council as originally the practice was, to make rules, regulations, and orders.

Conduct of Foreign relations. The Crown conducts the foreign relations of Great Britain with other countries; sends and receives ambassadors

18. For example, in 1876, the Appellate Jurisdiction Act gave the Crown the power to create four judicial life peerages, the number has since been increased.

19. Refer, for example, to the case of Wilts United Dairies (1921).

20. Judges can be removed only on joint address by the two Houses of Parliament. See Infra.

21. Keith, A.B. The Constitution of England from Queen Victoria to George VI, Vol. I, pp. 49-50.

or other diplomatic agents, and all foreign negotiations are carried on in the name of the Crown. The declaration of war and making of peace are the prerogative of the Crown. The Crown is also the treaty-making authority, and all international agreements are made in its name. Treaties concluded by the Crown are not subject to ratification by Parliament unless it is specifically conditioned upon parliamentary approval, or anything else is involved in it, like the cession of territory, payment of money, changes in the laws of the land, that require the assent of Parliament in order to make it valid. But "any treaty of high moral import", as the Locarno Treaty of 1925, is essentially laid before the two Houses of Parliament.

When the Treaty of Versailles was submitted to Parliament in 1919 for its approval, a section of the people, who were strongly wedded to the principle of democratic control over foreign relations, had hoped that in future no treaty would be made without parliamentary assent. Labour leaders, too, had long pleaded for it. But the Labour Governments of Ramsay MacDonald and C.R. Attlee never attempted it. Perhaps, they did not find such a policy feasible and treaties continued to be negotiated and ratified by action of the Crown alone.

It is true that no government can venture to declare a war unless there is assurance that Parliament will supply the funds to carry it to a successful end. But Parliament itself has no authority to declare a war. This power belongs exclusively to the Crown. Both in 1914 and 1939, the Ministers made the decisions and in the name of the Crown they led the country to war. And both the times the declaration of war took the form of a Royal Proclamation authorized by Order-in-Council. The question of Parliament's expressing disapproval of the Government's policy, or its refusal to grant supplies does not at all arise. So long as the Ministry can command a stable majority in Parliament, its support is ipso facto.

LEGISLATIVE POWERS OF THE CROWN

The powers of the Crown are mainly, though not exclusively, Executive. In the United States of America, the Executive, Legislative and Judicial functions are clearly defined among three separate departments, although the authors of the Constitution could not maintain the purity of the doctrine of the Separation of Powers when they came to details. In the United Kingdom little or no distinction is given to this doctrine of Separation of Powers. The law-making function is vested in the King-in-Parliament. Every Statute declares itself to have been enacted "by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons in Parliament assembled and by the authority of the same," and here, as everywhere else, the King has yielded his power to the Crown. The Crown is, therefore, an integral part of the national Legislature and its assent is essential to the enactment of laws.

The Ministers of the Crown, who constitute the country's real Executive, are members of Parliament as well. They control and guide the work of Parliament and determine how conveniently it can be transacted. The Crown, accordingly, summons, prorogues, and dissolves Parliament. When a new Parliament meets it is usually greeted by the Monarch in a Speech from the Throne, which is usually delivered by the King or Queen in person from the Throne in the House of Lords with the Commons present. The Speech from the Throne outlines the legislative programme of the Crown and expresses the views and opinions of Government on various matters of national and international importance. But the Speech from the Throne is not the King's or Queen's speech. It is the Government's speech. It is put in the hand of the Monarch to be read. "The Monarch can, however, talk to the Prime Minister about it and sometimes minor amendments are suggested because it may be felt that the revised language suits the Monarch better than the official language which is set out. But alterations about policy are not made. That is for the Government responsible to Parliament, and everybody knows it."²²

Veto power. As has just been said, the Royal assent is essential to the validity of laws passed by Parliament. It means that the King may refuse assent to, or veto, any law passed by Parliament. But the veto power has never been exercised since 1703. It has become obsolete. Disraeli in 1852, however, considered that the King's right to refuse assent to legislation still existed and was not an "empty form." But no Monarch exercised this power. The passing of the Parliament Act, 1911, revived the issue and suggestions were made in 1913 that the King could refuse his assent to the Irish Home Rule Bill. Bonar Law asserted that the King's veto was "dead" only so long as the House of Lords was not liable to be overriden by the House of Commons, and as the Home Rule Bill was being put through Parliament under the Parliament Act of 1911, the King could exercise his "right of refusing assent to matters not sufficiently considered by the people which the Lords had been supposed to exercise."²³

George V, as Jennings points out, was "himself inclined to accept the same idea," and insisted upon an appeal to the country.²⁴ Lord Esher, who was advising the King, did not agree with this viewpoint and insisted that it would be dangerous for the Monarch to refuse to accept the advice of Ministers. Sir William Harcourt, too, was of the same opinion and in a personal interview with the King insisted that if there were to be general election, an appeal to the electorate would not be made on the issue of Home Rule. The sole question would be—"Is the country governed by the King or by the people? and that would mean an attack on the person of the King."²⁵

Supposing some headstrong King refuses assent to a Bill passed by Parliament ignoring the advice of his Ministers, then, what would happen? There is no reason to believe that such a contingency would ever happen in Britain, but if it ever does, the Ministry would forthwith resign. In that case, there would be two alternatives before the King. One, to summon the Leader of the Opposition and commission him to form the Ministry. The House of Commons would refuse to support such a Ministry, because it would be tantamount to approving the action of the King and

22. Lord Morrison, British Parliamentary Democracy, pp. 60-61.

23. Keith, A.B., The Government of England from Queen Victoria to George VI, Vol. I, p. 358.

24. Jennings, W.I., Cabinet Government, op. cit., p. 369.

25. Esher Papers III, p. 132. As quoted in Jennings' Cabinet Government, op. cit., p. 370.

the Government ousted formed the majority in the House. So there would be no other option for the King, but to dissolve Parliament and order new elections. "That would be a dangerous step," as Munro says, "for any King to take, because an adverse decision at the polls would inevitably suggest his abdication."²⁶ This is the verdict of British history. So long as the Ministry has a majority in Parliament, and so long as Parliament remains representative of the people, it carries with it the verdict of the people. There is, under the circumstances, no need for the exercise of the veto. This is exactly what Asquith submitted to George V in a Memorandum on the controversy of 1913. The Prime Minister asserted, "We have now a well established tradition of 200 years, that, in the last resort, the occupant of the Throne accepts and acts upon the advice of his ministers...."²⁷ This point is abundantly clarified by the Duke of Windsor, the former King Edward VIII. He says, "Whenever the Prime Minister 'advises' the King he is using a respectful form of words to express the will and decision of the Government. The King is virtually bound to accept such 'advice'. Furthermore, he cannot seek 'advice' elsewhere. However, if, in the exercise of his undoubted powers, he chooses not to accept the 'advice' thus formally tendered, then his Ministers resign, and he must try to form a new Government from the Opposition."²⁸ Asquith also pointed out to the King in 1913 that "the veto could be exercised only by the dismissal of the Ministry, for no Government would accept a refusal to assent to a Bill without resigning."²⁹

The King has now ceased to give assent to Bills personally. The assent is given by a Royal Commission appointed by the Crown under the Royal Sign Manual. The Lord Chancellor or Senior Commissioner simply says that His Majesty not having seen fit to be personally present upon this occasion, has appointed a Royal Commission and that they shall indicate the Royal Assent has been given to the Bills as good and proper Acts of Parliament. The assent to Bills is, therefore, only a picturesque formality.

Orders-in-Council. The Crown, acting alone, have the power to issue measures authorising certain executive actions. The Orders-in-Council, as they are known, are issued by the King and Privy Council. There are two varieties of Orders-in-Council. First, those which are merely administrative rules and govern the various branches of government in their routine business. Others are promulgated only by virtue of authority expressly granted by Parliament and are frequently called statutory orders. Such orders have actually the force of law, because they are based upon the authority of Parliament. This kind of "subordinate legislation" is now of steadily increasing importance and the subject is dealt with more fully at its appropriate place.

JUDICIAL POWERS OF THE CROWN

The King is still described as the 'fountain of justice' and this historic

26. Munro, W.B., The Governments of Europe, op. cit., p. 63.

27. Spender, J.A., Life of Lord Oxford and Asquith, Vol. II, pp. 29-31.

28. A King's Story, op. cit., p. 343.

29. Spender, J.A., Life of Lord Oxford and Asquith, Vol. II, pp. 29-31. Asquith's Memorandum.

expression reflects that the King's conscience spoke the last word in the administration of justice. This is not the case now. The principle of the independence of Judiciary, as it prevails in Britain, has freed for all practical purposes, the judges and courts from control at the hands of the Executive. And yet the courts are not "entirely outside the Crown's wide-sweeping orbit." Judges, including the Justices of Peace in the counties and boroughs, are appointed by the Crown. The Lord Chancellor, a member of the Cabinet, exercises general judicial supervision. All issues which come before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council are decided by the Crown. Finally, the Crown exercises the prerogative of mercy and may grant pardon to persons convicted of criminal offences. This is done by the Home Secretary.

"THE KING CAN DO NO WRONG"

Such, in brief, are the powers of the Crown. The Crown, no doubt, is closely associated with the person of the King, but the King in person is for the most part the principal formal element of the State and its Executive. The actual or potential element is the Crown. The position of the King has been cogently summed up by Lowell. He says, "According to the early theory of the Constitution the ministers were the counselors of the King. It was for them to advise and for him to decide. Now the parts are almost reversed. The King is consulted, but the ministers decide." In many cases the Monarch may personally know little what they decide or even if he knows, he may have little liking for them, although the Crown powers are exercised in his name. His Majesty's servants have become His Majesty's masters.

There are two important principles on which the constitutional structure rests in Britain. First, the Monarch may not perform any public act involving the exercise of discretionary powers, except on advice of the Ministers. Second, for every Act performed in the name of the Monarch the Ministers are responsible to Parliament, and hence the meaning of the pregnant phrase, 'The King can do no wrong.' That is to say, the King can do nothing right or wrong, of a discretionary nature and having legal effect. Whatever may be the personal views of the Monarch, he must, as a constitutional Monarch, give way to his Ministers, feeling that they have behind them a majority of the people's representatives and they can be called upon to account for their acts, singly or collectively, by Parliament.³⁰ This is now a well established tradition of nearly three hundred years. Conventions are an integral part of the Constitution and every King of Britain at the time of coronation swears to maintain the Constitution and uphold constitutional Monarchy.

Nor can any Minister plead the orders of the King in defence of a

30. Back in the days of Charles II one of the courtiers wrote on the door of the Royal bedchamber:

"Here lies a Great and Mighty King,

Whose Promise none relies on:

He never said a Foolish Thing,

Nor ever did a wise one."

"Very true," retorted the King, "because while my words are my own, my acts are my ministers'."

wrongful act or for an error of omission and commission. Thomas Osborne, Earl of Danby,³¹ was impeached in 1679 of "high treason, and diverse high crimes and misdemeanours." Danby's plea was that whatever he had done was by order of the King, and that the King could do no wrong. He even produced, at the time of his impeachment, the Royal pardon. Parliament held Danby's plea illegal and void.³² It was, thus, definitely laid down that the Ministers cannot plead the command of the King to justify an illegal and unconstitutional Act, and thereby shield themselves behind the legal immunities of the occupant of the Throne.

THE JUSTIFICATION OF MONARCHY

The almost wholly formal position of the King in the British system of government and the fact that conventions prevent him from exercising the powers that he legally possess, raises the question why the English Kingship should not be abolished? To some people Monarchy does not appear to be worth its costs the nation. To a few more it appears a political anachronism. But the real fact is that the great mass of the British people are not willing to see Kingship disappear. The seventies of the last century witnessed a strong republican movement.³³ It even, caused sensation, when persons like Sir Charles Dilke joined its ranks,³⁴ and Chamberlain could predict that the "Republic must come and at the rate at which we are now moving it will come in our generation."³⁵ Yet a few years later the movement had collapsed, "and Queen Victoria was able to impose a public recantation upon Dilke before accepting him as a Cabinet minister."

Since then, Monarchy in Britain has been more popularly acclaimed and it is now generally accepted by all political views without discussion.³⁶ "Monarchy, to put it bluntly," writes Laski, "has been sold to democracy as the symbol of itself, and so nearly universal has been the

31. Danby succeeded Clifford as Lord High Treasurer and consequently he had become virtually the first minister of the Crown.

32. Resolution concerning the Royal Pardon in Bar of Danby's Impeachment, Select Documents of English Constitutional History, op. cit., p. 439.

33. A Republican demonstration was held in Trafalgar Square in September 1870 and early in 1871, a Republican Club was formed in London with Charles Bradlaugh as its first President. While speaking at its inauguration Bradlaugh said that "the heir-apparent to the throne has neither the intelligence, nor the virtue, nor the sobriety, nor the high sense of honour, which might entitle him to take a front rank in this Great Nation."

34. At a crowded meeting at Newcastle, Dilke attacked on the excessive cost of the Crown. He asserted, "If you can show me a fair chance that a republic here will be free from the political corruption that hangs about the monarchy, I say, for my part, and I believe that the middle classes in general will say—let it come."

35. Among other sympathisers of the movement the notable were Bright, Odger the Trade Unionist, Mundella, M.P. for Sheffield, and John Morley.

36. There are even now some people who would prefer in principle that Britain were a republic. A few members of Parliament desired its substitution after the abdication of Edward VIII. "Had Edward VIII not abdicated in 1936", writes R.M. Punnett, "there might have been an evolution of Monarchy into a form more akin to the Scandinavian model but George VI and Elizabeth II have sought to preserve much of the Monarchy's remoteness and mystique." British Government and Politics, p. 254.

chorus of eulogy which has accompanied the process of the sale that the rare voices of dissent have hardly been heard. It is not without significance that the official newspapers of the Trade Union Congress devote more space, of news and pictures, to the royal family than does any of its rivals.³⁷ Although the cost of the Crown in Britain and elsewhere reveals a glaring disparity,³⁸ yet a little suggestion is made that the people fail to get "their money's worth." Ceremony, pomp, and ritual connected with royalty involve, no doubt, a certain amount of lavishness and many people contrast this display with the poverty and distress of a great mass of the people. But to raise such a question, says Gooch, is not necessarily to resolve it against Kingship.³⁹ "Democratic government", according to Jennings, "is not merely a matter of cold reason and prosaic policies. There must be some display of colour, and there is nothing more vivid than royal purple and imperial scarlet."⁴⁰ The Kingship, therefore, in the words of Winston Churchill, "is the most deeply founded and dearly cherished by the whole association of our peoples."⁴¹ Lord Attlee, who had been active in the Socialist movement for more than half a century, claimed that during that period he had taken part in bringing about a number of changes in British society by helping to abolish some old things, such as the Poor Laws, but "there is one feature of it which I have never felt any urge to abolish and that is the monarchy. I have never been a republican even in theory, and certainly not in practice."⁴²

This patriotic admiration of the mass of the Sovereign's subjects for Monarchy is due to somewhat complex considerations of history, of human motives and sentiments, and of utility. Even Lord Altrincham, the Conservative peer who criticised the Queen and the Court in an article published in The National and English Review, the magazine he edits, said on television on August 6, 1957, that he regretted any impression that he "was hostile to the Queen or trying to attack her in a personal way or be beastly about it." Lord Altrincham's criticism of Queen Elizabeth aroused nation-wide controversy. He had described the Queen's speaking as a "pain in the neck" and her utterances as those of a "priggish school-girl," and called for a "truly classless Commonwealth Court" to replace her present entourage of "people of the tweedy sort." The Reynold News, a Left-wing Sunday newspaper, supported the criticism of the young Peer because he "has said aloud what many people are thinking: Buckingham Palace is not in tune with the Britain of 1957."⁴³ But the general mass of the people were angry with Lord Altrincham and many suggested that he should be shot. Lord Altrincham was actually slapped as he left the television studio. The man, who struck him, said, "That's

37. Laski H.J., Parliamentary Government in England, p. 392.

38. Refer to Greaves, H.R.G., The British Constitution, pp. 83-84. See also Punnett, R.M., British Government and Politics, pp. 256-57.

39. The Government of England, op. cit., p. 10.

40. Jennings, W.I., The British Constitution, p. 116.

41. Broadcast Speech at the death of George VI in early 1952.

42. Observer, Attlee on Monarchy.

43. As reported in The Tribune, Ambala Cantt., August 6, 1957.

for insulting the Queen."⁴⁴ Lord Morrison said, "you get funny people breaking out now and again like Lord Altrincham, but nobody would know him if he was not a Lord; he is a Lord only because he is the son of his father. But he says funny things. They get him headlines in newspapers and even get him on television, which pleases him no end. But don't worry about these jokers."⁴⁵ The general body of the British people support the British Monarchy and Morrison cited an instance which he could never forget. "I shall never forget", said Morrison, "seeing, at the time of the Coronation of King George VI, a banner going right across the street of an East End slum in London which said, 'Lousy but loyal.' And I think that was one of the greatest compliments that has ever been paid to the British Royal Family."⁴⁶ As long as the Monarch "behaves constitutionally," concludes Morrison, the Labour Peer, "as I have every expectation, I think it will remain a popular institution in my country."⁴⁷

FUNCTIONS OF THE MONARCHY

According to Jennings the functions of the Monarchy may be said to be four.⁴⁸ First, appearing in an impersonal fashion as the Crown, the Monarch's name is the cement that binds the Constitution. Secondly, the Monarch similarly binds the units of Commonwealth. Thirdly, there are political functions of the highest importance which the Monarch performs personally. Fourthly, the Monarch is a social figure exercising important functions outside the political sphere. We begin the elaboration of these functions first taking the personal functions of the Monarch, though it upsets the order in which Jennings enumerates them.

Personal authority of the King. In the actual conduct of the work of the Government the Monarch still personally performs certain specific acts and the most important of these is that the Kings must make certain that he has a Government in the United Kingdom. The Government is headed by the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister selects his own team to make a Government. The King, thus, chooses a Prime Minister and the latter then prepares a list of Ministers and submits it to the King for his approval. But, when choosing the Prime Minister, the King must remember that a Ministry must have the support of a majority of the House of Commons otherwise it will be unable to govern.

Now-a-days, the choice of such a person who is to be the Prime Minister and can lead the majority in the House of Commons is obvious. The leader of the majority party in the House of Commons is summoned and commissioned to form Government. "The essential point", writes Herbert Morrison, "is that the new Prime Minister should be able to command a majority in the House of Commons, and not merely be able to form a government, for the government cannot live without a parliamentary majority." If the Government is defeated on a hostile vote in 44. As reported in the Hindustan Times, New Delhi, August 9, 1957.

45. Lord Morrison, British Parliamentary Democracy, p. 5.

46. Ibid.

47. Ibid.

48. Jennings, Ivor. The Queen's Government, p. 30.

the House of Commons, the Sovereign summons the Leader of the Opposition and commissions him to form a new Government. Even if the Prime Minister dies in office the choice of his successor can be reasonably obvious, though careful consideration would be given to the likelihood of the person appointed being acceptable to a majority in the House of Commons. Since Churchill's War Government has emerged the office of the Deputy Prime Minister, though it has not been constitutionally recognised.⁴⁹ When the Prime Minister dies in office the Deputy Prime Minister might be specially considered by the Sovereign, "though there would be no obligation to do so, especially as I gather," says Herbert Morrison, "that the Sovereign does recognise such an office."

But if no party commands a real majority, or when a Prime Minister retires and when the majority party has not yet designated its leader, the choice of the Prime Minister is not easy. The Sovereign makes, in such a case, a personal decision as to whom to send for, although he or she is always careful to follow that course which is least likely to arouse criticism. "The Sovereign's choice in these conditions," says Morrison, "has much constitutional significance. The choice may be a very delicate one and involve embarrassing complications. The Sovereign would, of course, take all relevant considerations into account, and be at great pains not only to be constitutionally correct, but make every effort to see that the correctness is likely to be generally recognised."⁵⁰ It is the Sovereign's undoubted right to seek or not to seek the advice of the outgoing Prime Minister and is also free to receive counsel and advice from such Privy Councillors whom the Monarch may wish to consult. When the Conservative Prime Minister, Bonar Law, resigned because of ill-health on May 20, 1923, King George V passed over the claims to succession of Sir Austen Chamberlain and Lord Curzon and sent for Stanley Baldwin to form a government.⁵¹ In 1924, no party had a clear majority in the House of Commons. George V sent for Ramsay MacDonald, and not Mr. Asquith, to form the Government, although the Labour Party had behind it only about one-third of the members of the House. A minority Labour Government under MacDonald, dependent on Liberal votes, took office again in 1929. The events of 1931 or "the crisis of 1931", as Herbert Morrison describes, were more complicated and the act of George V in commissioning Ramsay MacDonald to head the National Government has been characterised by Professor Laski "as much the personal choice of George V as Lord Bute was the personal choice of George III."⁵² "King George V was, I feel sure," writes Herbert Morrison, "actuated by sincere motives. And

49. A major reconstruction by Harold Macmillan was announced on 13th, 16th and 18th July 1962. The new post of first Secretary of State was specially created for Mr. R.A. Butler, who would, according to the announcement, "act as Deputy Prime Minister." But Butler did not step into the office of the Prime Minister when Macmillan resigned.

50. Herbert Morrison, Government and Parliament, p. 77.

51. Lord Curzon's peerage was advanced as a disqualification in his case. But, according to L.S. Amery, a minister of the time, "the final decision was to the best of my belief, made mainly on the issue of...personal acceptability....If a constitutional precedent was created, it was largely as the ex-post facto cover for a decision taken on other grounds." L.S. Amery, Thoughts on the Constitution, p. 22.

52. Laski, H., Parliamentary Government in England, op. cit., p. 408.

certainly the financial and economic situation of the country was serious. Nevertheless, I think his judgment was at fault."⁵³ The King would "have been wise", he adds, "to have ascertained what was likely to happen by inquiry of one or more Labour Privy Councillors likely to know. He might have asked the Prime Minister to ascertain the view of the Labour Cabinet; but no action was taken to ascertain the general Labour view."⁵⁴ Morrison even questions the need of the National Government and is of the opinion "that a Conservative-Liberal coalition could have done all that the so-called National Government did."⁵⁵

Whenever the Labour Party secured a majority it insisted on the right of the Labour members of Parliament to choose their own leader and the Sovereign's choice of the Prime Minister was, accordingly, obvious. But the Conservative Party did not follow this practice and the Sovereign had, thus, a choice when the Conservative Party had a majority but no leader. Baldwin became leader in 1923, and Chamberlain in 1937, because they were Prime Ministers. This practice of the Conservative Party evoked a severe criticism from the Labour Party when Sir Anthony Eden resigned on January 9, 1957 and the Queen appointed Harold Macmillan as the new Prime Minister. Until the moment Macmillan went to the palace the nation was left guessing whether he or R.A. Butler, the Lord Privy Seal, would become Sir Anthony Eden's successor. The Queen sought the advice of Sir Winston Churchill and the Marquess of Salisbury and it was believed that the advice of Churchill was a powerful factor in deciding the issue. The Times in an editorial said that ultimate responsibility for the choice of Harold Macmillan was the Queen's alone and that time and events would show how wisely she had judged. Labour Party chiefs at a specially called meeting of their 'shadow cabinet' parliamentary committee, expressed the fear that the Crown had been brought into party politics in a most undesirable way. James Griffiths, Labour Deputy Leader, in the absence of the leader, Hugh Gaitskell, said in a radio interview on January 11, 1957: "We do not question that the Crown acted with due constitutional propriety," but, he added, "we do believe it is important that parties themselves should decide on their leaders and that the Crown should not be put in the embarrassing position of having to make a choice between rival claimants for the Premiership from the same party." Griffiths further asserted that if this position was to recur often there would be a full case for examining the procedure, because "this is bringing the Crown into internecine party warfare which is very bad for the Constitution."

The historical method of choosing a leader by the Conservative Party underwent a considerable strain when Sir Alec Douglas-Home was asked to take over from Harold Macmillan in 1963 and eventually led to the retirement from politics of R.A. Butler. In 1965, the party changed its method of selecting a leader. Today, a ballot is held of all Conservative MPs, and to be elected a leader on the first ballot a candidate has to receive an overall majority of votes, and also he has to receive 15 per cent

53. Herbert Morrison, Government and Parliament, p. 79.

54. Ibid.

55. Ibid., p. 78.

more votes than his nearest rival. If he does not achieve this, a second ballot is held two to four days later, for which the contestants have to be renominated, and for which new candidates can be nominated. To be successful in the second ballot a candidate merely has to secure an overall majority of votes. If this is not still achieved, a third ballot is held. The third ballot is restricted to the three leading candidates of the second ballot and the voters indicate their first and second preferences on the ballot paper. After the votes have been counted, the third candidate is eliminated, and the votes secured by him are redistributed, according to the second preferences, between the two remaining candidates. The successful candidate is then presented to a party meeting consisting of Conservative MPs, Peers, prospective candidates, and members of the National Union Executive Committee.⁵⁶ This process has been used only once in July 1965, when Sir Alec Douglas-Home resigned as party leader. The new democratic method is sure to end the hoary tradition of evolving a sort of consensus after private soundings of Conservative members of Parliament, prospective MPs, Peers and the party executive. In the past, when the Conservatives would be in power the retiring Prime Minister had always a big say about his successor. All this led to intrigue and wire-pulling in the party. The new method is in line with the Labour Party, and it also alleviates the controversial issue of Monarch's intervention in active politics. For the selection of a Labour Party leader, a ballot of the Parliamentary Labour Party is held in which, in order to be elected, a candidate has to receive an absolute majority of the votes. If no candidate receives an absolute majority, the candidate at the bottom drops out of the contest and a second ballot is held a week later, this process being repeated until a candidate secures a majority.⁵⁷

Jennings thus concludes: "These examples show that the Queen is no mere figurehead. She does not steer the ship, but she has to make certain that there is a man at the wheel. Nor is it always easy to know when the problem will arise. Neville Chamberlain in 1937 had a large majority, but by 1940 George VI was looking forward for a Conservative Prime Minister who could secure Labour as well as Conservative support—and found him in Mr. Churchill."⁵⁸ It is however true, Jennings admits, that the cases are exceptional. Normally the machine runs efficiently because the Government has a majority and if it loses at an election, the Opposition steps in to form the Government. The existence today, of the Labour and Conservative Parties' procedures for electing their leaders does not in itself effect the constitutional prerogative of the Monarch, in that the Monarch remains free to choose whoever may be regarded as suitable. Nevertheless, in practice it seems inconceivable that the Monarch would now choose as Prime Minister anyone who had not first been elected party leader, provided that in a crisis time was allowed for the election to take place. It is possible, however, that the Monarch could still play an effective role in selecting a Prime Minister if it was not clear which party could form a government.

56. When Sir Alec Douglas-Home resigned in July 1965, as party leader, Edward Heath, Reginald Maudling, and Enoch Powell were nominated to contest to succeed him. In the first ballot Heath got 150 votes, Maudling 133 votes and Powell 15 votes. Heath, thus, did not have the required 15% more votes than Maudling. Before the second ballot was held, however, Maudling and Powell withdrew from the contest and Heath was left the only choice to be duly approved by the party meeting.

57. In February 1963, in the election to choose a successor to Hugh Gaitskell, in the first ballot Harold Wilson received 115 votes, George Brown 88 votes, and James Callaghan 41 votes. As Wilson could not secure an absolute majority, Callaghan dropped out, and in the second ballot a week later, Wilson was elected with 104 votes to George Brown's 103.

58. Jennings, Ivor, The Queen's Government, p. 43. Also refer to N.H. Brasher's Studies in British Government, p. 12.

It is sometimes asserted that the dismissal of Ministers and the dissolution of Parliament may be undertaken by the King without the consent of Government. No Government has been dismissed by the Sovereign since 1783,⁵⁹ although it is still maintained by many constitutional experts that the King has the right to dismiss Ministers, if he has reason to believe that their policy, though approved by the House of Commons, has not the approval of the people. But, as Jennings correctly points out, such an argument "is an argument for dissolution and not a dismissal of ministers."⁶⁰ Ministerial dismissal by the Head of the State is not the essence of the Parliamentary system of Government and no King would dare venture it, whatever be the legal opinion, unless he is determined to gamble in the most dangerous manner.

The duration of Parliament in ordinary circumstances is for five years, but conditions may arise in which a dissolution of Parliament may be desired before the expiry of its full term of life. There might, for example, be an important difference of opinion within the Cabinet which would make it impossible for the Government to carry on, or a Government may desire to take the verdict of the electorate on an important matter of policy on which it had no mandate, or there might be revolt within the ranks of the Government Party which caused the Government to be defeated in the House of Commons on some matter of importance. In circumstances such as these the Prime Minister might request the Sovereign to exercise his Royal prerogative of dissolving Parliament and direct new elections to be held.

The Sovereign's right to dissolve Parliament has been a subject of deep controversy. It has been maintained that the Sovereign is not bound to accept Ministerial advice on this matter. This, indeed, seems to have been the view of Queen Victoria and some of her contemporaries. Even Prof. Keith held similar opinion. "The prerogative of the Crown to dissolve Parliament," he wrote, "is undoubted. The manner of dissolution does not, as often said, strictly speaking, involve the aid of ministers, for the King could still present himself in the House of Lords, and

59. Gladstone appears to have thought in 1878 that the right to dismiss still existed. Disraeli also held the same view. In 1886, Queen Victoria had made efforts to overthrow the Liberal Government because to her mind the government was not governing with integrity for the welfare of the country. Prof. Dicey, too, was of the opinion that the King could dismiss ministers in order to ascertain the will of the nation. Mr. Asquith, on the other hand, rebutted Prof. Dicey's arguments and maintained that "a practice so long established, and so well justified by experience should remain unimpaired."

60. Cabinet Government, op. cit., p. 380.

by word of mouth, dissolve the Parliament."⁶¹ But in practice dissolution takes place by a proclamation under the Great Seal, which is based on the advice of the Privy Council for whose summons the Lord President accepts responsibility. Consequently, the King cannot secure a dissolution without advice. If the Ministers refuse to give such advice, he can do no more than dismiss them and we know how hazardous it is for the Sovereign to dismiss Ministers who command the confidence of the House of Commons. A forced dissolution, therefore, is impossible, "though one induced by royal pressure is perfectly in order."⁶² There have been two definite occasions during the last fifty years when dissolution took place at the express desire of the King. The first was over the Budget in 1910 at the desire of Edward VII and, the second, over the power of the Lords in the same year, at the desire of George V. "In each case, however," maintains Laski, "the ministers, however, reluctantly, acquiesced in the King's desire, and the dissolution was, accordingly, amply surrounded by the cloak of ministerial responsibility; though the King took the initiative in pressing a dissolution upon the government in each case, also, the government accepted the advice." But there are many instances as well, for example, in 1866, 1873, 1885, 1895, and 1905, when the Cabinet did not wish to dissolve in spite of the royal sanction.⁶³

The right of the King to dissolve Parliament without advice became a matter of practical discussion in 1913 over the Home Rule Bill. The Home Rule Bill had been passed by the House of Commons in two successive sessions but rejected by the House of Lords in each of these sessions. The Unionists claimed that the government had received no mandate from the electorate at General Elections for such a measure in 1910, and, thus demanded a dissolution before the Bill was submitted to the House of Commons the third time and passed under the Parliament Act, 1911. The Unionists realised that Asquith was unlikely to advise dissolution and they discussed the power of the King to dissolve without advice. George Cave argued that the King had an undoubted right to dissolve Parliament and that he should exercise the right on this occasion to satisfy himself that the House "does indeed represent the democracy of today." Sir William Anson admitted that the advice of the Ministers was constitutionally necessary, and that if the government was not willing to give such an advice, the King would have to ascertain, presumably from the Opposition, whether the alternative Ministry could take office and to accept the responsibility for a dissolution. Dicey agreed with Anson, but Professor Morgan insisted that such independent action on the part of the King "would almost inevitably be equivalent to dismissal of his ministers," and that if once a dissolution was effected by the King's choice, "no dissolution would be free from ambiguity, and speculation as to the degree of responsibility of the Sovereign would be a feature of every election." Commenting on this issue Jennings comes to the conclusion that "there cannot be the least doubt that Professor Morgan was wholly in the right. Either

61. "There was no doubt of the power and prerogative of the Sovereign to refuse a Dissolution—it was one of the very few acts which the Queen of England could do without responsible advice." Letters of Queen Victoria, edited by Benson and Esher, Vol. III, pp. 314-365.

62. The British Cabinet System, op. cit., p. 297.

63. Ibid.

the King 'persuades' his ministers to 'advise' a dissolution or ministers resign." In other words, the King cannot exercise his prerogative of dissolution without advice.

During the last hundred years there is no instance of a refusal of a dissolution when advised. Nevertheless, opinion has always prevailed, and there exists a persistent tradition that it could be refused, if the necessary circumstances arose. Summing up the discussion of the right of the King to refuse dissolution, Keith says, "It appears that there is some divergence of view among the authorities on the question whether the King can refuse a dissolution to a Prime Minister who asks for it, the better opinion is that the power still exists, but that it could be properly exercised only in exceptional circumstances."⁶⁴ What those exceptional circumstances can be, Stannard gives one specific instance. The contingency for refusal was there, he says, if Mr. Chamberlain had advised a dissolution in May, 1940 when the Germans were crossing the Albert Canal. At such critical moments, he says, "the limits of the convention that keeps the Crown out of politics are reached, and the reigning Sovereign must himself decide, in the last resort, where his duty lies."⁶⁵ Similarly, the right to a dissolution", as Keith says, "is not a right to a series of dissolutions." The King would not give the ministry, which had obtained dissolution and lost an election, another dissolution. The circumstances are which should enforce the retirement of the Ministry, although it is also true that a defeated Ministry would not ask for a second dissolution.

The King summons and prorogues Parliament. On the opening of Parliament, the Kings reads the Speech from the Throne. But the Speech which the Sovereign reads is not his own work,⁶⁶ and may be read for the King by the Lord Chancellor. The King assents to the election of the Speaker of the House of Commons and here too, he may act by proxy. Orders-in-Council cannot be passed except for the presence of the King. Similarly, the appointment of the Lord Chancellor and the Secretaries of State are the personal acts of the King, consisting in actual handling of the seals of office to the designated ministers. The Monarch receives ambassadors in person, though this too is a sheer formality.⁶⁷ The King may convoke a conference of party leaders, as did George V in 1914, with a view to avoid a constitutional crisis, though such a step the King can take only upon advice received from his ministers.⁶⁸

64. The British Cabinet System, p. 302.

65. Stannard, H., The Two Constitutions, p. 17.

66. It has been accepted since 1841, that the Speech from the Throne is a statement of ministerial policy for which the Sovereign accepts no responsibility. In 1881 Queen Victoria objected to a paragraph in the Queen's Speech on the proposal of withdrawal of troops from Kandhar. Lord Spencer and Sir William Harecourt, who were Ministers-in-Attendance, "impressed upon Sir H. Ponsonby that Speech from the Throne was in no sense an expression of Her Majesty's individual sentiments but a declaration of policy made on the responsibility of her Ministers". As cited in Cabinet Government, op. cit., p. 373. Also refer to Herbert Morrison's Government and Parliament, p. 75.

67. In 1929, George V raised objections to receiving an ambassador from the Soviet Union. The Foreign Secretary, politely but firmly, told the King that there was a Cabinet decision to that effect. The King then received the ambassador.

68. The King summoned the Home Rule Conference of July 1914 on the
(Continued on next page)

The Sovereign is the 'fountain of honours'. "It is the essence of honours of any kind", says Prof. Keith, "that they should appear to be the personal gift of the Sovereign, and for this reason all honours are submitted to and formally approved by the Sovereign, and whenever possible the investiture with the insignia or other act in connection with its bestowal is performed by the King in person or at least the royal signature is attached to the instrument conferring it." But the principle in the great majority of cases of the conferment of honours is that the recommendation to the Sovereign goes from a Minister, and normally the Prime Minister. The grant, however, is not entirely on advice. The Sovereign is able to resist the grant of honours of which he does not approve. In 1859, Queen Victoria refused to consent to a Privy Councillorship for Mr. Bright. In 1869, she refused to sanction a peerage for Sir L. de Rothschild; and in 1881 she firmly resisted Gladstone's advice to make Sir Garnet-Wolseley a peer. In 1906 Edward VII objected to several peerages and Privy Councillorships, although on pressure he ultimately gave way. A few honours, i.e., the Order of Merit, the Order of Companions of Honour, the Royal Victorian Order, the Most Noble Order of the Garter, and the Most Noble and most Ancient Order of the Thistle, are in the Sovereign's personal gift.

The King as Adviser. Far more important is the Monarch's role as critic, adviser and friend of the Ministers. In the oft-quoted phrase of Bagehot,⁶⁹ the Sovereign has "three rights—the right to be consulted, the right to encourage, the right to warn." And "a King of great sense and sagacity", he further adds, "would want no others. He would find that his having no others would enable him to use these with singular effect." Or, as stated by Sir Winston Churchill, "under the British Constitutional system the Sovereign has a right to be made acquainted with everything for which his Ministers are responsible, and has an unlimited right of giving counsel to his government."⁷⁰ Since the time of George I, the Sovereign has not attended a Cabinet meeting, but the King is better informed than the average Cabinet Minister on all matters which are brought before the Cabinet. He sees all Cabinet papers, whether they are circulated by the Cabinet office or by the departments. He receives the Cabinet agenda in advance and can discuss memoranda with the Ministers responsible for them. If he requires information from a Department he can ask for it. He also receives a copy of the Cabinet minutes, reports of Cabinet Committees, including the Defence Committee and the Chiefs of Staff Committee and the "daily print" of dispatches circulated by the Foreign Office. He follows debates in Parliament by means of the "Official Report". If other information would be helpful, he can ask his private Secretary to obtain it. Moreover, he has a staff to keep him informed of the development of political events. In short, the Prime Minister must keep the King abreast of what happens within and without the country, always tell him of Cabinet decisions and he must be ready to explain the reasons for any advice of Asquith, the Prime Minister. The speech which George V delivered to the Conference was sent to and approved by the Prime Minister. Cabinet Government, op. cit., pp. 361-62.

(Continued from previous page).

69. Bagehot, W., The British Constitution (The World Classics ed.), p. 69.

70. Churchill, Winston S., Their Finest Hour, p. 379.

policy. "In some respects," says Jennings, "notably on foreign affairs and on matters dealing with the Commonwealth, he may be better informed than the Prime Minister."⁷¹

The King would, thus, acquire some knowledge and experience which no other statesman in control of governmental machine can claim. Bagehot rightly showed that the King has two advantages over the Prime Minister. One, while Prime Ministers and Ministers change, the King goes on until he dies. Cabinet business, therefore, is continuous for him and a change of Government "is merely a change of personnel". All this makes the King a mentor whom a wise Minister is not only obliged, but positively desires, to consult. "In a word, the King knows the mistakes made by a Premier's predecessors, and probably why they made them." Writing about the advantages of Monarchy, just after the death of George VI, Clement Attlee said, "Yet another advantage is that the monarchy, continuously in touch with public affairs, acquires great experience," whereas the Prime Minister might have been out of office for some years. "He (Prime Minister) has no doubt kept himself as fully informed as possible and, on coming into office, can avail himself of the experience of the civil service, but this is not the same thing as having access, year after year, to all the secret papers.... King George VI was a very hard worker and read with great care all the state papers that came before him.... A Prime Minister discussing affairs of state with him was talking to one who had a wider and more continuous knowledge than any one else."⁷² Since the Prime Minister must discuss his policies with the Monarch, speak of new developments, and listen to what he has to say; and what the Monarch says is the result of his perennial knowledge and experience, he is in an excellent position to influence the man who has the power to decide on policy. "To express a doubt", as Jennings says, "is often more helpful than to formulate a criticism; to throw in a casual remark is often more helpful than to write a memorandum. The easy personal relationship that George VI maintained with his Ministers probably had more influence than the letters which Queen Victoria wrote in profusion."⁷³ Jennings, accordingly, concludes that the statement of Walter Bagehot that the Monarch had the right to be consulted, the right to encourage, and the right to warn stands modified now. "That is not quite what happened under George VI and it will probably not happen under Elizabeth II."⁷⁴ The Monarch exercises personal influence in matters of State, though influence is not power.

The views of the King are particularly valuable, because they are not clouded by political controversy. He has no party objective at all, nor

71. Herry Hopkins wrote after lunching with Their Majesties on 30th January 1941: "The King discussed the Navy and the Fleet at some length and showed an intimate knowledge of all the high-ranking officers of the Navy, and for that matter, of the army and the air force. It was perfectly clear from his remarks that he reads very carefully all the important dispatches and, among other things, was quite familiar with a dispatch which I had sent Sunday night through the Foreign Office." Sherwood, Robert E., Roosevelt and Hopkins, p. 251.

72. Life, February 18, 1952.

73. Jennings, I., The Queen's Government, p. 46.

74. Ibid.

is he concerned with intra-party intrigues. He is, in the words of Lord Attlee, "the general representative of all the people and stands aloof from the party political battle."⁷⁵ Then, there is the traditional reverence for the King's Office which must add weight to his opinions. Asquith wrote, in his Memorandum on the Rights and Obligations of the King, that "He is entitled and bound to give his ministers all relevant information which comes to him; to point out objections which seem to him valid against the course which they advise; to suggest (if he thinks fit) an alternative policy. Such intimations are always received by ministers with the utmost respect and considered with more respect and deference than if they proceeded from any other quarter."⁷⁶

Jennings gives a matter of fact summing up. He says, "Thus the King may be said to be almost a member of the Cabinet, and the only non-party member. He is, too, the best informed member and the only one who cannot be forced to keep silent. His status gives him power to press his views upon the minister making a proposal and (what is sometimes even more important) to press them on the Minister who is not making proposals. He can do more, he can press those views on the Prime Minister, the weight of whose authority may in the end produce the Cabinet decision. He can, if he likes to press his point, insist that his views be laid before the Cabinet and considered by them. In other words, he can be as helpful or as obstreperous as he pleases...in the end, of course, he is bound by a Cabinet decision, but he may play a considerable part in the process by which it is reached."⁷⁷

The King's function is advisory only. He can press his opinions as forcefully as he likes. He may resist the advice given to him by his Ministers, but he must not persist and in the last resort give way if Ministers refuse to accept his opinion. He cannot carry his point so far as to threaten the stability of his Government. There are two reasons for it. In the first place, the King cannot act unconstitutionally so long as he acts on the advice of a Minister supported by a majority in the House of Commons. Ministerial responsibility is the safeguard of the Monarchy. The saying that the 'King can do no wrong' precisely illustrates that the Monarch cannot make decisions of a political or controversial character. The price of his popularity and position is his abstention from politics. In the second place, if the King forces his opinion which the Ministers are not willing to accept, the Cabinet must resign. The King's action, then, immediately enters into political controversy. But the real power of the King depends upon "his willingness to keep respectable and to keep off politics." The Throne cannot stand for long amid the gusts of political conflict and the storm of political opinion. "The road of least criticism is the road for the King." Lord Esher, who was advising George V on the dispute over the Home Rule Bill controversy, most correctly summed up the position of the King. He wrote in a memorandum, "Every constitutional monarch possesses a dual personality. He may hold and express opinions upon the conduct of his ministers and their measures. He may endeavour to influence their actions.

75. Attlee on Monarchy, Observer, op. cit.

76. Spender, J.A., Life of Lord Oxford and Asquith, Vol. II, pp. 29-31.

77. Jennings, I., Cabinet Government, pp. 327-28.

He may delay decisions in order to give more time for reflection. He may refuse assent to their advice up to the point where he is obliged to choose between accepting it and losing their services."⁷⁸

The King as Mediator. The King very often acts as a mediator and uses his prestige to settle political conflict or "diminish the virulence of opposition." As he wields no political power and makes no political enemies his advice is deemed valuable and is generally accepted. In 1872, Queen Victoria wrote to Lord Russel without Gladstone's knowledge, and urged upon him not to move for papers on the Alabama question so that the Government should not be embarrassed. In 1881, the Queen asked General Ponsonby to see Sir Stafford Northcote and Lord Beaconsfield to secure agreement about the government's proposals to meet Irish obstruction. The Queen's mediation was again very useful in resolving differences between the two Houses of Parliament. In 1913 and 1914 the King made efforts to secure agreement on the Home Rule Bill. The leaders of the parties did not reach agreement, but he did bring them together. There is also some evidence available that in 1916 Lord Stamfordham, as the King's Private Secretary, endeavoured to settle the dispute between Mr. Asquith and Mr. Lloyd George which led to the resignation of Mr. Asquith. George V had much conspicuous part to play in 1921 over the Irish Home Rule tangle. "A King is," as Attlee says, "a kind of referee, although the occasions when he has to blow the whistle are now-a-days very few."⁷⁹

The King as a Symbol of Unity. The King of Britain is at once the King of Canada and other Dominions. He is, as Winston Churchill says, "the mysterious link, indeed I may say the magic link, which united our loosely bound but strongly inter-woven Commonwealth of nations, states, and races."⁸⁰ In his welcome speech on the visit of George VI to Canada in 1939, Prime Minister Mackenzie King said, "Here you will be in the heart of the family that is your own. We would have your Majesties feel that in coming from the old land to the new, you left one home for another." The constitutional developments of 1911 to 1931, ending with the Statute of Westminster, have given the Dominions complete independence both in matters of legislation and in matters of policy. But the King is still, in the language of the Preamble to the Statute of Westminster, a symbol of the free association of the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations. Subordination to the Government at Westminster, no doubt, is inconsistent with Dominion Status, but common "allegiance to the King" is not. The King, therefore, provides an indispensable symbol of unity of the far-flung Commonwealth countries. It is "the last link of the Empire that is left" as Baldwin reminded Edward VIII. Break this link which is furnished by Royalty and nothing remains in common among the autonomous partners in the Commonwealth. With a view to stabilize the bonds of unity the Statute of Westminster provides that any change made in the order of succession to the throne must have the consent of the members of the Commonwealth. Queen Elizabeth is the Queen of all territories that admit allegiance to her. She is one Queen and not a score of Queens. "The Queen is a person and not an institution, and so she is one Queen". The essential factor in this scheme of governance was, and still is, the Monarchy.

78. Ibid., p. 312.

79. Attlee on Monarchy, op cit.

80. Broadcast speech on the death of George VI.

Then, the Sovereign is the symbol of the free association of the members of the Commonwealth including the Republic of India. The position of the Sovereign as head of the Commonwealth countries was best explained by Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru. In a broadcast speech on May 10, 1949, Mr. Nehru said, "It must be remembered that the Commonwealth is not super-state in any sense of the term. We have agreed to consider the King as a symbolic head of the free association. But the King has no function attached to that status in the Commonwealth. So far as the Constitution of India is concerned the King has no place and we shall owe no allegiance to him." This is the correct position, yet the King provides the link which brings about the free association of Sovereign nations which meet and think over problems of common interests and derive means of mutual amity.

The King as the Chief of the Nation. "British Kingship," wrote Earl of Balfour, "like most other parts of our Constitution, has a very modern side to it. Our King, in virtue of his descent and of his office, is the living representative of our national history. So far from concealing the popular character of our institutions...he brings it into prominence. He is not the leader of a party nor the representative of a class; he is the chief of the nation...He is everybody's King."⁸¹ He is really everybody's King and that is precisely the feeling of all British people. The accession of the King, his coronation, his jubilee, are the occasions for unparalleled demonstration of popular and patriotic devotion. Enthusiastic and loyal subjects throng the route to watch the path of his progress when the King drives in State to open a new session of Parliament. In fact, every item of royal activity is newsworthy and it is flashed through by every device that modern publicity can utilise. "Some of the tributes," says Laski, "devoted to the person of the Monarch since the war would certainly have been more suited to the description of a demi-god than to the actual occupants of the throne in the last sixty years."⁸²

Monarchy, therefore, provides a useful focus for patriotism particularly where it has a long and glorious history. "We can damn the Government," says Jennings, "and cheer the King."⁸³ A person can be loyal to his King and yet oppose the Government. The Conservatives "served the King" in 1914, although they opposed some aspects of the Liberal Government's policy. The patriotic fervour of the people is more easily stimulated when the "King" declares war and asks for recruits for the "royal forces". The national appeal: "Your King and country need you" is sufficient to remind them that they are one nation. The King is the most concrete symbol of this oneness and unity. According to Lloyd George, "the King in 1917 enormously assisted the laying of industrial unrest by his visits to munition works and other places when suspicion of war motives was being aroused."⁸⁴ The visits of George VI to various theatres of War and the bombed areas in England imbued the soldiers and the civilian population alike with a new spirit of patriotism. They made a heroic bid to win the war and the loyal subjects of the King ultimately won it. "God save the King" is their National Anthem, and they do and die for the Sovereign who for them personifies the state. Or to put it in the words of Amery, "Human nature not only craves for symbols but prefers them to be personal and human."⁸⁵ The Monarch is, thus, a more personalized and attractive symbol of national unity "than a vague concept of the state, the flag, or even a President, and the hereditary system at least solves the problem of succession."⁸⁶

81. Introduction to Bagehot's English Constitution, p. xxv.

82. Laski, H., Parliamentary Government in England, op. cit., p. 389.

83. The English Constitution, op. cit., p. 111.

The King as a Social Figure. The King is not merely a part of the political machine. He is an important part of the social structure and, as such, wields a great social influence. The Sovereign is the leader of society by general precedence dating from the fourteenth century and sustained until the present day by Royal ordinances, ancient usage, established custom and the public will. The Royal Family sets morality, fashion⁸⁷ and aptitude even in art and literature. The Royal patronage is an enormous asset to any cause and ensures for it popular support. Such a national appeal no other person, however, eminent, could give. "His presence at ceremonies such as the laying of the foundation stones, the launching of ships, and the opening of new works, enables people of opposing views to associate without suppressing their mutual opposition." Government is a collective concern and it requires the willing co-operation of all sections of people. The presence of the King adds personal touch to the individuals feeling a personal responsibility for the collective action. No government is averse to use the personal popularity and social influence of the Sovereign to strengthen its own popular appeal. The Jubilee and Diamond Jubilee celebrations of 1887 and 1897 "strengthened popular support for the imperialistic ideas of the Conservative Governments then in office." It is certain, too, that the Silver Jubilee of 1935 strengthened the "National Government, whose popular support had until then been rapidly diminishing." Thus, it will be clear that these "dignified", as Bagehot calls, functions of the King are far more important than his Government functions. If democracy means the government by the people as well as for the people, the presence of the King helps to make it so. "When the people cheer the Queen," writes Herbert Morrison, "and sing her praises, they are also cheering our free democracy."⁸⁸ The proper part of the Monarch, as Laski rightly emphasised, "has been that of a dignified emollient rather than of an active umpire between conflicting interests."

84. Cabinet Government, op. cit., p. 364.

85. Amery, L.S., Thoughts on the Constitution, p. 139.

86. Punnet, R.M., British Government and Politics, p. 257.

87. Princess Rose, now Queen Elizabeth II, and her sister Princess Margaret, began going out for their evening walks, in the Spring of 1939, without hats, and this set a fashion for children in London causing a considerable diminished sale in children hats. A deputation of children-hat dealers waited upon the Queen and explained to Her Majesty how hard they had been hit. The Queen asked her daughters to use hats for their evening walks and it set a fashion for children to follow.

88. Morrison Herbert, Government and Parliament, op. cit., p. 92.

The King and Parliamentary Government. The Cabinet system of government has nowhere proved a workable plan without the presence of some titular Head of the State, whether he be a King, as in Britain or a President, as in France. But from the political point of view a person who is free of party ties and stands above party considerations is the most desirable adjunct of the Parliamentary system of government. An elected Head of the State is a promoted politician and howsoever sincerely he may endeavour to forget his past party associations, he cannot do it. Even if he can, others cannot. But the Sovereign, unlike an elected President, has no party associations or partisan leanings. His august position, as the occupant of the Throne, puts him in an altogether different atmosphere. He is everybody's King and he does not form party loyalties. "As a result, not only is he in a position to act more impartially, but also, what is of more importance, he is believed by others to be impartial." If Parliamentary government in Britain is to be retained in the classic form in which it has been developed, then, the best representation of such a "dignified and detached" figure is the King. "Thus far, beyond doubt, the system of limited Monarchy has been an unquestionable success in Great Britain. It has, so far, trodden its way with remarkable skill amid the changing habits of the time. Its success, no doubt, has been the outcome of the fact that it has exchanged power for influence; the blame for errors in policy has been laid at the door of ministers who have paid the penalty by loss of office."⁸⁹ Monarchy, as such, has been no bar to the progressive democratization of the Government otherwise it would have been thrown overboard long ere this. "The security and popularity of the British Monarchy today," writes Herbert Morrison, "are largely the result of the fact that it does not govern and that government is the task of ministers responsible to a House of Commons elected by the people. The Monarchy as it exists now facilitates the processes of parliamentary democracy and functions as an upholder of freedom and representative government."⁹⁰

Conclusion. The popularity of the British King and the role which he plays in the British politics is now an undisputed fact. In Britain, there had been moves to end or mend the House of Lords; even to reform the House of Commons and the Cabinet. But Monarchy has withstood the test of time. People realise and appreciate its "unifying, dignifying, and stabilising influence." If it were to be abolished, the substitute would be either like the type of French Presidency or the American Presidency. The former is not a good substitute, because the President of France neither rules nor reigns: and if he rules it is the negation of Parliamentary government. The limited period of office of a President has disadvantages as compared with the continuing reign of a hereditary monarch. The type of American Presidency would entail revolutionary changes in the existing political set-up of the country. An Englishman will never agree to it. The institution of Monarchy is something with which all Britons have grown up; it is a part of their heritage and their culture. They have shaped it so that it does not interfere with their social and political development and they see no reason to substitute some other institution for this venerable institution. Lowell has aptly said, "If the King is no longer the motive power of the state, it is the spar on which the sail is bent, and as such it is not only a useful but an essential part of the vessel." So despite its anachronism in a democracy, the Kingship is impregnably entrenched in the British Constitutional system, and, as Ogg says, the country will, and should, continue, as now, a "crowned republic". The only opposition is that of the Communists, just a handful of them with no influence with the people and with no representation in Parliament, except one solitary peer, Lord Milford, who succeeded to the title on the death of his father, but he, too, has not so far been able to take his seat in the Lords.⁹¹

89. Laski, H., Parliamentary Government in England, op. cit., p. 395.

90. Morrison, Herbert, Government and Parliament, op. cit., p. 92.

SUGGESTED READINGS

- | | |
|-------------------------|--|
| Amery L. | : Thoughts on the Constitution. |
| Anthony Sampson | : The Anatomy of Britain Today. |
| Bagehot, W. | : English Constitution. |
| Benemy, F.W.G. | : The Queen Reigns: She Does not Rule. |
| Blake, R. | : The Unknown Prime Minister. |
| Campion Lord and others | : British Government Since 1918. |
| Cathcart, Helen | : Her Majesty. |
| Dorothy Laird | : How the Queen Reigns. |
| Finer, H. | : Governments of Greater European Powers, Chap. 9. |
| Greaves, H.R.G. | : The British Constitution, Chap. IV. |
| Grigg, John | : Is the Monarchy Perfect? |
| Jennings, W.I. | : The British Constitution, Chap. V. |
| Jennings, W.I. | : The Queen's Government, Chap. 2. |
| Keith, A.B. | : The Constitution of England from Queen Victoria to George VI, Vol. I, Chaps. II, III. |
| Keith, A. B. | : The King and the Imperial Crown. |
| Laski, H.J. | : Parliamentary Government in England, Chap. VIII. |
| Lowell, A.L. | : The Government of England (1908), Vol. I, Chap. I. |
| Marriot, J.A.R. | : Mechanism of the Modern State (1927), Vol. II, Chaps. XXIII, XXIV. |
| Martin, Kingsley | : The Magic of Monarchy. |
| Martin, Kingsley | : The Crown and the Establishment. |
| Morrison, Herbert | : Government and Parliament, Chap. V. |
| Morrah, Dermot | : The Work of the Queen. |
| Munro, W.B. | : The Governments of Europe, Chap. IV. |
| Nicolson, Sir H. | : George V. |
| Ogg, F.A. | : English Government and Politics (1936), Chaps. IV, V. |
| Ogg, and Zink, H. | : Modern Foreign Government, Chap. III. |
| Petrie, Sir Charles | : The Modern British Monarchy. |
| Stannard, H. | : The Two Constitutions (1950), Chap. I. |
| Wheeler-Bennett, Sir J. | : George VI. |
| Windsor, Duke of, | : Crown and People 1902-53. |

91. The new Peer needs two sponsors to be seated in the Lords

CHAPTER IV

PRIVY COUNCIL, MINISTRY AND CABINET

The powers of the Crown are exercised through different agencies. Some are exercised by Ministers acting singly in the Departments over which they preside, some are performed by the Privy Council and its various Committees, some by the Cabinet and some are carried with the help of the permanent Civil Servants. Let us see what these institutions precisely are and how do they actually function.

THE PRIVY COUNCIL

Origin and development. From early times there had been a Council, a group of men attendant on the King, fulfilling certain duties, and acting as the King's advisers. The Privy Council is an official name given in law to the body of persons who are the advisers of the Sovereign. In its origin, the Privy Council is the descendant of the King's Council, the Curia Regis, which dates from Norman days, and has had, under various names, a continuous history. An attempt was made under the Lancastrian Kings to make it directly subordinate to Parliament, but it could not succeed. In the sixteenth century the King's Privy Council became the powerful instrument of Tudor despotism. In the next century its powers were considerably eclipsed by an inner circle of the King's advisers which eventually came to be known as the Cabinet.

As the Privy Council had become an unwieldy body for purposes of effective consultations, the later Stuart Kings started the practice of consulting with a few members of the Council who met the King in his closet or "Cabinet". It became a regular practice and by 1679, the old Privy Council may be said to have been virtually abolished except for formal business and as a Court of Law. This change can be observed from the farewell speech of Charles II, in the same year, to his Privy Councillors. The King said, "His Majesty thanks you for all the good advice which you have given him which might have been more frequent if the great numbers of the Council had not made it unfit for the secrecy and dispatch of business. This forced him to use a smaller number of you in a foreign Committee, and sometimes the advice of some few among them upon such occasions for many years past."

Its present composition and functions. The Privy Council was, therefore, the chief source of Executive power in the State. As the system of Cabinet Government developed, the Privy Council became less prominent. Many of its powers were transferred to the Cabinet as an inner Committee of the Privy Council, and much of its work was handed over to newly created government departments. The present-day Privy Council is the body on whose advice and through which the Sovereign exercises his or her statutory and a number of prerogative powers. It also has its own statutory duties, independent of the power of the King in Council.

The Privy Council includes all Cabinet ministers, past and present,¹ the Prince of Wales and the Royal Dukes, the Archbishops and the Bishop of London, and a large number of other people of distinction in the field of politics, arts, literature, science or law who are elevated as Privy Counsellors. Ambassadors are now usually made Privy Counsellors, and since the precedent of 1897, Dominion Premiers are regularly offered its membership.² The Speaker of the House of Commons, too, is normally offered Privy Counsellorship. The title of "Right Honourable" is borne by all members of the Privy Council. There are usually 300 Privy Counsellors and the membership of the Privy Council is retained for life.

The Privy Council is convened by the Clerk of the Privy Council and is presided over by the Sovereign or, when the Sovereign is abroad or ill, by Counsellors of State. Three Privy Counsellors form a quorum, but, as a rule, not fewer than four are summoned to attend. Rarely is anyone invited to attend a Council meeting who is not a Cabinet member. The whole Privy Council is called together only on the death of the Sovereign or when the Sovereign announces his or her intention to marry.

The Privy Council is responsible for the submission for the Sovereign's approval of the Orders in Council, of which there are two kinds. First, are those made by virtue of the Royal prerogative and have no formal relation to Parliament. The use of this type of Orders in Council are conventionally limited mainly to legislation for Colonies, which do not have representative assemblies. The others are those which are authorised by Act of Parliament and are a form of delegated legislation. Members of the Privy Council attending meetings at which Orders in Council are made do not thereby become personally responsible for the policy upon which the orders are based; this rests with the Ministers in whose departments the draft orders were framed, whether they are present at the meeting or not. Certain Orders in Council must be published in the "London Gazette", which is an official periodical published by the authority of the Government. The Privy Council also advises the Crown on the issue of Royal Proclamations, some of the most important of which relate to the prerogative acts (such as summoning or dissolving Parliament) of the same validity as Acts of Parliament.

The Privy Council serves, as in ancient times, as a panel for the composition of the Committees. The meetings of the Committees differ from those of the Privy Council itself in that the Sovereign cannot constitutionally be present. These Committees have only advisory functions. The Committee relating to Jersey and Guernsey is of long historical lineage. Similarly, there are Committees for the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge and the Scottish Universities. Early in the reign of Queen Victoria it was found convenient to entrust the Privy Council, acting through a Committee, various functions, which later on were handed over to departments. The connection of the Council with education, however, remained considerably longer and it was only in 1899 that a Board of Education with an independent President was substituted for the Committee. The administrative work of the Privy Council Committees is carried out in the Privy Council Office under the control of the Lord President of the Council.

1. Once appointed to the Privy Council, a person ordinarily retains his membership for life.

2. General Hertzog and Mr. De Valera, however, refused Privy Counsellorship.

The most noteworthy of such committees is the Judicial Committee of Privy Council created in 1833. This Committee is generally selected from Lord Chancellor, ex-Lord Chancellors, and Lords of Appeal in Ordinary, although other members of the Privy Council who have held high judicial office (including Chief Justices and certain other judges from other Commonwealth countries who have been sworn members of the Privy Council) may also be asked to sit when business of the Judicial Committee is heavy. The Judicial Committee does not deliver judgment. It advises the Sovereign who acts on its report and approves an Order in Council to give effect thereto.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is the final court of appeal from the courts of the United Kingdom dependencies and certain member States of the Commonwealth. It derives its appellate jurisdiction in respect of such appeals from the principle of English Common Law which recognises "the right of all the King's subjects to appeal for redress to the Sovereign in Council" if they believed that the Courts of Law have failed to do them justice. The Judicial Committee is also the final court of appeal from the ecclesiastical courts of England, from the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man, and from Prize Courts³ in the United Kingdom and dependencies. It hears appeals by members of the medical, dental and certain kindred professions against decisions of their respective disciplinary bodies.

Lord Samuels describes the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as "one of the most august tribunal in the world." Members of the Judicial Committee hold or have held certain high judicial offices in the United Kingdom or the Commonwealth and are Privy Councillors. Appeals are admitted only by leave given by the court overseas according to local law or, failing that, by the Judicial Committee itself.

THE MINISTRY

The Ministry and the Cabinet. The term Ministry is used in two senses. Sometimes it is used to mean Cabinet as if the two terms are synonymous. Sometimes it is used to mean both the Cabinet and other Ministers who are not members of the Cabinet. The second meaning is preferable. When a new Prime Minister is appointed, he has to fill hundred or so posts, major and minor, which together make up the Ministry. For example, the Cabinet formed by Winston Churchill in 1951, contained sixteen members. In addition to these Ministers in the Cabinet, there were twenty-two Ministers who were not in the Cabinet. Then, there were over fifty junior Ministers and this total of about ninety constituted Churchill's Ministry. The Labour Government formed by Harold Wilson in October 1964 contained a total of 101 Ministers and Parliamentary Secretaries. The Cabinet contained 23 members like its Conservative predecessor Government under Sir Alec Douglas-Home. The Ministry is, thus, a convenient concept that embraces all categories of Ministers collectively with varying shades and degrees, who go to make up the political side of the Executive. That is Her Majesty's Government.

3. Prize courts deal with matters concerning property captured in time of war which, by the grace of the Crown, falls to the forces which assist in the capture.

The Ministers vary in nomenclature and in importance. About twenty or more of the most important out of the Ministry are the members of the Cabinet.⁴ They meet collectively, decide upon policy, and in general "head up" the government. It does not, however, mean that every Cabinet Minister must necessarily preside over an administrative department. There are a few sinecure offices which involve no substantial departmental duties. Men of great political importance whose capacity for departmental work has been lessened by the passage of time, or those who have no taste for administration, but whose counsel is always of immense value,⁵ are assigned offices with a few or no duties attached. For example, the duties of the Lord Privy Seal were abolished in 1884, and yet he is always a member of the Cabinet. The Lord President of the Council, too, has only nominal duties. Sometimes these offices are usefully occupied by Ministers who are entrusted with major responsibilities of a general rather than of a departmental kind. This was true of Lord President from 1940-43, and Mr. Herbert Morrison who became Lord President in the Labour Government of 1945. In Macmillan's Government (1961) the Lord President of the Council was entrusted with the general duty of promoting scientific and technological development as Minister of Science. The Lord Privy Seal handled foreign office business in the House of Commons. The Earl of Home (now Sir Douglas-Home), the Foreign Secretary, was in the Lords.

Another expedient is the appointment of Ministers without Portfolio. From 1915 to 1921 ten cases occurred of Ministers in the Cabinet without Portfolio.⁶ But this system ended in 1921 after a scathing criticism in the House of Commons. It was revived in Baldwin's Ministry of 1935 when Lord Eustace Percy and Anthony Eden received Ministries.⁷ Arthur Greenwood held the office of Minister without Portfolio during his membership of the War Cabinet and also for a short while in 1947. W.F. Deedes was appointed Minister without Portfolio by Harold

4. Anthony Eden, who succeeded Churchill after the latter retired from active politics, had eighteen Cabinet Ministers. Harold Macmillan continued with more or less the same number. Harold Wilson's Cabinet formed in 1964 had twenty-three members, though Wilson advocated 15 to 20 members, to make an ideal Cabinet. BBC Publications, Whitehall and Beyond, p. 26. In 1967 Wilson's Cabinet had 20 members.

5. John Bright proved a poor administrator at the Board of Trade in 1868, but was later valuable as Chancellor of the Duchy.

6. Keith, A.B., The British Cabinet System, p. 45.

7. Lord Eustace Percy found his position anomalous and resigned office, later leaving parliamentary life. Mr. Eden was given the duty of dealing with League of Nations' affairs, but on Sir Samuel Hoare's retirement in 1935, he was appointed in his place.

Macmillan in a major reconstruction of Cabinet in July 1962 and in October 1963, Home appointed two Ministers without Portfolio. But it is not usual for such a Minister to be created.

In the second place, there are certain Ministers who are designated as of "Cabinet rank." Attlee's Labour Government, formed in January 1949, had fifteen such Ministers. The Ministers of the "Cabinet rank" are the heads of the administrative departments, and although they are formally of Cabinet status and are paid the same salary as Cabinet Ministers, but they are not members of the Cabinet itself. They attend the Cabinet meetings only when specifically invited by the Prime Minister to deal with matters concerning their departments. This division of Ministers was observed by Churchill in 1951 and he had eighteen Ministers under this category. The Ministers of "Cabinet rank" vary in numbers from government to government; it is a matter for the Prime Minister's discretion.

Then, come the "Ministers of State", who are Deputy Ministers in Government departments where the work is particularly heavy and complex, or when it involves frequent travelling overseas. The Minister of State may, if circumstances demand, hold independent charge of a department, though there is no precedent so far. Compared with ten Ministers of State in Home's Government there are now sixteen in Harold Wilson's Government.⁸ The Ministers of State usually have a status intermediate between that of a full Minister and of a Parliamentary Secretary. The first Minister of State ever created was Lord Beaverbrook in May 1941, and since then the practice has come to stay. "In practice the general idea of the Minister of State," says Herbert Morrison, "is to create minister of higher status than that of a Parliamentary Secretary who could relieve heavily burdened departmental ministers of material parts of their work to an extent which might not be considered appropriate in the case of Parliamentary Secretaries." It would appear that any action taken by a Minister of State, who is subordinate to the Minister in charge of a department, would be on behalf of the Minister under delegated powers. The Minister-in-charge of the department is answerable to Parliament for all intents and purposes.

Finally, there are the Parliamentary Secretaries, or Junior Ministers. Each departmental Minister has usually a Parliamentary Secretary, but in some of the larger departments there may be two. A Parliamentary Secretary may not be confused with the Permanent Secretary who is a senior member of the Civil Service in the department. Parliamentary Secretaries are mostly the members of the House of Commons, or if not, then, of the House of Lords. They belong to the majority party and are selected by the Prime Minister in consultation with the Minister concerned. They remain in office so long as the Ministry is there or the Prime Minister wishes them to be there. But they are not Ministers of the Crown and constitutionally have no 'powers'. The primary function of the Parliamentary Secretaries is to relieve their senior Ministers of some of their burden by taking part in parliamentary debates, and answering parliamentary questions, and by assisting in departmental duties. There are also five "political" officials of the Royal Household, including the Treasurer, the Comptroller, and the Vice-Chamberlain. These offices carry a political complexion and their incumbents are ranked as Ministers.

All these categories of Ministers, who make the Ministry, are members of Parliament and belong to the majority party in the House of Commons. They are individually and collectively responsible to the House of Commons and continue to remain in office so long as they can retain its confidence. The Ministry may, thus consist of "the whole number of Crown officials having seats in Parliament, sustaining direct responsibility to the House of Commons, and holding office subject to a continued support of a working majority in the latter body." But the Ministry has no collective functions. It is the function of the Cabinet. The Cabinet is a committee of the Government or Ministry, chosen by the Prime Minister, who meet together for four or five hours each week to deliberate, formulate policy, supervise and co-ordinate the work of the whole Government machine. The Ministry as a whole never meets and it never deliberates on matters of policy. The duties of a Minister, unless he is a Cabinet Minister, are individual duties relating to the administrative department or departments to which he is attached. "In sum, the Cabinet officer deliberates and advises; the Privy Councillor decrees; and the Minister executes. The three activities are easily capable of being distinguished, even though it frequently happens that Cabinet officer, Privy Councillor, and Minister are one and the same person."

Size of the Government. The overall size of the government (excluding Parliamentary Private Secretaries) has more than doubled this century, rising from about forty-five in the Governments of Balfour, Campbell-Bannerman, and Asquith before 1914, to more than one hundred in the Wilson Government formed in 1964. This increase has created the danger of excessive Executive domination of the Legislature. Although members of the House of Commons appointed to Ministerial office no longer have to secure re-election to the Commons, there do exist statutory limits on the number of Ministers allowed to serve in the Commons at any one time.

The Ministers of the Crown Act, 1937 provided that only eighteen out of twenty-one senior Ministers could serve in the House of Commons at any one time. This meant that if all the twenty-one posts were filled, at least three had to be held by members of the Lords. In addition, the Act of 1937 provided that not more than twenty Junior Ministers could sit in the Commons at any one time. During World War II, under the provisions of the emergency legislation, these figures were exceeded, while many of the Ministerial posts created after the War were specifically excluded from the limitations imposed by the Act of 1937. In 1941, the Select Committee on Offices and Places of Profit under the Crown recommended that only sixty Ministers in all should serve in the House of Commons.¹⁰ In pursuance of this recommendation, the House of Commons Disqualification Act, 1957 specified that not more than seventy Ministers, of all categories, could serve in the House of Commons at one time. This limit was not exceeded by Macmillan or Home. When the Labour Government came in power in 1964, it created the new Ministerial posts which correspondingly increased the size of the Ministry and, accordingly, the necessity of new legislation arose. The Ministers of the Crown Act, 1964 increased from seventy to ninety-one the total number of Ministers who could serve in the Commons at any one time, and abolished the limit on the number of senior Ministers that could be drawn from the Commons. Since the figure of ninety-one fixed by the 1964 Act as the maximum number of Ministers that could be drawn from the House of Commons, was below the total number of Ministerial posts in the Wilson Government, the Act, therefore, recognised the principle that some posts should be filled by the Lords. It means that Ministers over and above the number of ninety-one would come from the Lords thereby increasing the strength of the Peers in the Ministry.

9. It is a well settled convention that Ministers should be either Peers or members of the House of Commons. There have been, however, occasional and temporary exceptions. Gladstone held the office of Colonial Secretary in 1845 for nine months without a seat in Parliament. Sir A.G. Boscawen, Minister of Agriculture, was a similar case in 1922-23. General Smuts was a Minister without Portfolio and a member of the War Cabinet from 1916 until the end of War without a seat in Parliament. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and his son Malcolm MacDonald were members of the Cabinet though not in Parliament from November 1935 until early in 1936. MacDonalds were defeated at the General Elections held in November 1935. Patrick Gordon-Walker was appointed Foreign Secretary by Harold Wilson despite his failure to get elected in October, 1964. Gordon-Walker had to quit on his defeat in the by-election too.

THE CABINET

Not known in Law. The Cabinet is, thus, the core of the British Constitutional system. It is the supreme directing authority; "the magnet of policy," as Barker calls it,¹¹ which co-ordinates and controls the whole of the executive government, and integrates and guides the work of the legislature. According to Bagehot, the Cabinet is a "hyphen that joins, the buckle that binds the executive and legislative departments together." Lowell calls it "the keystone of the political arch." Sir John Marriot describes it as "the pivot round which the whole political machinery revolves." Ramsay Muir speaks of it as "the steering-wheel of the ship of State." Sir Ivor Jennings succinctly says that the Cabinet "provides unity to the British system of government." With whatever colourful phrase it may be described and from whatever angle it is approached, the Cabinet is the motive power of all political action in Britain. And yet it is not known to law.

Like various other political institutions of the country, the Cabinet, too, is the child of chance. Until 1937, it was not even mentioned in any Act of Parliament, and in the Ministers of the Crown Act there is just an occasional reference to it.¹² As the Cabinet has no legal existence, its actions, as such, have not the force of law. The judicial acts of the Cabinet are formally made the actions of the Privy Council which body has existence in law. The machinery of the Cabinet system is, thus, based upon conventions, unwritten but always recognised and stated with almost as much precision as the rules of law. This, indeed, is the most remarkable outcome of the British Constitution.

10. The Herbert Committee Report, H.C. 120 of 1941.

11. Britain and the British People (1943), p. 54.

12. The Ministers of the Crown Act, 1937, referred to it while providing higher salaries for those ministers who were members of the Cabinet.

Development of the office of Prime Minister and Cabinet. The name Cabinet, as said before, referred originally to a small body of ministers whom the later Stuart Kings commenced consulting in preference to the Privy Council of their predecessors.¹³ Then, came the Revolution of 1688, and the consequent increase in the powers of Parliament. William III on ascending the throne formed a Ministry drawn both from the Whigs and the Tories. But he soon realized that the Tories were very critical of his policy and their opposing views made it impossible for him to carry out smooth administration. He, therefore, gradually dismissed all the Tories from his Ministry and got, for the first time, a body of Ministers chosen from one political party. The Whig Junto of 1696 is regarded as the real beginning of the Cabinet system. Queen Anne carried the development a stage further by letting the inner circle decide policy while her predecessors tolerated only advice. But she still continued to dismiss her Ministers when they forfeited her favour. At the same time, both William and Anne presided in person at the meetings of the Cabinet.

The system of Cabinet Government can be said to have really emerged when the King was excluded from the meetings of the Cabinet. This happened, by chance, in 1714, when George I ceased to attend the meetings of the Council because he did not understand English. The King designated Sir Robert Walpole to preside in his place. The Cabinet thereupon ceased to meet at the Palace with the Sovereign presiding, and met instead at the House of the First Lord of the Treasury. The first Lord thus became a kind of Chairman to the Cabinet and Walpole furnished the required leadership in the absence of the King and his colleagues looked to him for direction. As Chairman of the Cabinet, he presided at its meetings, guided and directed its deliberations, reported the decisions arrived at the Cabinet meetings to the King, and reported to the Cabinet the opinion of the King. Moreover, as a member of Parliament he served as a link between the Cabinet and Parliament. This new position and duties of Walpole in effect involved the origin of the office of the Prime Minister, although he resented and repudiated the suggestion that his position was of that kind. Necessity, thus, grafted the Premiership as well as the Cabinet on the Constitution.

Another consequence of the absence of the King from meetings of the Cabinet was that Ministers, instead of tendering individual advice, began seeking for unanimity. Walpole could hardly go to the King with a dozen or fifteen different opinions. Differences amongst themselves the Ministers began to resolve inside the Cabinet, and, thus, agreed advice was conveyed to the King. Out of this emerged another development. The 13. The smaller inner group of persons to whom the King came to give his special confidence was variously known as the 'Junto' (a term first used during the reign of Charles I), the 'Cabal' (after the initial letters of the inner group of 1671—Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Ashley and Lauderdale), the 'Cabinet Council' or the 'Cabinet' (the cabinet being the private room or closet of the King's palace in which the group met).

Cabinet, if it were to tender unanimous advice, had to be a homogeneous body. When distinct political parties had begun to emerge, it became convenient to draw all Cabinet Ministers from a single majority party to be sure of parliamentary approval.

For twenty years Walpole headed the Government and during that period a system that was in its infancy gathered strength and a certain measure of stability. In fact, in Walpole's administration are found the essential characteristics of the present-day Cabinet government. "It was Walpole who first administered the Government in accordance with his own views of our political requirements. It was Walpole who first conducted the business of the country in the House of Commons. It was Walpole who in the conduct of that business first insisted upon the support for his measures of all servants of the Crown who had seats in Parliament. It was under Walpole that the House of Commons became the dominant power in the State, and rose in ability and influence as well as in actual power above the House of Lords. And it was Walpole who set the example of quitting his office while he still retained the undiminished affection of his King for the avowed reason that he had ceased to possess the confidence of the House of Commons." It was, again, Walpole who used No. 10, Downing Street while he was in office, which subsequently became the official residence of the Prime Minister.

At the same time, there had developed the principle of Ministerial Responsibility, that is, the principle that a Minister was responsible to Parliament for all his public acts, and that he could be brought to book by Parliament if ever it considered his acts prejudicial to the interests of the country. The principle of Ministerial Responsibility evolved slowly. For the first time Stafford in the reign of Charles I was made to answer to Parliament for what was considered the bad advice he had given to the King. The King did his best to shield him, but, and in spite of the best efforts of Charles himself, Stafford was made to pay the penalty imposed by Parliament.¹⁴ Exactly the same happened in Danby's case during the reign of Charles II.¹⁵ Since then the principle of Ministerial Responsibility has been recognised as the sine qua non of the Parliamentary system of government.

It does not, however, mean that the Cabinet system of government had become an accomplished fact in the eighteenth century, and the King was a mere cipher in his relations to the Cabinet. Even Sir Robert Walpole felt himself very much the King's servant and dismissable by him. George III demanded the inclusion of some members in the Cabinet though they belonged to the opposing party. George IV made efforts to create among the Ministers division by getting their individual opinions on Canning's foreign policy. William IV once, or perhaps twice, contemplated the dismissal of a Cabinet which enjoyed the confidence of the House of Commons and the electorate.

14. Stafford was impeached of high treason by the House of Commons "for endeavouring to subvert the ancient and fundamental laws and government of His Majesty's realms of England and Ireland and to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government against law in the said kingdom." Select Documents of English Constitutional History, op. cit., p. 361.

15. See ante, Chap. III.

Thus, the complete theory and practice of the Cabinet system, as it emerged out of the eighteenth century, did not take its present form before the reign of Queen Victoria. "Under Peel, Disraeli, and Gladstone the system reached a kind of climax: indeed the classic exposition of its working is still a chapter in the Life of Walpole, written by one of Gladstone's colleagues (Morley) with his master's assistance."¹⁶

It is early to analyse the development of the Cabinet during the twentieth century. But two significant observations may be made here. The first is, that the membership of the Cabinet has increased from twelve or less to eighteen or more. Sir Robert Peel was content with thirteen members; Disraeli in 1874 tried as few as twelve. Since then the Cabinet has tended to grow steadily until recent times. With the expansion of the functions of government, it became a practice to include in the Cabinet the heads of all important department's as well as a number of Ministers without departmental duties, like the Lord President of the Council and the Lord Privy Seal, and sometimes even the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. Between the two World Wars the number was seldom less than twenty. In 1935, it was twenty-two. But there were constant complaints against the swelling size of the Cabinet. It was contended that a Cabinet of twenty-one or twenty-two members was too large for an effective deliberative body. A Cabinet say of twelve persons, like Disraeli's in 1874, can amicably and conveniently settle questions by intimate discussion around a table. A Cabinet of about two scores, on the other hand, verges upon "a public meeting: it must have a formal procedure, a considerable committee organization, a substantial secretariat, and so on. A small Cabinet can usually take decisions by a consensus of opinion, a large Cabinet may find it easier to take a vote."¹⁷

Experienced politicians prefer a small cabinet. Attlee reduced the number of his Cabinet Ministers to seventeen in 1949, Winston Churchill still further reduced it to sixteen in 1951, with a separate provision of 'ministers not in the Cabinet.' In 1962, there were twenty Cabinet Ministers and the number increased to twenty-three in 1964. In January 1967, it stood at twenty. The nomenclature of the Ministers was, adhered to in the succeeding Cabinets, except that holders of the most of the newly created posts by Wilson Government have the formal title of Ministers whereas those who hold older-posts have special titles, for instance the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the President of the Board of Trade. The holders of nine offices (some ancient and others of recent creation) are known as 'Secretaries of State'. The 'Ministers not in the Cabinet' carry the same status as the Cabinet Ministers, receive all the Cabinet conclusions, except those of the utmost secrecy, and take their full share in the Cabinet Committees. But they participate in the deliberations of the Cabinet only when summoned, and matters concerning their departments are under discussion.

Closely connected with it are two other phases. First, to cope with the increased work of the Cabinet, the system of standing Cabinet Committees, which discuss and settle all contentious matters, has been introduced on the extended scale. Secondly, the Labour Government began to meet twice a week whereas before the War one meeting a week was generally sufficient. The War Cabinet of 1940-45, also, met twice a week in the ordinary way, but naturally there were many more special meetings than in peace time, some of them late at night. Now it meets for a few hours once or twice a week during Parliamentary sittings, and rather less frequently when Parliament is not sitting. Additional meetings may be called by the Prime Minister at any time.

16. Derry, K., British Institutions of Today (1948), p. 41.

17. Jennings, I., The Queen's Government, p. 116.

The second significant development of the twentieth century is that the Cabinet has sacrificed much of its party character at periods of national emergencies in the efforts to achieve national solidarity. Britain, it had always been argued and the same conviction holds good even now, hates a coalition, because it is deemed distortion of the Parliamentary system of government. And yet in the inter-War period of about twenty-one years, four years were occupied by Lloyd George's Coalition Ministry surviving from the previous War, and eight years by the National Government headed by MacDonald, Baldwin and Chamberlain which carried on into succeeding War of 1939. There were also two periods of minority government—again a distortion of the Parliamentary system—the Labour Governments of 1924 and 1929-31. Taking, thus, the whole period between 1918 and 1945, less than six years were occupied by governments of the normal type when there was one single-party government with a working majority.¹⁸

Whatever be the demerits of coalition government, this twentieth century development is characteristic of the adaptability of the British people. Jennings, while referring to the War coalition, points out that "the coalition which saved civilization between 1940 and 1945 seems to have been at least as united as the ordinary party government."¹⁹ The National Government in 1932 maintained its unity by the strange device of an "agreement to differ;"²⁰ an exception to collective responsibility.²¹

FEATURE OF THE CABINET GOVERNMENT

The Cabinet is, thus, a wheel within a wheel. Its outside ring consists of a party that has a majority in the House of Commons; the next ring being the Ministry, which contains the men who are most active within that party; and the smallest of all being the Cabinet, containing the real leaders or chiefs. By this means is secured that "unity of party action which depends upon placing the directing power in the hands of 18. These were Bonar Law and Baldwin Governments from October 1922 to January 1924 and the second Baldwin Government from November 1924 to June 1929. Normal single party Government was again restored in 1945 and it continues. The October 1959 elections with a very comfortable majority for the Conservatives ensured its continuance. But the Labour Party in the elections of October 1964 could secure a precarious majority of five only. Now the Labour Party again commands a comfortable majority.

19. Cabinet Government, p. 247.

20. Refer to Laski's admirable thesis, Crisis and the Constitution (1932).

21. The "Samuel Liberals" disagreed with the tariff policy of their colleagues. For a time an "agreement to differ" was observed. Before long, however, they withdrew from the Government.

a body small enough to agree and influential enough to control." The Cabinet is, in brief, the driving and the steering force. But despite its importance, it has no legal status as an organ of Government. Its existence and working hinges upon some well established customs, traditions and precedents. There is, however, one supreme virtue in it. The conventional character of the Cabinet makes it a highly flexible institution easily adjustable to meet emergencies or any other special circumstances. In fact, the stupendous success of the Cabinet system of government in Britain, for the past two and a half centuries, may be properly attributed to the Cabinet's high degree of adaptability. The whole system of Cabinet government is based upon the fact that the government is carried on in the name of the King, by Ministers who are members of the majority party in Parliament, and are responsible to Parliament for all their public acts both individually and collectively. These important features of the Cabinet system of government, which have now become classical, need analysis.

A Constitutional Executive head. In the first place, Cabinet government means that the King is no longer the directing and deciding factor responsible before the nation for the measures taken. The whole of the political and executive power of the Crown is exercised in the King's name by political men who belong normally to the majority party in Parliament. These political men can be criticised, attacked and compelled to answer questions, and they are liable to be turned out of office, if their policy is not approved by Parliament. As the King takes no part in politics, he does not, accordingly, participate in the confidential discussions in which his ministers decide the advice they will give him. In other words, the King does not preside over Cabinet meetings. The abstention of the King from Cabinet meetings was originally a matter of sheer accident, but it was a step of great constitutional importance in the development of the responsible Ministry. It does not, however, mean that the King has nothing to do with the Cabinet and what it does. As Jennings has said, the Monarch "may be said to be almost a member of the Cabinet, and the only non-party member."²² Though, he keeps off the politics, yet he commands a position to influence the decisions of the political leaders constituting the government of the day. But it must be repeated that influence is not power and in the end the Monarch is bound by the Cabinet decision.

Ministers chosen from parliamentary majority. Secondly, Ministers are members of Parliament and generally, in modern times, of the House of Commons, and they are chosen from that party which has a majority in that House. These two facts, taken together, are of fundamental importance. The membership of Parliament gives to Ministers a representative and responsible character. It also binds together the Executive and Legislative authorities and there can be, as such, no working at cross purposes between these two organs of Government. The harmonious collaboration thus brought about ensures a stable and efficient government. Such a government is always responsive to the needs of the people. Moreover, Cabinet Ministers are leaders of the majority in the House of Commons and as leaders they must assume direction of principal activities of Parliament. This offers an effective opportunity to the Executive to present, to advocate, and to defend its views and proposals.

22. Jennings I., Cabinet Government, pp. 327-28.

It is now a well-settled convention that Ministers should be either peers or members of the House of Commons, though there had been exceptional occasions when ministers held office out of Parliament. General Smuts was a Minister without Portfolio and a member of War Cabinet from 1916 until the end of the War without his being a member of Parliament. Sir A.G. Boscawen, as Minister of Agriculture, is another identical case in 1922-23. Ramsay MacDonald and Malcolm MacDonald were both members of the Cabinet though not in Parliament from November 1935 until early in 1936. Patrick Gordon-Walker was the Foreign Secretary in Wilson's Government till he was defeated in the by-election. "The House of Commons is, however, extremely critical of such exceptions.... In truth, the conduct of government business in the House of Commons is such an onerous task that the absence of an important minister places a considerable burden on the rest."²³ Even in the House of Lords the representation of the many departments, the piloting of their legislation, and the explanation of their policy demand the presence of a good number of Ministers and the Ministers of the Crown Act, 1964 recognises the principle that some Ministerial posts must be filled by members of the Lords. "Practical convenience as well as constitutional convention, therefore, compels the Prime Minister to confer office only upon members of Parliament or peers."²⁴ Ministers remain out of Parliament only while they are trying to find seats. If they cannot get in, and are unwilling to be created Peers, they resign from their offices.

Cabinet government means party government. This was explained by Professor Trevelyan in his Romanes Lecture. He said, "The secret of British Constitution as it was developed in the course of the eighteenth century was the steady confidence reposed by the parliamentary majority in the Cabinet of the day. If that confidence is withdrawn every few months government becomes unstable, and men cry out for a despotism, old or new. In eighteenth-century England the requisite confidence of Parliament in the Cabinet could have been obtained in no other manner than through the bond of a party loyalty held in common by the Cabinet and by the majority of the House of Commons."²⁵ Party, therefore, provides the machinery which secures a stable government under a unified command of the politically homogeneous and disciplined leaders.

It was an easy task to form a Ministry from one single political party, which commanded the majority in Parliament, so long as there were only two political parties. With the emergence of the Labour Party in the beginning of the twentieth century, the position became a little uncertain because sometimes it might happen, as it did in 1924 and 1929, that no single party could command a majority with it in the House of Commons. Ramsay MacDonald on both these times formed Government on the distinct support of the Liberal Party. In times of national emergencies and grave crises, like the Economic Depression of 1931, there are Coalition Ministries. But it is a rare feature as a Coalition Government is essentially anomalous in Britain, "because it contradicts the fundamental principle that a Cabinet represents a party united in principle."²⁶ Coalition Government is a combination of strange bed-fellows who pursue rival policies and rival ambitions. The truth of the matter is that "coalitions do not love each other" and except in times of unusually abnormal political circumstances, the Government in Britain has always been a unified whole representing one single political party. The Coalition formed in May, 1940, was a true National Government as it represented all parties. "But its sole aim was the successful prosecution of the War and it failed to survive the defeat of Germany by more than a few weeks. At that point, disagreements about post-War reconstruction proved more fundamental than the common wish to go on to defeat Japan."²⁷

23. Ibid., p. 53.

24. Ibid.

25. As quoted in The English Constitution by Sir Maurice Amos, p. 70.

Leadership of the Prime Minister. The Cabinet is a team which plays the game of politics under the captaincy of the Prime Minister. "The Prime Minister", according to Morley, "is the key-stone of the arch." Although in the Cabinet all its members stand on an equal footing, speak with equal voice and act in unison, yet the Chairman of the Cabinet is the first among equals and occupies a position of exceptional and peculiar authority. He is the leader of the Parliamentary majority and all Ministers work under his accepted leadership. It is true that the Prime Minister is technically appointed by the King, but in practice the choice of the King is "pretty strictly" confined to a man who is designated as a leader of the party.

It is from the time of Walpole we have the convention that the Prime Minister selects his own Ministers. The Ministers, no doubt, are appointed by the King, but in actual practice they are the nominees of the Prime Minister. The King simply receives and endorses the list prepared and presented to him by the Premier. If the Prime Minister has the power to make his Ministers, it is also his constitutional right to unmake them. The identity of the Ministers is not known without the Prime Minister. In 1931, Ramsay MacDonald tendered the resignation of his Cabinet without the knowledge of his colleagues and, in the words of Laski, "with the announcement of the national government the ministers learnt of their own demise." A party lives on party spirit and as an instrument of government it preserves its continuous corporate identity under the leadership of the Prime Minister. All this accounts for unity and close association between Ministers on the one side, and the Cabinet and the Parliamentary majority on the other. Or, as Barker says, "The unity and the corporate character is sustained and maintained by the dominance of the Prime Minister." This is the essence of Ministerial Responsibility.

Ministerial Responsibility. Ministerial Responsibility is the first and foremost principle of the Cabinet system of government and collective responsibility is "Britain's principal contribution to modern political practice." According to Birch the term "responsible Government" may be applied to the British political system in three main respects.²⁷ In the first place, it may be regarded as a characteristic of the British system that governments do not act irresponsibly. That is to say, they do not abuse wide legal powers which they possess. In fact, the various features of the Constitution concentrate considerable power in the hands of the Government of the day. "In this sense, responsible government means 'trustworthy government', and is a general description of the British political culture."²⁸ Secondly, responsible government is responsive to public opinion, and it acts in accordance with the wishes of the majority of the people. The third and the most specific meaning of responsible government is that the government is answerable to Parliament for all its acts. This meaning is based on the principle that Ministers are members of Parliament and secondly, they must be drawn from the majority party and they remain in office so long as they can command the support of the majority of the members of the House of Commons. From this flow the doctrines of collective responsibility of the Government and individual Ministerial responsibility to Parliament.

26. Jennings, I., Cabinet Government, op. cit., p. 246.

27. See Birch's Representative and Responsible Government.

By collective responsibility is meant that all members of the government are collectively responsible for the successes and failures of the Government, and all Ministers share collective responsibility for the policy of the Government. Since Cabinet formulates and determines policy, collective responsibility applies to the Cabinet. It means in principle that individual members of the Cabinet and all others who are not in the Cabinet must share moral responsibility for its decisions.

Implicit in the doctrine of collective responsibility is the unity of the Government. Cabinet is a unit—"a unit as regards the Sovereign and a unit as regards the legislature." Cabinet Government is a party Government and its members (Ministers) come into office as a unit under the leadership of a person whom the party acclaims. All Ministers stand for the political programme of the party and, accordingly, represent the uniformity of political opinion. They must, therefore, swim and sink together because the fall of the Ministry is the fall of the party and consequently is political programme.

The essence of the Cabinet is its solidarity, a 'Common front' and collective responsibility had its origin in the need for Ministers in the eighteenth century to represent a united front to the Monarch on the one hand, and to Parliament on the other. "Today, collective responsibility," writes Punnett, "enables the Government to present a common face to its party supporters inside Parliament, to the party outside Parliament, and to the electorate generally—the maintenance of a united Government front being an essential prerequisite of preservation of party discipline in the House, and to the answering of Opposition and public criticism of Government policy."²⁹

Collective responsibility applies to all Ministers alike, from senior Cabinet Ministers to Junior Ministers and one who is not prepared to defend the Cabinet decision must resign.³⁰ General Peel and three other

28. Punnett, R.M., British Government and Politics, p. 178.

29. Ibid., p. 178

30. Lord Salisbury expressed this rule clearly in 1778: "For all that passes in Cabinet each member of it who does not resign is absolutely and irrevocably responsible, and has no right afterwards to say that he agreed in one
(Continued on next page)

Ministers resigned because they did not agree with and support Disraeli's Reform Bill. Lord Morley and Mr. Burns resigned in 1914 as they could not approve of the decision to go to War. Sir Herbert Samuel and other Liberals, and Viscount Snowden resigned in 1932 because they could not support the Ottawa Agreement. Anthony Eden resigned in 1938 because he was unable to agree with the foreign policy adopted by Neville Chamberlain and the Cabinet. In 1950, when a Junior Minister not in the Cabinet criticised the Government's agricultural policy and resigned immediately afterwards, the Economist commented that he would "have been in a stronger position if he had resigned first and made his criticisms afterwards, rather than transgress an accepted rule of the Constitution."³¹ In 1958, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer resigned because of the disagreement with other Ministers on the question of economic policy, the public could know of the disagreement only when the resignation was announced. The practice as established now is that the doctrine of collective responsibility applies even to the unpaid Parliamentary Private Secretaries. In 1965, Frank Allaun, Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Colonial Secretary, resigned his post because he could not accept government policy towards the crisis in Viet-Nam. In 1967, the Prime Minister forced a group of Parliamentary Private Secretaries to resign when they declined to support specific aspects of Government economic policy.³²

But if a Minister does not resign, then, the decision of the Cabinet is as much his decision as that of his colleagues even if he protested against it in the Cabinet. This means that the Minister must vote for the decision in Parliament and, if necessary, defend it either in Parliament or in public. He cannot rebut the criticism of his opponents on the plea that he did not agree in the decision when the matter was being discussed in the Cabinet. Lord Melbourne emphasised this aspect upon his colleagues after his Cabinet had come to a conclusion on the Corn Laws. He said, "Bye the bye, there is one thing we have not agreed upon, which is, what we are to say. Is it to make our corn dearer or cheaper, or to make the price steady? I do not care which: but we had better all be in the same story." That is to say, all Ministers should vote for the government and tell the same story wherever it was to be told. Gladstone would even insist that a Minister absenting at the time of division in Parliament should be censured.

The duty of a Minister is not merely to support the Government but to refrain from making any speech which is contrary to the Cabinet to a compromise, while in another he was persuaded by the colleagues....

....It is only on this principle that absolute responsibility is undertaken by every member of the cabinet who, after a decision is arrived at remains a member of it, that the joint responsibility of Ministers to Parliament, can be upheld, and one of the most essential principles of parliamentary responsibility established."

31. The Economist, April 22, 1950.

32. In 1838, Lord Fitz Roy, the Vice-Chamberlain, was dismissed from his post for voting against the Government. In 1856, Queen Victoria asked Lord Palmerstone "to make it clear to the subordinate members of the Government that they cannot be allowed to vote against the government proposal about the National Gallery tomorrow, as she hears that several fancy themselves at liberty to do so."

policy or make a declaration of policy in a speech upon which there is no Cabinet decision³³ In 1922, Edwin Montague, the Secretary of State for India, was virtually dismissed, as he had permitted the Government of India to publish a telegram involving major policy without Cabinet sanction. In 1935, the Foreign Secretary, Sir Samuel Hoare, was at least "allowed" by the Baldwin Government to resign, because his secret proposals with the French Premier, Laval, on the Italo-Ethiopian question had met with nation-wide disapproval.³⁴

The Cabinet is, thus, by its nature a unity and collective responsibility is the method by which this unity is secured. There is no other condition upon which that team work, which is the sine qua non of the Cabinet system, can become possible. All Ministers, therefore, whether members of the Cabinet or not, share collective responsibility, including that for Cabinet or Cabinet Committee decisions in the reaching of which they have taken no part whatever. "This may sound rather rough," writes Morrison, and "indeed from time to time it is. But the government must stand together as a whole and Ministers must not contradict each other, otherwise cracks will appear in the government fabric. That is liable to be embarrassing or possibly fatal, and indeed injurious to good government. All this is part of the contract of service. It has to be endured as a condition of acceptance of office." Moreover, collective responsibility begets mutual confidence, and it makes possible that give-and-take in the shaping of policy without which any effective mutual confidence is rarely attained. There is still another reason. If it were regarded as possible for a Cabinet Minister to free himself from the decision of his colleagues, after the course decided upon had proved unsuccessful or unpopular, both the trust and the secrecy which are so essential to the working of the Cabinet would be destroyed. This would further mean that the most private transactions in the Cabinet would of necessity be divulged to the public. Such a position is really frightful because it might lead to the emergence of another body to replace the Cabinet, as the Cabinet once upon a time replaced the Privy Council, as organ for the discussion of policy.

Collective responsibility means, then, that an attack on a Minister is attack on Government. It also means that members of the Cabinet express a common opinion. To repeat the phrase used by Lord Melbourne, "they must all be in the same story." The theory of the Cabinet is that

33. The duty of the minister in respect of speeches was stated by Lord Palmerston in a letter to Mr. Gladstone in 1864: "A member of the government when he takes office necessarily divests himself of that perfect freedom of action which belongs to a private and independent member of Parliament, and the reason is this, that what a member of the Government does and says upon public matters must to a certain degree commit his colleagues, and the body to which he belongs if they by their silence appear to acquiesce; and if any of them follow his example and express publicly opposite opinions, which in particular cases they might feel obliged to do, differences of opinion between members of the same government are necessarily brought out into prominence and the strength of the government is thereby impaired."

34. "Subsequent action by the Cabinet showed that it really shared the Foreign Secretary's views, and in a few months he was back as First Lord of the Admiralty. For the time being, however, he was encouraged to make himself a scapegoat."

it must not disagree. Of course, it sometimes does, but not in public. To put it in the poignant words of Lord Morrison, "It must not seem to disagree."³³ Ministers must aim at preserving not only the spirit "but the appearance of Cabinet solidarity."³⁴ Collective responsibility is associated with the cognate principle of Cabinet secrecy. Disclosures of Cabinet discussions plague the Government and bring into open a Cabinet split. "A Cabinet split," as Jennings says, "may become a party split and a party split may lose the next election."³⁵

The idea of collective responsibility, as said earlier, first developed in the eighteenth century as a protection for Ministers against the King, and then it grew as a device for maintaining the strength and unity of the party. In 1782 there occurred the first example of the collective resignation of a Ministry, when Lord North resigned in anticipation of a certain parliamentary defeat. All his Ministers, with one exception of the Lord Chancellor, resigned with him. Following this, Pitt did a great deal to develop conventions relating to collective responsibility and by 1832, it was well-recognised. But the concept of "responsible government," that the Government should resign if it lost the confidence of Parliament, appears not to have been introduced "into British political debates until as late as 1829, and then in relation to Canada rather than Britain."³⁶ After the Reform Act, 1832, it came to be regarded as axiomatic that the Government must respond to a Parliamentary defeat on a major issue. Peel resigned in 1835, saying that he considered "that the Government ought not to persist in carrying on public affairs...in opposition to the decided opinion of a majority of the House of Commons."³⁷ Since then, the collective responsibility of the Cabinet to Parliament became a cardinal feature of British politics. The last instances where a single Minister resigned on an adverse vote of the House of Commons were those of Mr. Lowe in 1864, and Lord Chancellor Westbury in 1864. It does not, however, mean that no Minister does resign individually if ever he incurs the wrath of Parliament or his public transactions prove highly unpopular with the public. If the causes of complaint were an official indiscretion or misconduct on the part of a Minister, he would be asked to resign voluntarily before his conduct comes under fire and is forced out of office by a hostile vote in the House. J.H. Thomas was asked to resign in 1936, because of the leakage in the budget.⁴⁰ Sir Hugh Dalton, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had to resign because of a similar indiscretion.⁴¹ Sir Samuel Hoare resigned in 1935 before the House could

35. Lord Morrison, British Parliamentary Democracy, p. 13.

36. Ibid., p. 14.

37. Jennings I., The Queen's Government, p. 119.

38. Birch, A.H., Representative and Responsible Government, An Essay on the British Constitution, p. 131.

39. As quoted in above p. 135.

40. J.H. Thomas was the Colonial Secretary. He betrayed budget secrets to two friends. The information so conveyed enabled them to save themselves from some taxes.

41. Sir Hugh Dalton gave a reporter some advance information in the budget and this appeared in the reporter's newspaper fifteen minutes before the Chancellor of the Exchequer rose in his place in the House of Commons to deliver his budget speech.

condemn his Italo-Ethiopian proposals.⁴² John Profumo, the War Secretary in the Macmillan Government, resigned because he had lied to the House of Commons in denying improper relations with the model, Christine Keeler. In a letter to the Prime Minister, Profumo wrote, "I have come to realize that by this deception, I have been guilty of a grave misdemeanour."

"It is not possible", says Finer, "to operate collective responsibility without a safety valve: individual scapegoats," and he assigns two reasons for it. First, there are more departmental policies and it becomes unreal to impute responsibility to all of them jointly. Secondly, if a Cabinet could be overthrown every time on trivial matters or it involved some error on the part of an individual Minister and Parliament was not prepared to condone it, it may mean too many reorganizations of the Cabinet. "It could not be tolerated," concludes Finer, "in the British economic and social system, where a high degree of stability and continuity of policy is essential to the standard of living and the peace of mind of the population."⁴³

If the question were on policy, then, the Government would, save in very exceptional cases, assume the responsibility of that policy, treating a hostile vote as a vote of no confidence in itself. Ogg graphically sums up this aspect of ministerial responsibility. He writes: "When a Minister either because of his own action or because of actions of a subordinate for which he is responsible—falls into such a predicament, he is not left by his colleagues merely to sink or swim while they look on from the distant shore. Either they jump in and push him under, or they haul him into their boat and accept his fate as their own; in other words, they repudiate him and throw him out before his trouble drags him down or they rally to his support and make common cause with him. The latter course is pursued far more frequently than the former—so much so that Cabinet solidarity and, therefore, collective responsibility, may normally be taken for granted."⁴⁴ L.S. Amery, a Cabinet Minister at various times between 1922 and 1945, puts it rather more succinctly. "The essence of our Cabinet system", he says, "is the collective responsibility of its members. All major decisions of policy are, or are supposed to be, those of the Cabinet as a whole. They are supported by speech and vote by all its members, and, indeed, by all the members of the Government in the wider sense of the word. The rejection or condemnation by Parliament of the action taken upon them affects the Cabinet as a whole, and is followed, if the issue is one of sufficient importance, by its resignation. The secrecy of Cabinet proceedings, originally based on the Privy Councillor's oath and antecedent to collective responsibility, is in any case the natural correlative of that collective responsibility. It would obviously be impossible for ministers to make an effective defence in public of decisions with which it was known that they had dis-

42. Sir Samuel Hoare concluded a secret pact with Premier Laval of France that about half of Ethiopia be given to Italy with a view to ending the war then going on between Italy and Ethiopia.

43. Finer, H., Government of Greater European Powers, op. cit., p. 151.

44. Ogg, F., and Zink, H., Modern Foreign Governments, op. cit., p. 103.

agreed in the course of Cabinet discussion."⁴⁵

Birch, however, is of the opinion that while the doctrine of collective responsibility remains unchanged, its practical importance has been greatly reduced with the diminution of Parliamentary power as a result of the growth of party discipline.⁴⁶ "The idea underlying the doctrine of collective responsibility," he maintains, "is that the government should be held continuously accountable for its actions, so that it always faces the possibility that a major mistake may result in a withdrawal of Parliamentary support. In the modern British political system it does not happen."⁴⁷ A major blunder in the policy of the Government may lead to an immediate and sharp swing in the public opinion, but the Government thrives upon its Parliamentary majority and firmly holds on to office. The Government, thus, gets an "ample opportunity to recapture public support before the next general election is held." The Labour Government of 1945-50 survived through the fuel crisis of 1947, the collapse of its Palestine Policy in 1948, and the fiasco of the ground-nuts scheme in 1949. In 1950 it was returned to power, though with a reduced majority. The Conservative Government of 1955-59 succeeded not only in surviving after the debacle of Suez, but winning an increased majority at the next election.⁴⁸

Birch, therefore, concludes "that the doctrine of collective responsibility does not occupy the place in the present political system that it commonly claimed for it." A crisis that would have brought down a Government "a hundred years ago now acts as an opportunity for its Parliamentary supporters to give an impressive display of party loyalty, and stimulates its leaders to hold on to the reins of power until public attention is diverted to a sphere of policy which puts the Government in a more favourable light." It, no doubt, ensures a common front, but in the zeal to maintain it, the traditional sanctity which collective responsibility carried with it does not exist any more. According to the new usage of responsibility, "a government is acting responsibly, not when it submits to Parliamentary control but when it takes effective measures to dominate it."⁴⁹ If ever it permits its members, as it did in 1956 on the question of free capital punishment and in 1959 on the Street Offences Bill, a free vote, the Government is accused of "evading responsibility."⁵⁰

Secrecy and Party Solidarity. The Cabinet is, therefore, a secret body, collectively responsible for its decisions. It deliberates in secret

45. Thoughts on the Constitution, p. 70.

46. Birch, A.H., Representative and Responsible Government, An Essay on the British Constitution, pp. 136-37.

47. Ibid., p. 137.

48. Ibid.

49. Ibid., p. 138.

50. "On some issues where there is no clear party line, the members of government are sometimes allowed to join in the 'luxury' of a free vote, uninhibited by the Party Whips or by the doctrine of collective responsibility. Even on some occasions when back benchers are allowed a free vote, however, the government's collective view is often made clear. The government is expected to give lead on practically all issues, and for the government not to do so can be seen as an abdication of duty." Punnett, R.M., British Government and Politics, p. 180.

and its proceedings are highly confidential. The secrecy of Cabinet proceedings is safeguarded by law and convention. The Privy Councillor's Oath⁵¹ imposes an obligation not to disclose Cabinet secrets. The Official Secrets Act of 1920, forbids communication to unauthorized persons of official documents and information and provides legal penalties for disclosures made as such.⁵² But the effective sanction is neither of these two. The rule is primarily one of practice. Its theoretical basis is that a Cabinet decision is advice to the King and the monarch's sanction is necessary before its publication. Its practical foundation is "The necessity of securing free discussion by which a compromise can be reached, without the risk of publicity for every statement made and every point given away."⁵³ There must be, as Lord Salisbury said, "irresponsible licence in discussion,"⁵⁴ if mature, rational and independent contribution to the process of policy making is desired from men who are engaged in a common cause and who come together for the purpose of reaching an agreement. It is, therefore, essential that Ministers deliberating in a Cabinet meeting should speak freely and frankly, "toss their thoughts across the table, make tentative propositions and withdraw them when the difficulties are pointed out, express their doubts without reserve, discuss personalities as well as principles."⁵⁵ This kind of discussion cannot be conducted in the public. Nor can anybody express his opinions without reserve if he knows that it is likely to be quoted in Parliament or in the press. Publicity reduces the independence of mind of Ministers in relation to each other and harmony of views becomes impossible if there is a chance that whatever they speak will be broadcast. Moreover, a knowledge of divergence of opinion offers vulnerable points to the attacks of the Opposition which is always on its toes to plague the party in power. Secrecy is of special urgency in these days of high nationalism and warlike friction between impassioned nations "so that the Cabinet's state of mind may not be made the subject of distracted and inflammatory debate until it has arrived at a considered policy". Secrecy is, thus, an essential part of the Parliamentary system. Secrecy helps to produce political unanimity and political unanimity is a

51. The main terms in the oath of the Privy Councillor deserve notice:

"You shall swear to be a true and faithful servant unto the Queen's Majesty, as one of Her Majesty's Privy Council.... You shall, in all things to be moved, treated and debated in Council, faithfully and truly declare your Mind and Opinion according to your heart and conscience, and shall keep secret all Matters committed and revealed unto you or that shall be treated of secretly in Council. And if any of the said Treaties or Councils shall touch any of the Councillors, you shall not reveal it unto him, but shall keep the same until such times as, by consent of Her Majesty, or the Council, Publication shall be made thereof."

52. Mr. Edgar Lansbury, son of a former Cabinet Minister George Lansbury, was fined in 1934 for publishing a memorandum submitted to the Labour Cabinet of 1929-31 by his father.

53. Jennings, I., Cabinet System, op. cit., p. 248.

54. Lord Salisbury declared that privacy of discussion "could only be made completely effective if the flow of suggestions which accompanied it attained the freedom and fulness which belonged to private conversations—members must feel themselves untrammelled by any consideration of consistency with the past or self-justification in the future." Cecil, Gwendolen, Life of Lord Salisbury, Vol. II, p. 223.

55. Jennings, I., The Queen's Government, p. 121.

very important condition of party solidarity, which in its turn assists secrecy. Both "help to concentrate responsibility on a single unit, the Cabinet, and since no exact discrimination appears before the real and supposed authors of a policy until long after the event, the more care has to be taken about the inclusion of people in the Cabinet, for no one may be included who is so incapable as to cause its better members to fall."

A difficulty obviously arises when a Minister or Ministers feel bound to resign as a result of serious Cabinet division. A Minister who resigns from the Cabinet usually desires to make an explanation in Parliament. Since this involves an explanation of Cabinet discussion, the Minister concerned must secure the permission of the King through the Prime Minister,⁵⁶ and it is always given. But the Minister's right is limited to the explanation of the circumstances which led to his resignation. It "gives no licence to make further disclosures."⁵⁷ He must not disclose other occasions on which he differed from the rest of the Cabinet. This is an important precaution. "Usually the issue on which a Cabinet Minister resigns is not an isolated incident. It is the culmination of a series of disagreements, the straw which broke the camel's back. If he gives a long history of disagreements the other members must disclose why they disagreed with him, and much of the procedure of the Cabinet will inevitably come into public discussion. Such discussion is not merely unfortunate for the party in power; it is undesirable in the public interest; for if there is a risk that his remarks will be disclosed, no Minister will be able to speak freely and frankly."⁵⁸

Some other means also exist by which more or less reliable information respecting views expressed or decisions taken often get out. "There are few Cabinet meetings," observes Laski, "in which the modern Press is not a semi-participant."⁵⁹ During the War of 1914-18, the representatives of the press were able to secure information from the Prime Minister's Secretariat in the "Garden Suburb". Since then the Prime Minister or some other Minister, on his behalf, gives to the press a guarded statement in order to promote opinion about the policy they intend to pursue. Professor Laski makes a bold statement when he says, "and there have been fewer Cabinets still in which some member has not been in fairly confidential relations with one eminent journalist or another."⁶⁰ Revelations

56. Lord Melbourne objected in 1834 to the King's giving consent without consultation with the Prime Minister. He maintained that for the King to act direct would be "subversive...of all the principles upon which the government of this country has hitherto been conducted."

57. Lord Derby in 1878 received the Queen's permission to make an explanation to Parliament after his resignation. In reply to Lord Derby's explanation, General Ponsonby wrote: "Her Majesty expects that, whenever a Privy Councillor makes any statement in Parliament respecting proceedings in Her Majesty's Council, the Queen's permission to do so should first be solicited, and the object of the statement made clear; and that the permission thus given should only serve for the particular instance, and not be considered as an open licence."

58. Jennings, The Queen's Government, p. 121.

59. Laski, H.J., Parliamentary Government in England, p. 255.

60. Ibid.

also occasionally appear in the writings of former Cabinet Ministers, especially when in a Cabinet crisis like that of 1931, Ministers are keen to have their position and the stand they took clarified.

Down to the time of the First World War no record was kept of matters discussed or actions taken in the Cabinet meetings. The taking of notes other than by the Prime Minister was long forbidden. The Ministers would simply indicate to their departments what the decisions were, if they could remember what exactly concerned their departments.⁶¹ This system of Cabinet proceedings, however, completely broke down under the stress of War and "one of the first acts of Lloyd George was to institute a Cabinet Secretariat to organize the business of the War Cabinet. The Machinery of Government Committee in 1918 recommended that the Secretariat should be permanently maintained "for the purpose of collecting and putting into shape agenda, of providing the information and the material necessary for its deliberations, and of drawing up the results for communication to the departments concerned."⁶² In 1922, Bonar Law desired to abolish it, but its utility by then had been clearly established and it was decided to continue with it though its function were narrowly defined.⁶³

Cabinet records are strictly confidential and no formal reports of proceedings are published.⁶⁴ Great care is taken to ensure the secrecy of the Cabinet minutes. The Secretary to the Cabinet has instructions that while drafting minutes he should avoid reference to opinions expressed by any individual member and to limit the minutes "as narrowly as possible to the actual decision agreed to." The minimum staff is employed in the reproduction of the minutes and all notes are destroyed as they are transcribed. Then, the copies are sealed immediately in special envelopes addressed to the Ministers, and law officers entitled to receive them. These envelopes are locked in the Cabinet boxes and delivered by special messengers. A record copy is kept in the Cabinet office under the immediate control of the Secretary.⁶⁵

61. During Asquith's Government it was quite common for a minister's private secretary to telephone to the Prime Minister's private secretary to ask what the decision had been.

62. As quoted in Jennings' Cabinet Government, op. cit., p. 226.

63. The functions of the Cabinet Secretariat are:

(a) to circulate the memoranda and other documents required for the business of the Cabinet and its Committees;

(b) to compile under the direction of the Prime Minister the agenda of the Cabinet and, under the direction of the Chairman, the agenda of a Cabinet Committee;

(c) to issue summons of meetings of the Cabinet and its Committees;

(d) to take down and circulate the conclusions of the Cabinet and its Committees and to prepare the reports of Cabinet Committees; and

(e) to keep, subject to the instructions of the Cabinet, the Cabinet papers and conclusions.

Attached to the Cabinet office, and an integral part of it, is the Central Statistical Office.

64. Two partial reports were, however, published in 1917 and 1918.

65. Jennings, I., Cabinet Government, p. 254.

CHAPTER V

THE CABINET AT WORK

Meetings of the Cabinet. The Cabinet now meets usually twice a week during session of Parliament and once a week out of it or possibly not at all during the autumn recess. Additional meetings may be called by the Prime Minister at any time, if a matter urgently requiring discussion should arise. It is not tied to any one place but ordinarily meets at 10 Downing Street, the official residence of the Prime Minister. Sometimes it meets in the Prime Minister's room at the House of Commons. The agenda for the meeting is prepared by the Cabinet Secretariat which is circulated among the members before they meet. A Minister who wishes to place an item on the agenda, after setting it with his officials that the matter is worth the Cabinet's consideration, writes a paper on it for the use of his colleagues. The Secretariat will print it and circulate it among all the members of the Cabinet, if possible a week before the meeting. The other Ministers look into it, partly for the general principles involved and partly for its probable effects on the Departments under their charge. They may discuss its implications with the Minister initiating the proposal for the policy or his officers in the Department and if they feel necessary print papers of their own on it for the Cabinet. It is from these communications that the Secretariat prepares the agenda in consultation with the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister opens the meeting informally and he may bring any matter not on the agenda, if he deems it necessary. The members discuss issues and reach decisions, avoiding, of course, details. As a rule, it concentrates on principles only. The Ministers discuss until agreement is reached. Votes are not taken. "That would be shocking!" says Lord Morrison. "That would give the whole thing away. That would exhibit a disunity in the Cabinet."

Cabinet Committees. The burden of the Cabinet, as Finer puts it, "is Titanic." It cannot adequately meet its huge task. In its traditional form, it is a general controlling body and it usually meets twice a week and that too far a few, generally two, hours at a time. Then, it has too many members for effective discussion and many of them are departmental Ministers and they are too pre-occupied in their departmental duties. The Cabinet, therefore, neither desires nor is able to tackle all the numerous details of Government. The result is the emergence of the Cabinet Committees.

1. Lord Morrison, British Parliamentary Democracy, p. 14. If there is a narrow division of opinion and the Prime Minister does not know which side of the argument is in the minority, the problem is solved by the stratagem of collecting the voices. The Prime Minister "goes right round the table saying to each Minister: 'Are you for or against?'" This is collecting the voices. Somebody under the counter, so to speak, probably the secretary of the cabinet, is making a little slip and counting up these for and against. Certainly he adds up the figure on each side. Now that's not taking a vote. The British will not wish to admit doing naughty things even if we have to remedy matters 'under the counter.' So that is collecting the voices", Ibid.

The origin of the system of standing Cabinet Committees can be traced back to the Committee of the Imperial Defence, which was formed in 1902 as a permanent Committee to supplement the Cabinet's general responsibility for defence. Cabinet Committees had been formed earlier too to deal with particular questions, but the Imperial Defence Committee was the first Standing Committee of the Cabinet. A Home Affairs Committee was created in 1919 and more standing Committees emerged in the inter-War period. With the Second World War an extensive Cabinet Committee system was adopted as the basis of the means of co-ordinating the expanding governmental machine. Attlee retained this Committee system in 1945, and he had some fifteen Committees composed of Cabinet and non-Cabinet Ministers, each presided over by a senior member of the Cabinet.

Some of the Cabinet Committees are continuous and, thus, permanent bodies; others are ad hoc, i.e., created for single time-limited matter; dealing with a special problem or a critical situation and composed of the Ministers primarily concerned. They deliberate, report and disband. Some important Standing Committees of the Cabinet are: (1) The Legislation Committee, formerly known as the Home Affairs Committee. The functions of the Legislation Committee are to review legislation proposed by individual Ministers, make recommendations to the Cabinet on legislative priorities, set their time-table and to consider the parliamentary procedure to be followed to help the passage of the Bill; (2) The Defence Committee is one of the largest and most important. It was first set up in World War II with the Prime Minister as Chairman. Its membership includes the Minister of Defence, the Lord President of the Council, the Foreign Secretary, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Supply, the First Lord of the Admiralty, and the Secretaries of State for War, Air, Commonwealth Relations, and Colonies. It is advised by the Chiefs of Staff Committees consisting of the professional heads of the three military services. The Defence Committee concerns itself with the present and future defence problems, the preparation of plans over the whole field of government activity, both civil and military, for mobilising the entire resources of the nation in case of war and then the problems of reconstruction in the post-war period; (3) The Lord President's Committee, presided over by the Lord President; (4) The Economic Policy Committee, with the Prime Minister as Chairman; and (5) The Production Committee.

The number and composition of the Cabinet Committees are largely determined by the Prime Minister, "and he is guided by his own working methods, the nature of the problems which his Cabinet faces, and the talents and temperaments of his ministerial associates." Names of the Committee members and their Chairmen are kept private. The Chairmen of the Committees are responsible to the Cabinet, and not to Parliament, for their role as Committee Chairmen. "Despite the anonymity," writes Punnett, "the Chairmanship of a Cabinet Committee involves a lot of work, and the need to include in the Cabinet sufficient men capable of filling the role is one of the factors that a Prime Minister has to bear in mind when forming his government."

"The Cabinet Committees," says Dr. Siner, "are deliberative or action-integrative, sometimes both." They provide a means whereby certain problems and issues can be studied and discussed by Ministers most concerned and some kind of compromise reached before they are brought before the whole Cabinet. It obviously assists consideration of a subject in Cabinet meetings if the principal issues involved have been identified and thrashed out by a small ministerial group and agreed recommendations submitted. Cabinet Committees are also useful to co-ordinate policy and administration. The political, economic, social and administrative implications of the most vexed and the complex problems can be investigated and ways and means devised to mobilize efforts for their fulfilment and, at the same time, help to eliminate conflicts or duplication of programmes. Moreover, Committees can be employed to keep a critical problem under continuous review. It is neither possible nor desirable for the whole Cabinet to concentrate its attention on any aspect of national policy for an indefinite period of time. Finally, by including non-Cabinet Ministers the Committee system can extend the Cabinet's co-ordinating activity to wider areas of governmental affairs. It is not also uncommon for senior members of the permanent services to attend as advisers to their Ministers. There are certain Cabinet Committees which have no political importance and civil servants are made full-fledged members of these committees with the right to speak when they are asked for advice, maintaining of course, the responsibility of the Ministers for policy.

The Committees, thus combine two functions: co-ordinating the departments, and decentralizing the policy. They customarily report to the whole Cabinet and seek to submit agreed reports and recommendations. But a Minister who is not satisfied with the recommendations of the Committee can appeal to the Cabinet, where, under the Chairmanship of the Prime Minister, differences are tried to be resolved. If the dissenting Minister still does not reconcile himself to the Cabinet decision, the only course left for him is to resign.

Cabinet Secretariat. We traced in the last Chapter the origin of the Cabinet Secretariat. Today, the Secretariat has become an indispensable part of the machinery of government. It prepares an agenda of business, under the guidance of the Prime Minister, to come before the Cabinet and circulates to Cabinet Ministers any memoranda or Committee reports that they must study before undertaking the discussion of items on the agenda of the Cabinet meeting. It keeps a record of the minutes and advises members of the decisions reached in the meetings. It also serves the various Cabinet Committees and integrates their progress.

During the Second World War the Cabinet offices were expanded to include besides the Secretariat proper an Economic Section and a Central Statistical Office. The Economic Section maintains a constant watch on the economic trends and developments and advises the Cabinet as they affect the country and its people. It prepares the annual Economic Surveys of the nation's targets and the planning for production and capital investment. The Central Statistical Office was established "to produce a developing statistical series, general and comprehensive in nature, to be an index to economic, and social trends." It publishes the Monthly Digest of Statistics.

2. Punnet, R.M., British Government and Politics, p. 209.

FUNCTIONS OF THE CABINET

"Thus, the Cabinet is surrounded by expert help channelled to it or its committees or to individual Ministers, marshalled as and when the Cabinet needs it to be used as its wisdom requires. Going up to the Cabinet are sifted facts and sifted evaluations and ideas. From it outward and downward to the departmental officials flow will, policies, and desires asking guidance, counsel, facts."³ This is how the Cabinet is enabled to perform its arduous and complex functions to work the Government. The Report of the Machinery of Government Committee officially defined the functions of the Committee as:⁴

- (i) The final determination of policy to be submitted to Parliament;
- (ii) The supreme control of the national executive in accordance with the policy prescribed by Parliament; and
- (iii) The continuous co-ordination and delimitation of the activities of the several Departments of the State.

Policy-determining functions. The Cabinet, as said before, is a deliberative and policy-formulating body. It discusses and decides all sorts of national and international problems, and attempts to reach unanimous agreements among members regarding the Government's policy concerning each. However, much the members may disagree among themselves, they must present to Parliament and to the world a united front. If an individual member finds it impossible to agree with the conclusions of the Cabinet, the only course left for him is to resign.

When the Cabinet has determined on a policy, the appropriate department carries it out either by administrative action, within the framework of the existing law, or by submitting a new Bill to Parliament so as to change the law. Legislation is, thus, the handmaid of administration and the Cabinet is the instrument which, according to Bagehot, links the Executive branch of government to the Legislative. The Cabinet directs Parliament for action in a certain way and so long as it can command a majority in the House of Commons, it gets the approval of the sovereign organ of the State—Parliament. This is how the Cabinet asks Parliament to take necessary steps with a view to carry the policy determined into effect.

These are essentially the legislative activities of the Cabinet. But we cannot make a vivid distinction between legislation and administration. "In the modern State," writes Jennings, "most legislation is directed towards the creation or modification of administrative powers." The Cabinet, accordingly, plans the legislative programme at the beginning of each session of Parliament. Public Bills are introduced and piloted in Parliament usually by a Cabinet Minister or by some other Minister acting on Cabinet's approval. In legislation, the control of the Cabinet over the Ministry is complete, for no Bill can be promoted except with its sanction, and the Legislation Committee of the Cabinet discusses at the beginning of each session what Bills shall be promoted in a session. In short, it is no exaggeration to say that the Cabinet legislates with the advice and consent of Parliament. Summing up the policy determining functions of the Cabinet, we may conclude with Ogg that the Cabinet Ministers "formulate policies, make decisions, and draft Bills on all significant matters which in their judgment require legislative attention, asking of Parliament only that it give effect to such decisions and policies by considering them and taking the necessary votes." So long as the Government has a majority in Parliament, it is rare to challenge Cabinet policy. The Cabinet takes office if it thinks it enjoys the confidence of Parliament, and once in office Cabinets tend to act as masters rather than servants of Parliament.

3. Finer, H., Governments of the Greater European Powers, op. cit. pp. 167-68.

4. The Committee was set up in 1918 to review the machinery of government in Britain. It was presided over by Lord Haldane and is popularly known as the Haldane Committee.

Supreme control of the National Executive. The Cabinet is not an Executive instrument in the sense that it possesses any legal powers. Legally, the Executive power still vests in the King, though practically the Crown is the Executive. But the Crown is rather a concept than a tangible authority. The real authority that acts for the Crown and in its name are Ministers. These Ministers, except for the holders of three or four sinecure offices,⁵ preside over the major Departments of government and carry out the policy determined by the Cabinet and approved by Parliament. In carrying out the work of their Departments, Ministers, whether in the Cabinet or not, scrupulously follow the directions of the Cabinet and enforce its decisions and policies. Any deviation therefrom is against the rigid discipline of the party government and may consequently lead to the removal of a Minister.

As heads of the Departments, the Ministers are responsible for the policies pursued by their Departments and for their administrative efficiency. They decide policy issues that arise in their Departments, give instructions to their principal subordinates and supervise the Departmental activities to such an extent as to enable them to know that their Departments work in the desired direction. The Ministers are also answerable to Parliament for all acts of omission and commission and, accordingly, they must look for the efficient management of departmental business and see that it is responsive to the needs of the people.

The Cabinet may adopt the device of Orders-in-Council, instead of going to Parliament for approval, to give effect to some more general line of policy including even a declaration of war. Both the World Wars were declared by Orders-in-Council. The supreme national Executive is, therefore, the Cabinet. The power of delegated legislation has still more enhanced Cabinet's Executive authority. Parliament may give to the King-in-Council, to individual Ministers of the Crown or to other persons or bodies the right to make rules and regulations. Legislation, during recent times, has become more voluminous and more technical. Parliament, accordingly, frequently passes laws in skeleton form, leaving it to the Cabinet or Ministers to fill the gaps and make rules and regulations in order to give effect to those laws as and when need arises.

5. Non-Departmental Ministers are: The Lord President of Council, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the Lord Privy Seal, the Paymaster-General and Ministers without Portfolio.

• The Cabinet as a co-ordinator. The essential function of the Cabinet is to co-ordinate and guide the functions of the several Departments of Government. Administration cannot be rigidly divided into twenty or more Departments. The action of one Department may affect the work of another Department and indeed every important problem cuts across departmental boundaries. A foreign policy decision must often be made by relation to defence and trade policy. An educational policy decision may affect health, labour or taxation policy. Even if no other Department is affected, it certainly concerns the Treasury Department. The Cabinet does the vital task of co-ordinating policy and its implementation. "This means not only the linking of specific administrative decisions by reference to a general policy, but the expression of the same general policy in legislation." On purely inter-departmental matters, the Departments endeavour to resolve their differences and try to reach agreement. If they cannot agree, the Prime Minister might act as an arbitrator and co-ordinator. In the last resort, there is appeal to the Cabinet.⁶

The emergence of the Cabinet Committees and the increased problem of co-ordination has brought about a significant expansion in the work of the Cabinet office. The Prime Minister and the Chairmen of the Cabinet Committees now primarily rely upon the corps of their expert assistants in the Cabinet Secretariat to supply them with the requisite information and advice in integrating the work of the different Departments. The functions of the Cabinet Secretariat, inter alia, are: to take down and circulate the conclusions of the Cabinet and its Committees and to prepare the reports of Cabinet Committees. "The Cabinet Secretariat," writes Herbert Morrison, "has now become an important element in the organisation of Government. It serves not only the Cabinet but also its Committees and at times, ad hoc meetings of selected Ministers to settle a particular matter which may be a subject of inter-departmental disagreement."

Apart from the Cabinet Committees, the most ambitious post-1945 experiment in the co-ordination of government Departments was the system of "Overlords" introduced by Sir Winston Churchill in his 1951-55 Government. In 1951 Cabinet of sixteen members formed by Churchill

6. The Cabinet instructions are that proposals affecting other Departments must not be submitted to the Cabinet until they have been thoroughly discussed with those Departments at the official level, and if necessary with the Ministers. Wherever there is a conflict of interest between Departments, it should not be submitted to the Cabinet unless all possibilities of agreement at lower level have been explored and exhausted. Jennings, I., Cabinet Government, p. 228.

there were six Peers three of whom were "Overlords" entrusted with the task of co-ordinating various Departments. Lord Leathers was Minister for the Co-ordination of Transport, Fuel and Power; Lord Cherwell was Paymaster-General and he was to co-ordinate scientific research and development; and Lord Woolton, Lord President of the Council, was to co-ordinate the work of the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries and the Ministry of Food. Lord Alexander was made Minister of Defence in 1952 thereby increasing the number of "Overlords" to four. The object of Churchill's scheme was to group and co-ordinate the Departments by means other than the Cabinet Committee system and as such to reorganise the nature and structure of Cabinet composition.

But there were a number of weaknesses in the system, especially the confusion that it caused as to who was the responsible Minister, the Departmental Minister or the 'Overlord'. Since the 'Overlords' were Peers and were thus not accountable to the House of Commons, the Opposition attacked the system as it threatened the authority of the House of Commons. After the 1952 Transport crisis, the experiment of 'Overlords' was gradually abandoned.

Two more functions may be added to those enumerated above:

The Cabinet is responsible for the whole expenditure of the State and for raising necessary revenues to meet it. The annual Budget statement is, no doubt, excluded from the scope of the Cabinet decisions, but being a matter of political importance, it is always brought before the Cabinet and the Chancellor of the Exchequer makes an oral statement about it a few days⁷ before his Budget speech in the House of Commons. The reason for this peculiar procedure is the fundamental importance of secrecy. But it is within the discretion of the Cabinet to ask for longer notice and effective discussion.⁸ On the estimates, the control of the Cabinet is complete.⁹ With regard to new proposals for taxation, if they involve any major change of taxation policy, they must be considered at length before the Budget is produced. Winston Churchill said in 1937, that "although the general layout of financial policy should emanate from the Chancellor of the Exchequer personally, and should be submitted to the Cabinet only in its final form, there ought to be, and there nearly always has been a special procedure in respect of new and novel imposts . . . It would be, in my opinion, a departure from custom, for any Chancellor of the Exchequer to present to a Cabinet, only a few days before the opening of the Budget, some great schemes of new taxation, which had not been examined." Moreover, the Cabinet can always insist on modifications after the Budget has been presented to Parliament. The Cabinet can also overthrow a Budget altogether, at the risk of the resignation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in deference to parliamentary or public opinion.

7. The usual time is four or five days.

8. In 1860 the Cabinet asked for details of Gladstone's Budget a month before it was announced. As the financial year had not then closed, Gladstone was unable to agree, but he gave a week's notice.

9. It was a result of Cabinet disagreement on the estimate that Lord Randolph Churchill resigned in 1866, and Gladstone in 1894.

Appointments do not normally come before the Cabinet. But all major appointments to great offices of the State, at home and abroad, are the responsibility of the Cabinet. The employment of a member of the Royal Family as Governor-General must always be dealt with by the Cabinet. Similarly, certain key positions like the Secretaryship to the Treasury, or the Office of the Chief Planning Officer might be made with the approval of the Cabinet. In the case of the Viceroy of India, the Cabinet had on several occasions intervened because this post had always been considered of special importance. In the case of Mr. Sinha's appointment to the Governor-General's Council the Cabinet was consulted. "The King objected to the principle of appointing to that Council any Indian, and only agreed to the appointment when the Cabinet unanimously advised that the appointment should be made as part of the reform scheme in India."¹⁰

Dictatorship of the Cabinet. "A body which wields such powers," observes Ramsay Muir, "as these may fairly be described as 'omnipotent' in theory, however, incapable it may be of using its omnipotence. Its position, whenever it commands a majority, is a dictatorship only qualified by publicity. This dictatorship is far more absolute than it was two generations ago."¹¹ A Government which has a real majority can be reasonably certain of maintaining itself in power as long as Parliament lasts. This almost mechanical source of power makes Cabinet a powerful institution. It determines how most of the time available in the House of Commons shall be used. It decides which proposals to change the law it will submit to Parliament. Then, it possesses the means to see that all measures so submitted become the Acts of Parliament. The rigidity of the party discipline enjoins upon all members to attend Parliament at the crucial moment of voting and the "energy of whip's organisation" assures blind support to the party. Woe betide a member who has no satisfactory explanation for ignoring a three line whip. But the most effective weapon to keep the House under control is the Prime Minister's power of dissolution. The dissolution, as Jennings says, "can hold the member's head like a big stick." No individual member likes to take the risk of an election contest. It demands both time and money and at the end of it he may not be returned. There is, therefore, unflinching obedience to the Whip and so long as the rank and file of the Government supporters obey the Whip, the Cabinet will remain supreme. Amery had maintained that Parliamentary Government was already dead and had been replaced by Cabinet Government. Summing up the whole process of development Brogan and Verney maintain, "The struggle of the seventeenth century was between the House of Commons and the King. More recently the Commons have fought the Lords, and in both battles the Commons was triumphant. Or at least it appeared to be. It is apparent today, as it was not to Bagehot a hundred years ago, that much of the power has in fact been transferred not to the Commons but to the Cabinet."¹²

10. Keith, A.B., The British Cabinet System, p. 91.

11. Ramsay Muir, How Britain is Governed (1938), p. 89.

12. Brogan, D.W., and Verney, D.V., Political Patterns in Today's World, p. 75.

Flushed with the majority and intoxicated with power a Government, it is further argued, can press unpalatable measures on the House of Commons. It might even violate the solemn pledges which it made at the time of the general elections, as it happened in 1938. The Conservative Party in 1935 won a heavy majority in the House of Commons on its professions of fidelity to the League of Nations and its unequivocal condemnation of the rape of Abyssinia by Italy. The Party's election manifesto, inter alia, stated, "The League of Nations will remain, as heretofore, the keystone of British foreign policy.... We shall, therefore, continue to do all in our power to uphold the Covenant and to maintain and increase the efficiency of the League. In the present unhappy dispute between Italy and Abyssinia, there will be no wavering in the policy we have hitherto pursued." In later years, the Government followed a policy which was a grave departure from the principles of the League and a complete violation of the promises given by the Conservatives at the time of the general elections. Britain was negotiating under an ultimatum with Italy, although the latter had violated the League Covenant in Abyssinia and was making frantic efforts to bring Spain under its protectorate in pursuance of its policy of establishing Italian hegemony in the Mediterranean, and replacing Britain in control of Egypt and the Suez Canal. "If this is to be taken as a precedent," rightly observes Keith, "then, any Government can feel fully entitled boldly to ignore, if in power, any limitation imposed upon it by the terms of its election promises."¹³

Then, once in power the Government is subject to no parliamentary limitation, except the Standing Orders under which the House of Commons functions. These Standing Orders are not Statutes. They are passed by the House of Commons alone by means of majority resolutions. A Government can, so long as it continues to command its majority, alter these orders when it wishes in order to facilitate the passage of its measures. This danger was much in evidence during the tenure of office of the Labour Government of 1945-50. The Government wedded to a programme of nationalisation pushed it too fast in Parliament. It applied guillotine to the proceedings on the Transport Bill and the Town and County Planning Bill both in the Standing Committee and in the subsequent stages in the House of Commons. It was for the first time in the history of the House of Commons that such a drastic procedure had been applied to proceedings on a Bill in Standing Committee. "As a result, 37 Clauses and 7 Schedules of the Transport Bill were not discussed at all in Standing Committee, and the discussion on several more was cut short by the guillotine. In the case of the Town and County Planning Bill, about 50 Clauses and 6 Schedules were not discussed at all in the Committee. On the Report stage the guillotine was applied again."¹⁴ While summing up these episodes Professor Keith remarked, "What is clear, however, is that a Government with a large majority is limited in its legislative programme only by its own good sense and its respect for those rules of debate which generations of men in all parties have agreed upon."¹⁵ It is further argued that debates are mere formalities, tolerated by the Government only because they do not affect the result in the lobby division.

13. Keith, A.B., The British Cabinet System, p. 248.

14. Ibid.

15. Ibid., p. 249.

There are bitter criticisms of the growth of delegated legislation and of the consequential growth of Administrative Law and it is maintained that the Rule of Law and freedom of the citizens are gravely menaced by these developments. "When the legislature confers," says Barker, "a measure of legislative powers on the executive it takes something away from itself; but when it confers upon the executive a measure of judicial power, it is diminishing not itself, but an organ other than itself."

It does not, however, follow, and "it is not true," as Jennings observes, "that a government in possession of majority forms a temporary dictatorship."¹⁶ The House of Commons is not a place in which a victorious party exhibits its unchecked authority and dictates to the defeated and politically impotent minority. Nor can it remain oblivious of outside influences. The process of Parliamentary government involves parliamentary forbearance. The minority agrees that the majority should govern, and the majority agrees that the minority must criticize. The Standing Orders are, no doubt, constructed to ensure that the will of the majority shall prevail. But the Orders do not present the complete picture of the Government's position. They are supplemented by the customs of the House. The customs of the House demand a scrupulous observance and respect by the majority for those rules of debate "which generations of men in all parties have agreed upon." Originally, these customs arose for the protection of the individual member of the House and today they continue for the "Private Member," as he is still called, and, as such, for His Majesty's Opposition. The Speaker is the impartial custodian of the rights of the members of the House. His conduct really reflects the spirit which, according to Brier, is ultimately more important than the forms of government.

The customs of the House very considerably modify the rigours of the majority rule. Take, for example, the Standing Order relating to a private member's right to put questions to government in order to elicit information on any matter of public importance or with regard to administration. So important is this right that the Select Committee on Parliamentary Procedure maintained in its Report that the exercise of the right of asking questions "is perhaps the readiest and most effective method of parliamentary control over the action of the executive." But custom goes much further. Parliamentary time is allowed to the Opposition so that it may criticise the Government's work. The various stages through which a Bill passes in its career in the House—the First and Second Readings, Committee Report, and Third Readings—are arranged with this end in view. In the Committee of Supply the choice of subjects for discussion rests with the Opposition. The actual time to be spent on various stages of business is, so far as possible, arranged "behind the Speaker's Chair" or through the usual channels; that is to say, the Government and Opposition Whips, in consultation with their respective leaders, settle the time to be allowed by informal discussion. They even settle the subjects to be debated, the information to be provided and the line of attack.

16. Jennings, I., Cabinet Government, op. cit., p. 442.

His Majesty's Opposition is second in importance to His Majesty's Government. The public duty of the Opposition is to oppose. It must attack upon the Government and upon individual Ministers. Diligent performance of this duty by the Opposition is the major check which the Parliamentary system of Government provides upon corruption and defective administration. It is also the means by which individual injustice can be prevented. The Government, too, recognizes its duty that it must govern openly and honestly, and that it should meet criticism not by suppressing Opposition, but by rational arguments which should have the approbation of the electorate. A Government which does not respect the traditions of the House and neglects the Opposition does so at its own peril. His Majesty's Opposition is the prospective Government. The lapses of the Government are its opportunities and it uses them to appeal to the public opinion. "The House is its platform, the newspapers are its microphones, and the people is its audience." The Government which loses the popular support will ultimately lose its majority and when majority disappears, the government, too, will disappear. The Cabinet, no doubt, is normally the master of the House of Commons, but, as Laski says, "there are always limits to its mastery of which it must take account."¹⁷

Nor is the Government insensitive to the reactions of its own followers. It is true that a member of Parliament is returned on the party support and his political career depends upon the support he gives to his party. But it does not mean that he is entirely docile and immune to influences other than of his party leaders. He is in constant touch with his constituency and keeps himself abreast with the flow of public opinion therein. If he feels that the popularity of the Government is receding, he becomes clamorous because it means a fall in his electoral support. Then, there are interested groups within the party. These groups maintain a constant watch on the activities of Government and they are vocal on issues that concern them. "Thus the government works against a background of constant outside appraisal which also finds its echo in the lobbies of the House and it is a function of the Whips to keep informed on trends of opinion both in the country and in the House. Signs of unrest in the constituencies, amongst interested groups, or on the part of a sufficient number of back-benchers, may lead to changes in a Government's plans and proposals." A Government which is not susceptible to these influences and does not alter its direction is not a government of the people and by the people.

The Cabinet is, therefore, the supreme interpreter of majority opinion and it rules both majority and minority. It dare not ride rough-shod over public opinion. The ultimate appeal rests with the people, and it must remember those to whom it will have to account in the future as well as those who entrusted it with power. In 1934, there was a great outcry against the provisions of the Incitement to Disaffection Bill. The National Government had an unprecedented majority and, no doubt, the 17. Laski, H.J., Reflections on the Constitution, p. 96.

Bill was passed, but the Bill as passed "was very different from the Bill as presented; and public opinion had amended it." So spontaneous was the outburst against the Anglo-French proposals for a settlement of the Italo-Ethiopian dispute in December 1935, that the Cabinet was forced to reverse its decision. It "felt that there could not be that volume of public opinion which it is necessary to have in a democracy behind the Government in a matter so important as this." Sir Samuel Hoare, the Foreign Secretary, resigned because, as he put it, he had not "got the confidence of the great body of opinion in the country, and I feel that it is essential for the Foreign Secretary, more than any other Minister in the country to have behind him the general approval of his fellow-countrymen. I have not got that general approval behind me today, and as soon as I realized that fact, without any prompting, without any suggestion from anyone, I asked the Prime Minister to accept my resignation." In 1940, public opinion compelled the Government under Neville Chamberlain to resign. Again, in 1946 the Government had to concede considerable alterations over the powers and functions of the Steel Board. The dictatorship of the Cabinet is, accordingly, not a matter of reality if government by consent is to be accepted as the formula of democracy. The "public feeling", Laski cogently writes, "is always a factor in determining the breaking-point of members' loyalty to the Cabinet they normally support."¹⁸

The fate of the Government today as before is normally determined by a general election than by a vote in Parliament. The real function of Parliament is not to govern but to see that it governs according to the wishes of the people. The Cabinet leads Parliament and the country on the clear understanding that the Government is not the master but the servant of the people. It was cogently said by Bagehot that the real function of Parliament was to "express the mind of the people", to "teach the nation what it does not know" and to make the people "hear what we otherwise should not." This Parliament does admirably.

THE PRIME MINISTER

Informal basis. "The Prime Minister", said John Morley, "is the keystone of the Cabinet arch." It would, however, be more accurate, says Jennings, "to describe the Prime Minister as the key-stone of the Constitution." The phrase is as precise as it is picturesque, for, as Jennings again says, "All roads in the Constitution lead to the Prime Minister. From the Prime Minister lead the roads to the Queen, Parliament, the Ministries, the other members of the Commonwealth, even the Church of England and the Courts of law."¹⁹ The Prime Minister is by far the most powerful man in the country. He has been the principal beneficiary of the Cabinet's growth in power. The prerogatives lost by the King have fallen for the most part into the Prime Minister's hands. Those which have not been acquired by him have gone to the Cabinet. But the Prime Minister "is central to its formation, central to its life, and

18. Ibid., p. 96.

19. Jennings, I., The Queen's Government, p. 140.

central to its death."²⁰ He forms it; he can alter it or destroy it. "The Government", as Greaves puts it, "is the master of the country and he is the master of the Government."²¹

And yet the office of the Prime Minister remained unknown to the law until recently. Like the various other institutions of the country, it is the result of mere accident, the child of chance. No statute settled the status of the Prime Minister and his salary is still drawn in part as First Lord of the Treasury, an office bound up with Premiership since 1721.²² Not until 1878, did the term make its appearance in any public document when Lord Beaconsfield who signed the Treaty of Berlin was referred to in the opening clause as "First Lord of Her Majesty's Treasury, Prime Minister of England." This designation, in the opinion of Sir Sidney Low, was just "a concession to the ignorance of foreigners, who might not have understood the real position of the British plenipotentiary if he had been merely given his official title."²³ It was only in 1906 that the formal position in the order of precedence in State ceremonies was accorded to the office. The Prime Minister was made the fourth subject of the realm, just after the Archbishop of York. The Chequers Estate Act, 1917, referred to "the person holding the office popularly known as Prime Minister" and provided for the use of Chequers by the incumbent of the office.²⁴ The Ministers of the Crown Act, 1937, recognised, for the first time, the office of the Prime Minister by giving him the salary of £10,000 a year as Prime Minister and First Lord of the Treasury and the Ministerial salaries and Members' Pensions Act, 1965 reiterated it.²⁵ But these provisions do not confer any powers on the Prime Minister. "These are casual recognitions of a constitutional situation, not the legislation of that situation." The Prime Minister has no legal powers as such. His powers are derived from, and are limited by constitutional conventions. Basically, therefore, it is as true today as when Gladstone said it that "nowhere in the wide world does so great a substance cast so small a shadow; nowhere is there a man who has so much power, with so little to show for it in the way of formal title or prerogative."²⁶

The choice of the Prime Minister. The formation of a Cabinet de-

20. Laski, H.J., Parliamentary Government in England, p. 228.

21. Greaves, H.R.G., The British Constitution, pp. 108-09.

22. "The Prime Minister", declared Mr. Balfour, in his speech at Haddington, somewhere in 1902, "has no salary as Prime Minister, his name occurs in no Acts of Parliament, and though holding the most important place in the constitutional hierarchy, he has no place which is recognised by the laws of his country. This is a strange paradox." As quoted in Marriot's English Political Institutions, p. 85.

23. Sidney Low, The Government of England, p. 156.

24. Chequers is now the official country house of the Prime Minister.

25. "...There shall be paid to the person who is Prime Minister and First Lord of the Treasury an annual salary of ten thousand pounds." (Clause 4). The present salary of the Prime Minister is £14,000 a year. The Lord Chancellor, who, as the chief Law Officer, has a salary of £14,500 (£500 more than the Prime Minister). The salaries of the senior Ministers are £8,500, and Junior Ministers £3,750.

26. Quoted in Marriot's English Political Institutions, p. 86.

pendes essentially on the Royal choice of a Prime Minister. During the eighteenth century, it frequently happened that there was no proper cohesion within the Cabinet and the royal favour was as necessary as the popular support for the Chief Minister of the Crown. In the early part of the reign of George III an attempt was made to reassert the power of the King, the object being to choose such Ministers as were acceptable to himself. This attempt failed and by 1832 the position of the Prime Minister as the leader of the predominant party in the House of Commons had become recognised.²⁷

- It is a well-settled rule now that the Prime Minister must be either a peer or a member of the House of Commons. Every Prime Minister since Sir Robert Walpole has been in one of the Houses. No peer has been Prime Minister since the resignation of Lord Salisbury in 1902. In 1923, the question, whether a peer should be a Prime Minister, was definitely raised. The resignation of Bonar Law left the King with a choice between Lord Curzon and Stanley Baldwin. Long ere this, it had been felt that the Prime Minister must belong to the House which makes and unmakes a government. It had also been asserted that the House of Commons had a right to expect that "its chief representative should be within its sphere of influence and personally accountable to it."²⁸ Curzon, no doubt, was a peer. But it was not the only issue. The scales were heavily weighted against him because of his personality.²⁹ Both these factors put together resulted in the selection of Stanley Baldwin, whose Cabinet experience was limited to eight months of Bonar Law Government, as Prime Minister. It is claimed that the decision of the King was finally determined by the advice given by Earl Balfour,³⁰ although George V had also consulted other prominent Conservatives including Lord Long, Lord Salisbury, and Mr. Amery. Lord Stamfordham on behalf of the King explained to Lord Curzon that "since the Labour Party constituted the official Opposition in the House of Commons and were unrepresented in the House of Lords, the objections to a Prime Minister in the Upper Chamber were insuperable."³¹

A single precedent, however, does not create a rule that a Prime Minister must necessarily be from the House of Commons. But "the selection of a peer," as Keith rightly remarks, "for that office would be abnormal."³² If the Government owns responsibility to the House of Commons alone, a vote in that House only can compel the government either to resign or to advise a dissolution. Moreover, the Prime Minister is also responsible for the party organization. Party organization matters only in the House of Commons and not in the House of Lords. If, in brief, the Prime Minister is to correctly feel the pulse of Parliament and

27. For the choice of the Prime Minister see chapter III, ante.

28. Herecourt quoted in Jennings' Cabinet Government, p. 22.

29. The defects of Lord Curzon's character are immortalised in the lines, "George Nathaniel, Viscount Curzon, Is really a very popular person."

30. Keith, A.B., Cabinet System of Government, p. 29.

31. Jennings, I., Cabinet Government, p. 23.

32. Keith, A.B., Cabinet System of Government, op. cit., p. 29.

in the ultimate analysis that of the electorate, he can do so in the House of Commons. The precedent that the Prime Minister should belong to the House of Commons must, therefore, be regarded as decisive. Baldwin did not show the slightest desire to continue his Premiership on his transfer to the House of Lords. Professor Keith is of the opinion that had Baldwin decided to continue, "such a decision would certainly have been popular enough in the country after he had established his reputation by his brilliant handling of the abdication of Edward VIII."³³ He holds that "it remains possible that a Prime Minister might retain that office after transfer to the Upper House."³⁴ But it is doubtful if any Prime Minister will ever venture it now.

Functions of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister, as said before, is the corner-stone of the Constitution. In his hand is the key of Government. His duties are onerous and his authority enormous. Gladstone described these thus: "The Head of the British Government is not a Grand Vizier. He has no powers, properly so called, over his colleagues: on the rare occasions when a Cabinet determines its course by the votes of its members, his vote counts only as one of theirs. But they are appointed and dismissed by the Sovereign on his advice. In a perfectly organised administration as that of Sir Robert Peel in 1841-46, nothing of great importance is matured, or would even be projected, in any department without his personal cognizance; and any weighty business would commonly go to him before being submitted to the Cabinet. He reports to the Sovereign its proceedings, and he also has many audiences of the august occupant of the throne."³⁵ There is much truth in what Gladstone had said. But nearly all recent developments have tended to increase the authority of the Prime Minister. Indeed, the tendency of the British politics has been to steadily transfer power, not only from the House of Commons to the Cabinet, but within the Cabinet to a small group and from that small group to one man, the Prime Minister.³⁶ There are and were very many good reasons for this change. The extension of the franchise, the prestige which Gladstone and Disraeli conferred upon the office, give to the Prime Minister position and authority almost comparable with the President of the United States. He is even likened to a dictator, not perhaps the 'ideological dictator' of our times, but the 'benevolent despot' of the eighteenth century history with his all pervasive influence in society. This is, indeed, an exaggeration, although the powers of the Prime Minister are very wide, and his status and prestige enviable.

1. The Prime Minister makes the Government. With the selection of the Prime Minister the essential work of the King is completed, for it rests with the former to make up his list of Ministers and present it for the Royal assent. Technically, the last word rests with the King, because it is he who appoints them. But in practice, the decision belongs

33. Ibid.

34. Ibid.

35. Quoted in Keith's British Cabinet System, p. 65.

36. Brogan, D.W., and Verney, D.V., Political Patterns in Today's World, p. 75.

to the Prime Minister and the Royal assent is more or less a formality. Even Queen Victoria never carried her objections on political grounds.

The Prime Minister in constituting his Government has to consider the claims and views of leading members of his party in both Houses. But, as Amery puts it, "subject to Parliament putting up with his selection of his colleagues and his arrangement of offices, he has a very free hand in shaping his government according to his own view of what is likely to work best and according to his personal preferences."³⁷ It is for him to decide on the size of the Cabinet and the Ministers to be included in it. In fact, the British Prime Minister has never been under any sort of direct dictation either "from Parliament or from a Party Executive in making his government." He may even select colleagues outside the ranks of his party, or even outside Parliament, if in his judgment a particular person is specially fitted for a particular job. For example, in 1903, Balfour offered the Colonial Office to Lord Milner when he was still the High Commissioner in South Africa and had no parliamentary experience to his credit. MacDonald in 1924, made Lord Chelmsford a non-party ex-Viceroy of India, First Lord of the Admiralty. The most remarkable example is that of Baldwin's appointment in 1924 of Winston Churchill as Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Conservative Party was vehemently opposed to this appointment. But "the appointment was made and the Conservative Party in Parliament, though never quite reconciled to it, grumbled and submitted." Harold Wilson appointed Patrick Gordon-Walker to such an exalted office as the Foreign Secretary, though defeated in the General Election. L.S. Amery while summing up this power of the Prime Minister says, "Few dictators, indeed, enjoy such a measure of autocratic power as is enjoyed by a British Prime Minister while in process of making up his Cabinet."³⁸

All the same, many of the choices of the Prime Minister are obvious. He must include among his Ministers men of standing within the Party. The history of how Arthur Henderson became Foreign Secretary in 1929, shows that in a party's government a vital member of the party can always set limits to the discretion a Prime Minister can exercise. He must include 'essential men'. This is perhaps particularly important in face of the diverse elements within the British parties. In 1964 Harold Wilson included in his Cabinet Ministers drawn from various sections of the Labour Party, including 'militants' like Frank Cousins and Barbara Castle. Harold Macmillan included in his Cabinet in 1957 both the left and right wingers like R.A. Butler and Lord Salisbury. The Prime Minister, while composing his Cabinet has often to decide whether a particular extremist in the party would be a threat to party in or out of the Cabinet. He may decide to 'buy silence' from a potential rebel by entrusting him with Ministerial office. This perhaps influenced Attlee's inclusion of Aneurin Bevin in his Cabinet, and Wilson's inclusion of Cousins. Nevertheless, that discretion, as Laski puts it, "is both wide and mysterious."³⁹ The Prime Minister, cogently remarks Dr. Finer, "has to make the Cabinet 37. Campion and others, Parliament: A Survey, p. 63.

38. Ibid.

39. Thoughts on the Constitution, p. 97.

work; it is his; he must give it cohesion; he must arbitrate differences of view and personality; he must fit all the necessary talents together into a reputable team."⁴⁰

In the allocation of offices, as well, the Prime Minister offers posts in his discretion, although politicians of standing can safely decline what is given, if they command so much support in the party as to make it unwise to dispense with their services. But rarely the Prime Minister's final allocation is rejected, because refusal may mean exclusion from office not merely for the term of that Parliament, but, perhaps, for ever. Sir Robert Horne, who had been a successful President of the Board of Trade and Chancellor of the Exchequer, refused in 1924 the Ministry of Labour that Baldwin offered him and he was never considered again for any future office. "It is only exceptionally forceful or fortunate political rogue elephants," says Amery, "that once extruded from the governing herd, can find their way back into it, as both Mr. Churchill and the present writer (Amery himself) discovered for a decade after 1929."⁴¹

2. If the machinery of the government is to work efficiently and effectively, then, it is the undoubted right of the Prime Minister to appoint, reshuffle, or dismiss his colleagues. He is free, in the exercise of his impartial judgment, to make what appointments may seem good to him. He must also, from time to time, review the allocation of offices among his various colleagues and consider whether that allocation still remains the best that can be effected. Both as captain of the team and at the helm of administration, it is his duty to request any of his colleagues, whose presence in the Ministry is, in his opinion or judgment, prejudicial to the efficiency, integrity or policy of the government, to resign.

The Prime Minister can also advise the Sovereign to dismiss a Minister. According to law a Minister holds office at the pleasure of the Crown and, accordingly, he can be dismissed whenever it pleases His Majesty. It is now a well-established custom that the prerogative of dismissal is exercised solely on the advice of the Prime Minister. It is, however, doubtful if ever a Prime Minister would advise dismissal except in very extreme cases. All the same, the right of the Prime Minister is there. Sir Robert Peel, while referring to this right of the Prime Minister, said that, "under all ordinary circumstances if there were a serious difference of opinion between the Prime Minister and one of his colleagues, and that difference could not be reconciled by an amicable understanding, the result would be the retirement of the colleague, not of the Prime Minister."⁴² But such a crisis would never come. In Britain "there is a tradition—a kind of public school fiction—that no minister desires office, but that he is prepared to carry on for the public good."⁴³ This tradition implies a duty to resign when a hint is given. There are many instances of such resignations, Mr. Lowe and Mr. Ayrton resigned in 1873, Coloney Seeley in 1914, and Mr. Austen Chamberlain in 1917, Mr. Montagu in 1924, and Sir Samuel Hoare in 1935.

40. Governments of the Greater European Powers, p. 144.

41. Amery, L.S., Thoughts on the Constitution, p. 64.

42. Quoted in Keith's British Cabinet System, pp. 82-83.

43. Jennings, I., Cabinet Government, p. 197.

To sum up, it is a purely personal authority of the Prime Minister to ask a colleague to resign or to accept another office. Removal from office is always a stronger step and it may have its repercussions in the House of Commons and in the constituencies.⁴⁴ It may even lead to the breaking up of the Cabinet. Moreover, it is a declaration of weakness and defective judgment in placing the Minister in office, or suggests error of policy on the part of the Prime Minister. No Prime Minister will, therefore, go to the extreme of dismissing a colleague. There are other polite methods of doing things. The Prime Minister can rid himself of an undesired colleague by a general reshuffle of the Ministry and it is the best way of avoiding a slight on a person who may have considerable parliamentary and popular support.⁴⁵ The recent tendency, begun by Churchill and continued by Attlee, has been to make changes more frequently. And to remain still more dignified the Prime Minister may "elevate" him and so get rid of an offending colleague. This is one of the chief, though least used, arguments for the retention of the House of Lords.

3. Then, the Prime Minister is the leader of his party. The general election is in reality the election of a Prime Minister. The wavering voters who decide elections support neither a party nor a policy. They support a leader. The Prime Minister has, therefore, to give effective leadership. He must feel the pulse of the people and try to know true and genuine public opinion on matters which confront the nation. He must also guide public opinion by receiving deputations, and discuss issues by public speech at party conferences, and on other important occasions which demand proper attention. He should also give the Opposition a feeling that the Government will not ride rough-shod over the wishes of the minorities. For all this, he needs strength of character, the gift of leadership, patience, tact and a devotion to principles. He must also guide and inspire those he has chosen as Ministers and should enjoy the confidence of a majority in the House of Commons. In short, the Prime Minister must be a capable evaluator of public opinion and at the same time an expert in propaganda. He must know what to say, when to say, and when not to say anything.

Jennings gives a graphic picture of the qualities which a Prime Minister should possess. He says, "Since his personality and prestige play a considerable part in moulding public opinion, he ought to have something of the popular appeal of a film actor and he must take some care over his make-up—like Mr. Gladstone with his collars, Mr. Lloyd George with his hair, Mr. Baldwin with his pipes, and Mr. Churchill with his cigars. Unlike a film actor, however, he ought to be a good inventor of speeches as well as a good orator. Even more important, perhaps, is his microphone manner, for few attend meetings but millions look to broadcasts. Finally, it is essential that he should be able to retain the loyalties of his political friends; and it helps considerably if he remembers their names, asks the right questions about their families, realizes when sympathy or congratulation is required, and generally is good mixer with exactly the right measure of condescension.⁴⁶

44. Lord Salisbury dared not dismiss his Home Secretary, Mr. Mathews, in 1890. In this connection he wrote to the Queen: "At present Lord Salisbury does not think that a bare dismissal would be admissible. It would be looked upon as very harsh and beget numberless intrigues.....There is no instance of dismissal, and it would require some open and palpable error to justify it."

45. In September 1947, on rearranging the government, Attlee asked Greenwood, one of his senior colleagues, to retire on grounds of age. Some quarters hold the opinion that Attlee exercised a clear power of dismissal.

A party which has not a leader cannot function. Its condition, in fact, becomes hopelessly chaotic. In the same way, a party with a weak leader is in a weak position. It is not possible for it to attract popular support and be in a position to form government. It has been claimed that in 1964 and 1966 the Labour Party won and the Conservatives lost the elections largely because of the impression, made by their leaders. During the winter of 1965-66 the Rhodesian crisis had raised Wilson's stature as a Prime Minister, whereas by March 1966 Heath had been leader of the Conservative Party for only seven months, "and was still very much the 'new boy'." In the Conservative Party the leader is the party. He controls the party organisation and its funds. He also carries with him disciplinary authority and uses this weapon of decisive power against anyone who dare challenge his authority. The Chairman and Leader of the Labour Parliamentary Party is recognised as the Leader of the Labour Party not only in Parliament but also in the country; he is ex officio a member of the National Executive Committee of the Labour Party and he is free to attend any of the Sub-Committees of the Executive as an ex officio member if and when he wishes to do so. In fact, the prestige of the Prime Minister and the party are closely intertwined. It is the party which makes the leader, but once the leader has been elected the party support is concentrated in the leader. The majority which the party receives at the polls is a party majority, but it owes its allegiance to the leader and it is spoken of as his party. Party prestige with the electorate demands it and this is the real strength of the Prime Minister. A Prime Minister must, therefore, strive for the unity of his party and his personality should be capable of inspiring loyalty in his colleagues and trust in the country.

4. The Prime Minister is the Chairman of the Cabinet. He must pick a team and keep it as a team, and, accordingly, the Prime Minister's task as Chairman of Cabinet meetings, in which Government policy is hammered into shape and decisions taken, is of crucial importance. The Prime Minister is leader of the Party and his colleagues in the Cabinet owe him a personal as well as a party allegiance. He controls agenda and it is for him to accept or reject proposals for discussion submitted by Ministers. The Ministers always consult him before important proposals are put forward and his support solicited. It is also well recognized that in Britain and the Anglo-Saxon countries generally "the Chairman of any committee attracts a special kind of loyalty engendered by the vague feeling that business is expedited and improved by order and that one must be prepared to suffer the Chairman's ruling for the sake of the collective enterprise."⁴⁷ A casting vote, too, is inherent in the Chairman.⁴⁸ All this gives pre-eminent authority to the Prime Minister as Chairman of the Cabinet. But Cabinet in Britain does not take decisions by votes now.⁴⁹ Since votes are not taken, the Prime Minister's power to sum up in Cabinet discussions is very important. Jennings says, "A team of politicians is probably the most difficult to handle because, though each of them knows that his political future depends on the success of the team, there will usually be a few who are anxious to become captain."⁵⁰ The management of the Cabinet is thus certainly the Prime Minister's most difficult function "because it compels him to take difficult decisions not only on the substance but also on the tactics."⁵¹ The Prime Minister may seek to persuade a minority or convince a majority. He may feel it necessary sometimes to give way to the majority even when he does not agree or try to force his own opinion on the Cabinet as Gladstone almost always did. But in the latter case the Prime Minister must run the risk of splitting the party. He must reconcile the differences of opinion between Ministers. If he fails, he may shatter the Government and the Party and "leave his leadership self-condemned, as Balfour's was by 1905."⁵²

46. Cabinet Government, op. cit., p. 163.

Some Prime Ministers had really been good Chairmen. They had always striven to see the main issues and the questions of principle. By dint of their commonsense and good judgment they guided the discussions towards a definite conclusion ensuring thereby harmonious and efficient teamwork. Lord Samuel has given an excellent description of Ramsay MacDonald as Chairman of the Cabinet. He says, MacDonald "was a good Chairman of Cabinet, carefully preparing his material beforehand, conciliatory in manner and resourceful. In the conduct of a Cabinet, when a knot or a tangle begins to appear, the important thing is for the Prime Minister not to let it be drawn tight; so long as it is kept loose it may still be unravelled. MacDonald was skilful in such a situation—and there were many."⁵³

5. As the guide of the Cabinet the Prime Minister is the chief co-ordinator of the policies of the several Ministers and Ministries. He, more than anyone else, must endeavour to see the work of the Government as a whole and bring the variety of Government activities into reasonable

47. Finer, H., The Theory and Practice of Modern Government (1954), p. 592.

48. The decision to arrest Dillon in 1881 was carried by Gladstone's casting vote.

49. The practice of taking votes and deciding by a majority did not originate until 1880. The question of the removal of the Duke of Wellington's statue from Hyde Park in 1883 was decided by a show of hands. But votes are not taken now. "Now this is not done by voting for the holding up of hands or the calling of 'Aye' and 'No'," says Herbert Morrison, "would not only be regarded as a breach of Cabinet decorum but would also be felt to symbolize and demonstrate, nakedly and unashamedly, a lack of Cabinet unity and solidarity which is always deprecated." Government and Parliament, op. cit., p. 5.

50. Jennings, I., The Queen's Government, p. 137.

51. Ibid., p. 138.

52. Brasher, N.H., Studies in British Government, p. 39.

53. Quoted by Jennings, Cabinet Government, op. cit., pp. 176-77.

relationship with one another. He is, in fact, the Manager-in-Chief of the Government's business. Sir Robert Peel is universally acclaimed the model Prime Minister. He supervised and was genuinely familiar with the business of each department. Though he had an able Chancellor of the Exchequer, in whom he had full confidence, he himself introduced the budgets in 1842 and 1845. The War Office, the Admiralty, the Foreign Office, the administration of India and Ireland felt his personal influence as much as the Treasury and Board of Trade.

Such close attention is no longer possible now. The functions of Government have expanded so widely and its activities have become so complex that even if a Prime Minister is to regard Sir Robert Peel as a model and intervene when he considers it necessary, the result will be equally disastrous to him and to the country. But the Prime Minister must keep an eye on what goes on in the Departments and must know enough to be ready to intervene if he apprehends that something is going wrong. Usually, he exercises supervision through the eagerness of the Ministers to consult him, but he must have the ability to give sound advice almost on the spur of the moment. "If he is intellectually lazy like Baldwin or difficult of approach like MacDonald, he cannot exercise these functions properly."⁵⁴

The work of co-ordination is done by the various Committees of the Cabinet, but the Prime Minister is, as Herbert Morrison says, "eminently a co-ordinating Minister." He decides what Cabinet Committees there will be, appoint the Chairmen and preside over some Committees himself. Attlee was Chairman of the Committee for Commonwealth Affairs, Far Eastern Affairs, Economic Policy, Housing, National Health Service, Food and Fuel, and Indian Affairs, during the two Ministries, 1945-51. The Prime Minister must also keep in touch with the work of the other Cabinet Committees, where he does not preside himself, and advise and guide the Chairmen of these Committees. He can do it more admirably and effectively since, of modern British leaders, Harold Wilson, Sir Alec Douglas-Home, Harold Macmillan, Sir Anthony Eden, Attlee, and Sir Winston Churchill, all had ministerial experience before they became Prime Ministers.

The Prime Minister must be in the closest contact with the Foreign Secretary and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. For the rest, his door must ever be open, "his mind clear and his judgment rapid and efficient." Foreign affairs are always on the agenda and decisions of great importance demand speedy determination. There may be no time to summon a meeting of the Cabinet. In such cases the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary consult each other and a decision is reached. The Prime Minister may even man the entire policy. Neville Chamberlain adopted a foreign policy of his own, forced it on the Foreign Office and compelled the Foreign Secretary, Anthony Eden, to resign. But foreign policy cannot be divorced from the defence and trade policy. Chamberlain used the Principal Economic Adviser to the Government as his principal assistant in the conduct of his foreign policy. Churchill's task was fundamentally different. In war-time there is one supreme function of the Government and it is to win the war, and it must inevitably be the Prime Minister's personal concern. All else is subordinated to it. In the main, the nature of international relations today, with 'summit meetings' of Heads of States and the need for speedy military decisions in an atomic age, forces the direct and personal involvement of the Prime Minister in foreign affairs. The effect of two Wars on the machinery of Cabinet government was to concentrate power in the hands of the Prime Minister and his close advisers. This increased authority has been retained to some extent in peacetimes too.

54. Jennings, I., The Queen's Government, p. 139.

The Prime Minister's responsibilities for the co-ordination of the administration are further indicated by the fact that he leads the civil service establishment as the First Lord of the Treasury. Since 1920 the Prime Minister's consent has been required for the appointment of the highest staff officers, including permanent heads, deputy heads, principal financial officers and principal establishment officers of the Departments.

6. The Prime Minister is the real leader of the House of Commons. Now the tendency is that he designates another colleague as Leader of the House and delegates to him the specific function of arranging the business of the House,⁵⁵ but this delegation cannot deprive the Prime Minister of his function as leader of the Government. "The problem is not," as Jennings says, "that the Government runs the risk of defeat—for unless the party breaks up, or has no majority, or has a very small majority, the Government cannot be defeated—but that it runs the risk of being worsted in the argument. The House is 'the finest platform in Europe', the only debating society in Britain whose debates are read, or at least glanced at, by millions. If the Government is to keep its majority in the country, it must consistently make a good case."⁵⁶ All principal announcements of policy and business are made by the Prime Minister and all questions on non-departmental affairs and upon critical issues are addressed to him. He initiates or intervenes in debates of general importance, such as those on defence, foreign affairs, and domestic issues of primary character. In fact, the House always looks to him as the fountain of policy. He is, also recognised to have an immediate authority to correct what he may consider the errors of omission and commission of the colleagues.

The party Whips in the House are under the Prime Minister's direct supervision and through them he issues orders to the rank and file of the party. He assists the Speaker and the Chairman in maintaining order and decorum in the House. In brief, the House comes to a large extent under the control of the Prime Minister. The management of the Government's majority and the maintenance of smooth relations with the Opposition depend upon his inspiring lead and parliamentary skill. The Prime Minister ought to be what is called 'good House of Commons' man', "a man who observes its traditions and knows how to handle it, a man like Baldwin or Churchill."⁵⁷

55. Asquith separated the offices of Prime Minister and Leader of the House of Commons in 1915. Since 1945 no Prime Minister has attempted to combine the two roles.

56. Jennings, I., The Queen's Government, p. 139.

57. Ibid.

7. The Prime Minister wields the supreme power of dissolution and, thus, "holds the security of Members on both sides of the gangway in the House in his hands." It means that the members of the House of Commons hold their seats at the mercy of the Prime Minister's use of this "terrifying power," for it means new elections without certainty that they will be elected. "Men do not like to run the risks," rightly observes Byrum Carter, "which are involved in this process if little is to be gained from incurring the danger."⁵⁸ The threat of dissolution, thus, hangs over their heads, "restraining them, restricting their independence, leading them into the government's body."⁵⁹

There is some divergence of opinion among the authorities on the question whether the King can refuse a dissolution to a Prime Minister who asks for it. Winston Churchill stated during the course of the debate on the Education Bill in March, 1944, that although advice to dissolve comes from the Prime Minister, it is only advice and may, in exceptional circumstances, be disregarded.⁶⁰ What those exceptional circumstances can be, have been explained by Sir David Keir in his Constitutional History of Modern Britain. He writes: "The King's prerogative, however, circumscribed by convention, must always retain its historic character as a residue of discretionary authority to be employed for the public good. It is the last resource provided by the Constitution to guarantee its own working."⁶¹ It is, however, difficult to imagine circumstances in which the King could refuse dissolution to a Prime Minister. Laski has clearly stated that this part of the royal prerogative is as obsolete as the royal veto power.⁶² If the King refused a dissolution to a Prime Minister, he would be substituting his judgment about the need for and timing of a general election for that of his Chief Minister. The Prime Minister, under such circumstances, will presumably resign, though he had with him a clear majority in the House of Commons. When the Prime Minister resigns, the King will naturally send for the Leader of the Opposition and commission him to form the Government. Such a Government cannot continue in office unless it is supported by the House of Commons. As there is not a majority for the new Government, the King will be compelled to dissolve Parliament and general elections held. But the King could hardly grant a dissolution to the second Prime Minister after refusing to the first. If he does, and he must do it, his neutral position will be fatally compromised. Jennings rightly concludes that "thus, while the King's personal prerogative is maintained in theory, it can hardly be exercised in practice."⁶³ During the last hundred years there has been no instance of a refusal of a dissolution by the King when advised.

The right to advise a dissolution was long assumed to belong to the Cabinet. The decision to dissolve now rests with the Prime Minister and 58. Carter, Byrum E., The Office of Prime Minister, p. 274.

59. Ibid., p. 275.

60. Keith, The British Cabinet System, p. 301. Also refer to Asquith's affirmation in 1924. But Asquith had a design to put MacDonald into difficulty while in office, so that the King would turn to him to form the Ministry.

61. P. 491.

62. Reflections on the Constitution, op. cit., p. 72.

63. Jennings, I., Cabinet Government, op. cit., p. 395.

this has been done since 1918. In fact, since that time no decision to dissolve "has been brought before the Cabinet, and Prime Ministers now assume a right to tender advice to dissolve on their own account."⁶⁴ This aspect was further explained by Sir John Simon in 1935. He wrote that "the decision whether there shall be an immediate general election, and, if so, on what date the country shall go to the polls, rests with the Prime Minister, and until the Prime Minister has decided, all anticipations are without authority."⁶⁵ Keith is of the opinion that the Cabinet should be consulted and decide the issue of dissolution and if the older practice has been departed from, to some degree, it is no ground that further departure should take place. "It is derogatory," he says, "to the dignity of other Cabinet Ministers, and tends to make them appear in the public eye the servants, rather than equals, of the Prime Minister. It runs counter to the best aspects of the Constitution, the doctrine of collective responsibility and deliberation, and it presumes that for some reason or other, in this vital issue, the Prime Minister has pre-eminence in other issues denied to him."⁶⁶ Lord Morrison said that the presence of members of the Secretariat at Cabinet meetings precludes the discussion of such matters as the political factors involved in a dissolution.⁶⁷ But in 1966 and on other past occasions, informal discussions took place between the Prime Minister and some of his colleagues.

8. The Prime Minister is the only channel of communication with the Crown on matters of public concern, although there are many examples of the Crown's connection with individual Ministers "behind the back of the Prime Minister."⁶⁸ What it is meant to emphasise here is that apart from the Cabinet conclusions, which are drawn by the Cabinet Secretariat and a copy sent to him, the King has no official means of knowing of the Cabinet discussions, except what the Prime Minister may choose to tell him. This account "is not revised by his colleagues." He is also the chief adviser of the Sovereign and in emergencies the Monarch will first consult the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister advises the King on royal activities of an official character such as a visit to a foreign country, or tour of a part of the Kingdom or empire or Commonwealth countries. Stanley Baldwin regarded it both a duty and right to offer counsel to Edward VIII on his contemplated marriage with Mrs. Simpson. He consulted the Cabinet only at that stage when differences of an irreconcilable nature had developed between him and the King. The Prime Minister, then, became "as usual the link between the King and Cabinet interpreting the opinions and decisions of one to the other."⁶⁹

9. The Prime Minister has wide powers of patronage, including the appointment and dismissal of Ministers. In 1962, Harold Macmillan dismissed a third of his Cabinet. In an age "when professional politicians predominate, the Prime Minister's ability to affect directly the career

64. Keith, The British Cabinet System, p. 304.

65. Ibid.

66. Ibid., p. 305.

67. Morrison, Lord, Government and Parliament, p. 24.

68. Finer, The Theory and Practice of Modern Government, p. 592.

69. Greaves, H.R.G., The British Constitution, p. 110.

of ambitious M.Ps. inevitably gives him considerable power and authority." The distribution of general patronage through the Honours List gives the Prime Minister an influence in many sectors of national life. Though Lloyd George's abuse of patronage discredited the whole system, and since 1922, a Committee of the Privy Council has vetted all proposed awards, but no grant is made without the Prime Minister's recommendation. The patronage, therefore, remains a valuable political weapon in the hands of the Prime Minister.

10. The Prime Minister's power of appointment is not as extensive as that of the President of the United States, but it is considerable nevertheless. All Ministerial positions are his gifts. So are the allocation of Ministerial offices. He will either himself select new occupants or be consulted by the Minister concerned when there are vacancies in the chief diplomatic, military, judicial and ecclesiastical offices. Though Departmental Ministers have particular responsibility for their departmental officials, the Civil Service as a whole is controlled by the Treasury under the direction of the Prime Minister as First Lord. The Permanent Secretary of the Treasury advises the Prime Minister and he himself makes appointments of the Permanent Secretary or the Permanent Under-Secretary, Deputy Secretary or the Deputy Under-Secretary and the principal establishment officers in each of the Government Departments. Thus, as with the Ministerial hierarchy, the Prime Minister can be seen as head of the permanent administrative structure. Then, there are a good many special appointments in which the Prime Minister is interested—Governors-General in the Dominions, High Commissioners in the Commonwealth countries, British representatives to important international organizations, and Board members of nationalised industries. He will certainly be consulted about many of these, and frequently the choice is his.

The Prime Minister also recommends to the Sovereign for the appointment of Church of England Archbishops, bishops and certain other senior clergy, as well as for appointments to high judicial offices, such as Lords of Appeal in Ordinary, Lord Chief Justice and Lord Justices of Appeal. He also advises the Crown on appointment of Privy Councillors, Lord Lieutenants of countries⁷⁰ and certain civil appointments, such as Lord High Commissioner of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, Poet Laureate, Constable of the Tower and some University appointments which are in the gift of the Crown.

11. The Prime Minister may occasionally attend and participate in international conferences or meetings. Lord Beaconsfield attended the Congress of Berlin, Lloyd George participated in the Peace Conference at Paris, and Neville Chamberlain led the meetings in Germany preceding the Munich Agreement. Churchill attained new heights during the Second World War in his six meetings with President Roosevelt and two with Stalin. Ramsay MacDonald personally discussed with Mr. Dawes in 1929 on the most important phase of Anglo-American relations. He also went to the United States to confer with President Hoover on the limitation of armaments.

70. The office of the Lord Lieutenant of the country was first created in the sixteenth century. Its holder was chief among the country justices and commander of the county militia.

12. He conducts relations in matters of Cabinet rank with the Commonwealth countries. A classical example was afforded by the negotiations over the mode in which effect was to be given to the abdication of King Edward VIII.

13. The Prime Minister acts, though infrequently, either without authorization by the Cabinet or even against previously determined Cabinet policy. Lloyd George decided upon his own initiative to call a session of the Imperial War Conference and announced it in Parliament without receiving the proper authorization of the Cabinet. Stanley Baldwin raised in 1923 the issue of protection without previously consulting his Cabinet. Baldwin also took the initial steps in the action which led to abdication of Edward VIII without previously consulting his Cabinet. In the Second World War, Winston Churchill made a speech on 22nd June 1941, offering all possible assistance to the Soviet Union without consulting the Cabinet and he added, "nor was it necessary."⁷¹

Whenever the Prime Minister acts as such, the Cabinet is rather in a difficult position, for it must either accept the policy enunciated by the Prime Minister or run the risk of losing its leader "unless it is possible to find a compromise which will save the prestige of both." But such a course of action, as said before, is unusual as it endangers Cabinet unity and at the same time the security of the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister's Position. Such is the magnitude of the powers of the Prime Minister. But what is his position as compared with his colleagues? Lord Morley described him as primus inter pares. He said, "Although in Cabinet all its members stand on an equal footing, speak with equal voice, and, on the rare occasions when a division is taken, are counted on the fraternal principle of one man and one vote, yet the head of the Cabinet is primus inter pares, and occupies a position which so long as it lasts, is one of exceptional and peculiar authority." Herbert Morrison also holds the same estimation of the position of the Prime Minister. He says, "As the head of the Government he (Prime Minister) is primus inter pares. But it is today far too modest an appreciation of the Prime Minister's position."⁷² Ramsay Muir, a contemporary writer, considers such a description as "nonsense" when "applied to a potentate who appoints and can dismiss his colleagues. He is, in fact, though not in law, the working head of the State, endued with such a plenitude of power as no other constitutional ruler in the world possesses, not even the President of the United States."⁷³ Another writer says if one must have a Latin phrase, a better one, no doubt, is Sir William Vernor Harcourt's inter stellas luna minores—a moon among lesser stars—although even this may not really be strong enough."⁷⁴ Jennings says that the Prime Minister is not merely primus inter pares. He is not even inter stellas luna minores. "He is, rather, a sun around which planets revolve."⁷⁵

71. Winston Churchill, The Grand Alliance, p. 370.

72. Morrison, H., Government and Parliament, p. 97.

73. Ramsay Muir, How Britain is Governed, op. cit., p. 83.

74. As quoted in Ogg and Zink, Modern Foreign Governments, op. cit., p. 90.

75. Jennings, I., Cabinet Government, op. cit., p. 183.

The earlier conception of the Prime Minister as first among equals, primus inter pares, does not reflect the real difference in status and responsibility between the person who holds the first position, and is the Prime Minister, and even his senior colleagues. Sir Winston Churchill clearly expressed this distinction and it bespeaks of the Prime Minister vis-a-vis his Cabinet colleagues. He says, "In any sphere of action there can be no comparison between the positions of number one and number two, three, or four. The duties and problems of all persons other than the number one are quite different and in many ways more difficult. It is always a misfortune when number two or three has to initiate a dominant plan or policy. He has to consider not only the merits of the policy, but the mind of his chief; not only what to advise, but what it is proper for him in his station to advise; not only what to do, but how to get it agreed, and how to get it done. Moreover, number two or three will have to reckon with numbers four, five, and six, or may be some bright outsider, number twenty...."

"At the top there are great simplifications. An accepted leader has only to be sure of what it is best to do, or at least to have made up his mind about it. The loyalties which centre upon number one are enormous. If he trips, he must be sustained. If he makes mistakes they must be covered. If he sleeps, he must not be wantonly disturbed...."⁷⁶ Among his colleagues the Prime Minister has never been the first among equals at any time since Gladstone became Prime Minister in 1868. If he is described first among equals even now, it is simply to stress the democratic nature of his position. The Prime Minister is really a sun around which planets revolve and in the blaze of the sun the planets even lose their identity. The actual power of the Prime Minister, however, varies according to his personality and the extent to which he is supported by his party. "But within the limits of prudence and commonsense", as Byrum Carter observes, "he may exercise a directing authority which is the envy of political leaders of other states."⁷⁷

At the root of the primacy of the Prime Minister is the fact that since the Reforms Act of 1867, the elections have become the issues of personality. Many members of the electorate equate the party with its leader. The party leader has become the hub of the party's appeal and the centre of the party loyalty. A general election is now a plebiscite between alternative Prime Ministers. Gladstone, while referring to the election of 1857, rightly said, "it is not an election like that of 1784, when Pitt appealed on the question whether the Crown should be slave of an oligarchic faction, nor like that of 1831, when Grey sought a judgment on reform, nor like that of 1852, when the issue was the expiring controversy of protection. The country was to decide not upon the Canton river, but whether it would or would not have Palmerston for Prime Minister." Again, in the elections of 1880, Gladstone, in his famous Midlothian campaign, carried a relentless criticism of Beaconsfield Government. The only question which electors asked themselves was whether they wished to be governed by Lord Beaconsfield or Gladstone, though the latter was no longer the leader of his party. It was the personal triumph of Gladstone and he became Prime Minister by the choice of the people. The general elections of 1945 was a personal appeal to the electors by Churchill to re-elect him. The Conservative Party hoped to "cash in" on his personal popularity. Every boarding had a picture of the Prime Minister headed by the slogan "Help him finish the job" and underneath in comparatively small letters was the almost irrelevant injunction to "vote for the Bloggs."

76. Winston Churchill, Their Finest Hour, p. 15.

77. Carter, A.E., The Office of the Prime Minister, p. 334.

The Conservative Party did not even issue its manifesto. But Churchill issued one of his own and it began appropriately with the word "I". Candidates, too, ignored their party labels and called themselves "Churchill candidates." The newspapers played their own part by emphasising that the issue lay between "Churchill or Chaos" or "Churchill and Laski, Mr. Harold Laski being the current bogymen."⁷⁸ The electorate was, in other words, asked to choose for or against Churchill and they chose against.

The object of this sort of electioneering, "necessarily, is to give the Prime Minister a national standing which no colleague can rival so long as he remains the Prime Minister."⁷⁹ It strengthens his hands against his colleagues in the Government and Parliament. And, then, he appoints and dismisses his colleagues. He can shuffle his pack as and when he pleases. He alone determines whether and when Parliament shall be dissolved. In the inter-departmental disputes he is the arbitrator and if these disputes become a Cabinet question, his voice carries weight. To defy authority of the Prime Minister, therefore, and to challenge his position is suicidal to the political ambitions of a Minister unless the Prime Minister "has handled his job so badly that there is a widespread feeling" of his unfitness for it.

But the Prime Minister's position is bound up with the party system. His prestige, no doubt, is one of the elements that make for the success of the party. He is also responsible for party cohesion. But, without his party, he is nothing. He goes to the electorate not as an individual, but as a leader of the party. Whatever he is and whatever he can claim to be is due to what the party has made him. So long as he retains the hold of his party, "he is able, within limits, to dictate his policy." Once the party disowns him, he meets the fate of Ramsay MacDonald. Sir Robert Peel lost his party in 1845 and it ended his career. Gladstone returned to power in 1892, because he had never left his position in the party. The Prime Minister's power in office, thus, "depends in part on his personality, in part on his own prestige, and in part upon his party support." Defined powers legally conferred do not determine the position of the incumbent. "The office is," as Jennings says, "necessarily what the holder chooses to make it and what other ministers allow him to make of it. His authority is great, but his authority is a matter of influence in the context of the party structure. If he is a popular and dynamic figure, it is difficult for his colleagues to oppose him. Even the resignation of a leading Minister, as that of Lord Salisbury in 1957, and of Thorneycroft, Powell and Birch in 1958, may not unhinge the Prime Minister from his position. But he can be forced from office when faced with a substantial discontent in his Cabinet or his party. The resignations of Asquith in 1916, Lloyd George in 1922, MacDonald in 1935, and Chamberlain in 1940 came primarily as a result of discontent within the Government. Anthony Eden in 1957 and Harold Macmillan in 1963 were widely criticised within the party before illness brought their resignations.

78. Ibid., p. 186.

79. Laski, H.J., Parliamentary Government in England, p. 241.

Comparison with the American Presidency. The office of the Prime Minister is very often compared with the Presidency of the United States of America. The comparison is significant, for both resemble in many respects. But it would be too much, as Laski says, "to say that the position of a modern Prime Minister has approximated to that of an American President."⁸⁰ Even Churchill who attained new heights of power and authority had not the personal powers of the President of the United States. Harry Hopkins, in a report to President Roosevelt, wrote "Your 'former naval person' is not only the Prime Minister, he is the directing force behind the strategy and the conduct of war in all its essentials. He has an amazing hold on the British people of all classes and groups. He has particular strength both with the military establishments and the working people."⁸¹ Churchill, too, admitted that "never did a British Prime Minister receive from Cabinet colleagues the loyal and true aid which I enjoyed during the five years from these men of all parties in the State. Parliament, while maintaining free and active criticism, gave continuous, overwhelming support to all measures proposed by the Government, and the nation was united and ardent as never before."⁸² But Churchill accomplished all this because he had a united Cabinet, a united Parliament, and a united people behind him. Both the Cabinet and Parliament supported his policy. He could not act without his Cabinet as President Roosevelt could do. To illustrate the difference in the position and powers of the President of the United States and the British Prime Minister, Jennings says that "the President pledged the United States in the realization of the objectives of the Atlantic Charter while the War Cabinet, not the Prime Minister, pledged the United Kingdom."⁸³

This is the essence of the difference between the authority of a Prime Minister and a President of the United States. Churchill had to observe the constitutional forms by seeking the approval of the Cabinet and the Cabinet was dependent upon the unswerving support of the House of Commons. The Prime Minister is not the master in his Cabinet as the American President is in his. The Cabinet of the President is essentially a group of advisers appointed by and responsible to him. They are bound to give advice to the President should he ask for it, but have no authority to it. They do meet regularly and consider what the President likes to put before them, but they have no corporate rights which are recognised by custom. The difference between the British Cabinet and the American becomes clear by these two anecdotes. Melbourne ending the discussion

80. Ibid.

81. Quoted in Jennings' Cabinet Government, p. 181.

82. Churchill, W., The Second World War, Vol. II, p. 24.

83. Jennings, I., Cabinet Government, p. 181.

on Corn Laws said, "It does not matter what we say, but we must all say the same story." Lincoln, on the other hand, could say on putting the question in his Cabinet, "Noes seven, ayes one, the ayes have it."

The Prime Minister can less easily brush aside the opinions of his colleagues. His powers are large, but he has to secure the collaboration of his colleagues. His Cabinet consists of the party's most important leaders. They all share publicity with him to a greater extent. Sometimes one of them may even attract greater public interest and popular enthusiasm. Then, the Prime Minister is still officially not the first among equals in his Cabinet. His status must not, therefore, be thought of involving his superiority to and independence of his Cabinet, though in time of crisis or when he happens to be a man of outstanding personality, he may become the complete master of the situation. All the same, the Prime Minister "is solid with his colleagues; the party has cemented them together as a multiple but a corporate executive."⁸⁴ Churchill had such effective power that no British Prime Minister had had before. But the War Cabinet or Parliament could have ejected him if he would have lost the confidence of either of the two. The thought, therefore, that the Prime Minister stands high above and aloof from his colleagues and that he orders and decides "top policy," like the President of the United States is, according to Dr. Finer, "ridiculous; it is wishful thinking; it is misleading for Britain and for the United States." Even Harry Hopkins, who had reported in 1941 to President Roosevelt that "Churchill is the government in the every sense of the word,"⁸⁵ could find the difference between the authority of the Prime Minister and the President of the United States when he observed during three days of the Conference in the Atlantic that Churchill was constantly reporting and consulting the War Cabinet.⁸⁶ Whereas Roosevelt took all the decisions by himself, subject only to the advice of his immediate and self-selected entourage, which advice he could accept or reject, Churchill could do so only by inspiring those whom he had chosen as Ministers, and carrying them with him.

In his recent book, The Office of Prime Minister, Byrum E. Carter observes, "Comparisons between unlike systems are always inherently misleading, but it does seem safe to say that the power of the Prime Minister and his senior colleagues is substantially greater than that of the American President."⁸⁷ Carter assigns two reasons for his conclusion. First, the American President has no power to dissolve Congress and it sits for its specified period of time in the Constitution. The Congress may and it very often does drastically amend proposals which emanate from the administration. The President has, no doubt, certain means by which he can attempt legislation, "but they are not comparable in effectiveness to those wielded by the Prime Minister."⁸⁸ Secondly, the President is the head of a party, "but it is a party in which the central organisation has

84. Finer, H., The Theory and Practice of Modern Government, op. cit., p. 593.

85. Sherwood, Robert E. Roosevelt and Hopkins, p. 243.

86. More than thirty communications passed between Churchill and Clement Attlee, the Lord Privy Seal.

87. Carter, B.E., The Office of the Prime Minister, p. 336.

88. Ibid.

little control."⁸⁹ The real basis of party organisation in the United States has historically rested in the States and it is difficult for the central party to exercise discipline. The Prime Minister, on the other hand, heads a disciplined party and since general elections are now fought on personalities this "inevitably enables the party leader to extend his power against that of the rank and file members of the party, and even as against those individuals who exercise substantial intra-party influences themselves."⁹⁰ Summing up the difference in the powers and position of the British Prime Minister and the American President, Punnett says, "Certainly, the Prime Minister's power is greater than the authority of the President within the United States system, where the federal nature of the Constitution and the separation of powers raise barriers to the President's authority which do not exist for Prime Minister in Britain."⁹¹ In Britain, the unitary nature of the Constitution, and the unification rather than separation of powers make the authority of the Prime Minister, no matter how much he may be limited by the Cabinet, necessarily greater than that of the American President. But the President, wrote Woodrow Wilson, just before his first inauguration, "is expected by the Nation to be leader of his party as well as the Chief Executive officer of the Government, and the country will take no excuses from him. He must play the part and play it successfully or lose the country's confidence. He must be Prime Minister, as much concerned with the guidance of legislation as with the just and orderly execution of law, and he is the spokesman of the Nation in everything, even in the most momentous and most delicate dealings of the Government with foreign nations." Laski puts it in a matter of fact way when he says that "The President of the United States is both more and less than a King; he is also both more and less than a Prime Minister. The more carefully his office is studied, the more does its unique character appear."⁹²

Prime Ministerial Government. The confusion in not clearly demarcating the powers and position of the Prime Minister and the American President is closely linked with the popular belief that Britons no longer have Cabinet Government, but instead live under Prime Ministerial Government. Crossman argues that "...The post-war epoch has seen the final transformation of Cabinet Government into Prime Ministerial government..."⁹³ Mackintosh has also said, "...Now the country is governed by a Prime Minister, his colleagues, Junior Ministers and civil servants with the Cabinet acting as a clearing house and court of appeal."⁹⁴

Is it true that the Prime Minister, for all practical purposes is the Executive in Britain? Are the members of the Cabinet little more than his dependants, selected at his will and hold office so long the Prime Minister wishes them to? What real influence other Ministers exercise in the formulation of Cabinet policy in the context of the individual responsibility for the Departments under their charge as well as collective responsibility for Cabinet decisions?

89. Ibid.

90. Ibid.

91. Punnett, R.M., British Government and Politics, p. 307.

92. Laski, H.J., The American Presidency, p. 11.

93. Crossman, R.H., Introduction to English Constitution, p. 51.

94. Macintosh, J.P., The British Cabinet, p. 524.

It is now generally agreed that the Prime Minister's powers are today great, and in many respects are growing. The post-war period has many instances to prove the primacy of Prime Minister's power. For example, the decision to make the atom bomb by the first Labour Government was not taken in the Cabinet but in the Defence Committee of the Cabinet. The Suez adventure of 1956 was largely the personal policy of the Prime Minister, Anthony Eden. The decision to try to take Britain into the Common Market in 1961 was essentially that of the Prime Minister, Harold Macmillan. The decision of the Labour Government in 1965 to attempt a new approach to Europe also rested ultimately on the Prime Minister, Harold Wilson. The first seventeen months of Labour Government's regime after the 1964 General Elections disclose how greatly the Prime Minister was personally responsible for the tone and decisions of the Government as a whole.

Even then it does not mean that the Prime Minister is assuming the role of 'Presidential' authority, and that the increase in the authority of the Prime Minister has produced a basic change in the system of the Cabinet Government in Britain. Herbert Morrison rejects the thesis of Prime Ministerial Government and says that the Prime Minister, "...is not the master of the Cabinet", and he "...ought not to, and usually does not, presume to give directions or decisions which are proper to the Cabinet or one of its Committees."⁹⁵ Morrison is supported by many other writers and statesmen. They all accept that the Prime Minister is powerful, yet assert that he is not overwhelmingly supreme as he Cabinet remains a collective executive body. A Prime Minister cannot ride rough shod over the will of the Cabinet. And as stated earlier, he is both a captain and a man at the helm.⁹⁶ But he can remain at the helm only if he plays the game of politics like a captain. A captain must carry the team with him. Without a team there can be no captain just as without a captain there can be no team. The reality of collective responsibility, therefore, is not disproved by the great power of the Prime Minister in modern political conditions. Prime Ministerial power, therefore, must be understood as varying with political circumstances and with the personal fortunes of the man who wields it. "The fundamental fact about the position of the Prime Minister is that he must operate flexibly within parliamentary and Cabinet system in which power is distributed and which gives the Prime Minister as much command of the political situation as he can earn."⁹⁷ If his influence is as great as that of the American President, even then he is very far from having the powers of the President who is accountable to nobody except the electorate and that too after a specified period of four years. The Prime Minister, in varying degrees is, on the other hand, accountable to his Cabinet colleagues, his party and even, in some degree to the Opposition, as he considers it his duty to consult with the Leader of the Opposition at moments of national crisis.

95. Morrison, Lord, Government and Parliament, p. 52.

96. Amery, L.S., Thoughts on the Constitution, p. 72.

97. Ronald Butt, The Power of Parliament, p. 427.

SUGGESTED READINGS

- Amery, L.S. : Thoughts on the Constitution.
- Amos, A. : The English Constitution, pp. 63-83; 130-149.
- Anderson, Sir J. (Ed.). : British Government Since 1918.
- Bagehot, W. : The English Constitution.
- Birch, A.H. : Representative and Responsible Government, An Essay on the British Constitution, Chaps. 10-13.
- Brogan, D.W. : The American Political System, Chap. II.
- Campion and Others : British Government Since 1918, Chap. II.
- Campion and Others : Parliament: A Survey, Chaps. II, III.
- Carter, Byrum, E. : The Office of Prime Minister.
- Daalder, Hans : Cabinet Reform in Britain, 1914-1963.
- Derry, K. : British Institutions of Today, Chap. IV.
- Ehrmann, J. : Cabinet Government and War, 1890-1940.
- Finer, H. : Governments of Greater European Powers, Chap. VII
- Finer, H. : The Theory and Practice of Modern Government, Chap. XXIII.
- Greaves, H.R.G. : The British Constitution, Chap. V.
- Howard, A., and West, R. : The Making of a Prime Minister.
- Jennings, W.I. : The British Constitution, Chaps. VII, VIII.
- Jennings, W.I. : Cabinet Government, Chaps. II, III, VIII, IX, XIII.
- Jennings, W.I. : The Queen's Government, Chaps. 6, 7.
- Keith, A.B. : The British Cabinet System (1952, revised by Gibbs), Chaps. II-V.
- Laski, H.J. : The Crisis and the Constitution.
- Laski, H.J. : Parliamentary Government in England, Chap. V.
- Laski, H.J. : Reflections on the Constitution, Chaps. VIII-X.
- Lowenstein, K. : British Cabinet Government.
- Lowell, A.L. : The Government of England, Vol. I, Chaps. II, III.
- Mackintosh, John P. : The British Cabinet.
- Marshall, G. and Moodie, G.C. : Some Problems of the Constitution.
- Mathiot, Andre : The British Political System, pp. 135-163.
- Morrison, Herbert : Government and Parliament, Chaps. I-IV.
- Morrison, Herbert : Parliamentary Government.
- Muir, R. : How Britain is Governed, Chap. III.
- Ogg, F. : English Government and Politics, Chaps. VI, VII.
- Ogg, F. and Zink, H. : Modern Foreign Governments, Chaps. IV, V.
- Stannard, H. : The Two Constitutions, Chap. II.
- Wiseman, H.V. : Parliament and the Executive.

CHAPTER VI

THE MACHINERY OF GOVERNMENT

THE DEPARTMENT AT WORK

The Working of Government Departments. We have now seen how the Cabinet does its work. But the Cabinet is only policy-formulating body. All details with the working out of policies so formulated, and all routine business connected thereto are left to the various Ministries or Departments of the State located in the Whitehall, just in the vicinity of Parliament. These Departments are presided over by Ministers—usually, but not without exception Cabinet Ministers—no matter what they are called, First Lord, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Foreign Secretary, President of the Board, or by any other designation. The Minister is responsible for all activities of organisation within the Department with a view to successful implementation of policy of the Government. As the Minister cannot himself know about all the activities and operations of a large government Department, he must rely upon subordinates in whom he has confidence. A successful Minister is one who can develop a competent team of principal assistants and who can infuse the entire staff in the Department with his personality so that the organisation functions in a desirable and creditable manner. Harold Nicholson has written, "A minister of strong personality immediately alters the whole atmosphere of his department and in the shaping of events, atmosphere is a far more important element than the written word."

Below the Minister in a typical Department are one or two Junior Ministers designated as Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State or Parliamentary Secretary, who is also a member of the Ministry.¹ It is a frequent practice for one of those two Ministers to be chosen from the Lords and the other from the Commons in order that there may be some person in each House competent to represent the Department and answer queries with regard to its work.² They all go in and out of office with the change in the party control of Government. Hence their tenure of office is temporary and is dependent on the life of the Ministry. The function of the Junior Ministers is to relieve their senior Ministers of their burden by taking part in parliamentary debates and answering parliamentary questions, and by assisting in their departmental duties. Writing about the duties of an Under-Secretary, Winston Churchill says, he is often changed, "but his responsibilities are always limited. He has to serve his chief in carrying out the policy settled in the Cabinet, of which he is not a member and to which he has no access." He cannot dictate or determine policy that is the function of the Minister alone. This point came into prominence during the investigations of the Lynskey Tribunal in 1949. The Tribunal brought out that one Parliamentary Secretary had on occasion overruled the advice of the permanent officials in his Department without consulting the Minister. When this was revealed, Prime Minister Attlee laid down the definite ruling that a Junior Minister should not override the advice of the permanent officials in his Department without reference to his political chief, who alone is responsible to Parliament.

1. Where a senior Minister is a Secretary of State, the Junior Minister has the title of Parliamentary Under-Secretary.

2. The Ministers of the Crown Act, 1937, specified that only eighteen out of twenty-one Ministers listed in the Act could serve in the House of Commons at one time. The House of Commons Disqualification Act, 1957, declared that not more than twenty-nine senior Ministers listed in the Act, and not more than seventy Ministers in all, could serve in the House of Commons at one time. The Ministers of the Crown Act, 1964 increased from seventy to ninety-one the total number of Ministers to serve in the House of Commons and abolished the limit on the number of senior Ministers.

Below in the departmental chain is the Permanent Secretary³ who occupies a position of the very highest responsibility and importance. Then, there are a Deputy Secretary, Under-Secretary, Assistant Secretaries, Principals, Assistant Principals, and many others who do merely secretarial work of a purely routine character. Highest and lowest, these non-political agents of administration make up, in general, the Civil Service. Civil Servants are those servants of the Crown, other than holders of political or judicial offices, who are employed in a civil capacity, and whose remuneration is paid wholly and directly out of moneys voted by Parliament.⁴ Their tenure of office is permanent and they continue to function regardless of all political changes in the country. They are outside the domain of party politics and this is one of the most characteristic features of the Civil Service. The permanent heads have in most cases been so long attached to their respective Departments that they acquire a complete grasp of affairs within their own spheres. With their expert knowledge they help the Ministers to see that the Department works efficiently and in a particular direction determined by the policy of the Government. Lord Balfour has given a true picture of the position which Civil Servants occupy in Britain. "They do not control policy; they are not responsible for it. Belonging to no party, they are for that very reason an invaluable element in Party Government. It is through them, especially through their higher branches, that the transference of responsibility from one party or one minister to another involves no destructive shock to the administrative machine. There may be change of direction, but the curve is smooth."⁵ Indeed, to a large extent they direct the actual working of the Department, and the Minister who controls the Department relies mainly upon the Civil Service for any new course of action which he desires to take.

The Permanent Secretary of the Department is the chief civil servant of the Department and he occupies a pivotal position. In the first place,

3. Known as the Permanent Under-Secretary of State in those Departments where the Minister is a Secretary of State.

4. Based on a definition given by the Royal Commission on the Civil Service 1929-31 (The Tomlin Commission).

5. Introduction to Bagehot's English Constitution, p. xxiv.

he is the General Manager in charge of the administrative work of the Department. He is the head of the entire administrative hierarchy and, as such, is responsible to the Minister for the proper functioning of the Department. Secondly, he serves as chief adviser to the Minister on all matters of departmental policy and administration. Between the Minister and the Permanent Secretary there must exist mutual trust and confidence.

Below the Permanent Secretary the organisation of the Department fans out. Usually he has below him one or two Deputy Secretaries who supervise various branches of Ministry. They in turn have under them one or two Under-Secretaries each controlling several Assistant Secretaries, and below the Assistant Secretaries come the Principals and Assistant Principals. All lines of responsibility within the Department converge inward and upward to the Permanent Secretary and through him to the Minister.

Functions of the Departments. The functions of the Departments may be said to be four. First, a Department must answer for its administration to the public. To put it more accurately, the officials of the Department must provide to their political chief all relevant information so that he may defend the actions of his Department in Parliament and on the public platform. That is to say, the policy of the Department is so framed that it must be capable of "articulate rational defence." The second function of the Department is the drawing up of its policy. It performs this both from its own administrative experience and from the direction given to it by its political chief. The Department prepares the draft of the scheme, works out its details in accordance with the general policy of the Ministry and consults the interests likely to be affected by it. If the scheme of policy cannot be carried out within the existing framework of the law, then, it passes into the stage of proposals for the Bill. After its approval by the Cabinet Committee, it is sent to the Parliamentary Counsel to the Treasury to be drafted as a Bill to be laid before Parliament. The Bill is sponsored and piloted by the Minister and it is his responsibility to see it through. But permanent officials of the Department will have to be in attendance in the "box" of the House and Committees to assist him with information and advice. It will, thus, be clear that even if the inspiration for the Bill may have come from the Minister, the preparatory work is the task of the Departments and in great part the result of the influence exerted by the Civil Servants.

Finally, it is the implementation of the policy. When the policy has been determined, presented, and sanctioned, it becomes the duty of the permanent officials of the Department to see that it is faithfully carried out, even if it is not exactly what they might have advised. There is little evidence in Britain on civil servants sabotaging the policy of the responsible political head of their Department.

Most modern statutes are "skeleton legislation." Parliament legislates in general terms only, empowering the Department concerned to work out the detailed regulations necessary to give effect to the Statute. It may also merely empower a Department to make rules with regard to a specific matter. The regulations made by the Department have the force of law. The "statutory instruments" are so numerous that ever since 1890, Parliament has provided for the publication of an annual volume of "statutory rules and orders." Thus, the Department will, probably, concurrently with its preparation of the Bill, have been working out regulations and other acts of subordinate legislation, and shortly after the Bill becomes law will issue them in a form drafted by its own lawyers. This process of delegated legislation had been the subject of severe criticism and Lord Hewart, in his book, The New Despotism, characterised this practice, coupled with administrative adjudication, as "the new despotism" of the civil service. We will discuss this point a little more elaborately at a later stage.

Some administrative policy-making takes a quasi-judicial form. For example, the Minister of Town and Country Planning is empowered to decide what "development charge" shall be levied on land developers and where a new town shall be located. Similarly, it is for the President of the Board of Trade to determine what regions of the country shall be declared "development areas" in which industry will be financially encouraged to locate. Decisions of these kinds are not truly judicial as they do not determine legal rights. "They are, however, an extremely important means by which administrators make policy and shape the nation's future, within the framework of powers agreed to by Parliament."⁶

Departments of Government. It is not possible within the compass of this book to give a thorough description of the work done by each Department. It is worthwhile, however, to glance at the Departments arranged in groups by reference to similarity of work undertaken. The main Departments may be grouped thus:

(1) General Departments:

The Treasury.
The Home Office.
The Scottish Office.

(2) Economic Departments:

Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries, and Food.
Board of Trade.
The Board of Customs and Excise.
Ministry of Fuel and Power.
Ministry of Labour and National Service.
Ministry of Supply.
The Post Office.
The Ministry of Works.
Ministry of Housing and Local Government.
Ministry of Transport and Civil Aviation.

(3) Social Welfare Departments:

Ministry of Education.
Ministry of Health.
The Department of Technical Co-operation.
Ministry of Pensions and National Insurance.
The Department of Scientific and Industrial Research.

(4) Imperial and Foreign Departments:

The Foreign Office.

6. Marx, Foreign Governments (1952), p. 87.

The Colonial Office.

The Commonwealth Relations Office.

(5) Defence Departments:

The Admiralty.

The War Office.

The Air Ministry.

The Ministry of Aviation.

The Ministry of Defence.

This is not a comprehensive list. A full list is published at intervals by the Stationery Officer under the title "His Majesty's Ministers and Heads of Public Departments." The Ministry formed by Sir Winston Churchill in 1951 contained the holders of thirty-eight offices. In October 1961 there were thirty-five in the Government of Harold Macmillan. The Labour Government of Harold Wilson created five new Departments and also made certain major adjustments in the jurisdiction and functioning of the already existing Departments. The newly created Departments were: The Department of Economic Affairs, The Ministry of Technology, The Ministry of Overseas Development, The Ministry of Land and Natural Resources, and the Welsh Office.

The "Senior" Department is the Treasury. Nominally the heads of the Treasury are the Lords Commissioners: The First Lord of the Treasury (now always the Prime Minister), the Chancellor of the Exchequer and five junior Lords. In practice, the Lords Commissioners never meet as a Board and their responsibilities are carried by the Chancellor of the Exchequer assisted by the Financial Secretary and the Economic Secretary. There is also a Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury, who is the Chief Government Whip in the House of Commons.

The functions of the Treasury fall under four main headings: finance, control of expenditure, general civil service establishment matters, and co-ordination of economic policy. Since the Treasury has "the power of the purse", it has won for itself a position of supremacy and from the very early stage it is the most powerful Department of the Government. "The power of the purse of the Treasury," Sir Robert Chalmers, the Permanent Secretary to the Treasury, told the MacDonnell Commission, "means that all acts of administration requiring money (and practically all do in one form or another) come before the Treasury, and as a sort of shadow of that, there necessarily follow, and there are, intimately connected with it, all the staff questions as to how to carry out the administrative problems that come before the Treasury." One of the Permanent Secretaries of the Treasury is the Head of the Civil Service.

Parliamentary Counsel to the Treasury. The office of the Parliamentary Counsel is responsible for the drafting of all Government Bills, except those Bills or provisions of Bills extending exclusively to Scotland, which are handled by the Lord Advocate's Department. The office drafts all financial and other parliamentary motions and amendments moved by the Government during the passage of the Bills. It advises Departments on questions of parliamentary procedure, and attends committees and sittings in both Houses. It also drafts subordinate legislation when specially instructed, and advises the Government on legal, parliamentary and constitutional questions falling within its special experience.

Advisory Bodies. There are several hundred Committees and Councils attached to Government Departments for the purpose of consultation or expert advice, of which about 500 are permanent bodies attached to the main Departments. The advisory bodies are appointed by the Minister concerned and their membership includes civil servants, industrialists, trade unionists, university and industrial scientists, local government officials and experts from many other walks of life. There are three main types of such bodies: consultative bodies, in which representatives of the Government meet representatives of groups outside Government; expert bodies, which formulate recommendations for action in a particular field; and bodies which have advisory status but which in practice decide matters themselves, e.g., the Central Training Council in Child Care, the Air Transport Advisory Council, the Air Safety Board, etc.

In addition to these advisory committees there are ad hoc committees which the Government frequently sets up to examine and make recommendations on specific matters. For certain important inquiries a Royal Commission, whose members are selected on the grounds of their wide experience and diverse knowledge of the subject under study, may be appointed by Royal warrant. A Royal Commission examines written and oral evidence from government Departments and other interested organisations and individuals. The Commission makes recommendations which the government may accept in whole or in part or may take no action thereupon. Public inquiries are also undertaken by departmental committees appointed by the head of the appropriate department.

CIVIL SERVICE

Growth of the Civil Service. The Civil Service, as Graham Wallas truly called it, "is the one great political invention in nineteenth century England."⁸ Originally, the work of Government was done by persons of the Royal Household. With the development of the Cabinet system of government they came to be recruited by patronage, though it did not assume the form of Spoils System as it had prevailed in the United States. Once appointed, an official could expect to be retained so long as he was in good health and reasonably efficient. But in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries such a system of recruitment was severely condemned by persons like Burke, Bentham and Carlyle. The Hailebury experiment which aimed to give a rigorous training for youngmen destined to go to India in the service of the East India Company, provided an impetus for immediate reform of the British Civil Service. By the middle of the nineteenth century competitive examinations were introduced, first for the Indian Civil Service, and then, in 1870, for the British Civil Service. A Civil Service Commission was established through the initiative of Gladstone, which was alone empowered to admit persons to the service. Since that time several careful studies and a number of Orders-in-Council have furnished the basis of increased efficiency in matters of recruitment, division of the services into different grades, admission of women, determination of pay scales, etc. The result has been a large degree of unification.

8. Ibid.

Fundamental changes in the structure and practices of the Civil Service to equip it for the most efficient discharge of the present and prospective responsibilities of Government have been recommended by a Committee set up by the Government in 1966 under the Chairmanship of Lord Fulton, Vice-Chancellor of the University of Sussex.

The number of civil servants is about a million and of these about two-fifths are industrial civil servants (primarily post office Engineers and employees in naval dockyards and Royal Ordinance Factories). But the term of civil servant is generally used to cover non-industrial members of the staffs of the various Government Departments in the United Kingdom or working overseas. The total number of non-industrial civil servants employed in all Departments, at home and overseas, is about 855,000⁹ nearly one-third are women. The great expansion in State planning is essentially responsible for this huge number of civil servants. It has also led to further reorganization.

Organisation of the Service. The guiding principles of Civil Service organisation are very simple and obvious. They are three: a unified service; recruitment by open competition, and classification of posts into intellectual for policy and clerical for mechanical work, to be filled separately by separate examinations. In 1920, as a result of the recommendations of the Reorganization Committee—a Committee of the National Council—Civil Service was reorganized and an executive grade was interposed between the administrative and clerical. The report set out a simple two-fold division. "The administrative and clerical work of the civil service," it reported, "may be said, broadly, to fall into two main categories. In one category may be placed all such work as either is of a simple mechanical kind or consists in the application of well-defined regulations, decisions and practice to particular cases; in the other category, the work which is concerned with the formation of policy, with the revision of existing practice or current regulations and decisions, and with the organization and direction of the business of Government." Each of these two main categories contains two of the four existing general classes.

1. The Administrative Class. The administrative class is the pivotal and directing class of the whole civil service, which numbers about 3,900.¹⁰ From the Permanent Secretaries down to the Assistant Principals—the descending order of officers in this cadre being: Permanent Secretary, Deputy Secretary, Under-Secretary, Assistant Secretary, Principal and Assistant Principal, the last type is just a cadet being trained by one of the Principals—"they are responsible for transmitting the impulse from their political chief, from the statutes and declarations of policy through the rest of the service and out of the public."¹¹ On this group rest the responsibilities for advising Ministers on questions of policy, and for controlling and directing Departments. It is a body of advisers, "a permanent brains trust," who find solutions for various administrative problems that arise outside the normal routine of departmental work, supply suggestions which may form the ingredients of supreme policy, and interpret regulations applying them to difficult cases. Sir Warren Fisher has cogently explained the principles on which civil servants act: "Determination of policy is the function of Ministers, and once a policy is determined it is the unquestioned and unquestionable business of the civil servant to strive to carry out that policy with precisely the same goodwill whether he agrees with it or not. That is axiomatic and will never be in dispute. At the same time, it is the traditional duty of civil servants, while decisions are being formulated, to make available to their political chiefs all the information and experience at their disposal, and to do this without fear or favour, irrespective of whether the advice thus tendered may accord or not with the minister's initial view. The presentation to the minister of relevant facts, the ascertainment and marshalling of which may often call into play the whole organization of the department, demands of the civil servant greatest care. The presentation of inferences from the facts equally demands from him all the wisdom and all the detachment he can command."¹²

9. Including part-time staff—two part-time officers being reckoned to one whole time officer.

10. As in September 1968.

The Administrative Class itself formulated its duties in a statement submitted to the Tomlin Commission.¹³ These duties have been succinctly summed up by Jennings. He writes that the civil servant's function is "to advise, to warn, to draft memoranda and speeches in which the Government's policy is expressed and explained, to take the consequential decisions which flow from a decision on policy, to draw attention to difficulties which are aiming or are likely to arise through the execution of policy, and generally to see that the process of government is carried on in conformity with the policy laid down."¹⁴ Sir Horace Wilson, then Permanent Secretary in the Ministry of Labour, defined the duties of the Administrative class to the Tomlin Commission. He said, "Broadly speaking, the main quality that is required seems to me to be a capacity to take the facts about a particular subject, to put them into shape, to suggest the deductions that might be drawn from them, to propose the lines of policy that might be adopted in relation to them, and generally to apply a constructive analytical mind to what I would call the policy of the Ministry."

For the efficient performance of these arduous duties the Administrative Officers must necessarily possess a trained mental equipment of a high order capable of the ready mastery of complex and intricate problems. The qualities exactly wanted in an Administrative Officer are judgment, savoir faire, insight and fairmindedness. For, the men who enter this class are not, as Finer says, "merely secretarial; they are the young shoots who

11. Finer, H., The Theory and Practice of Modern Government, op. cit., p. 767.

12. As quoted in Jennings' Cabinet Government, op. cit., pp. 114-115.

13. It is reproduced in full in Finer's The Theory and Practice of Modern Government, pp. 769-770.

14. Jennings, I., Cabinet Government, op. cit., p. 116.

may twenty years hence be permanent heads of the departments or very closely associated with it."¹⁵ Its members are, in majority of cases, university graduates who attained front rank eminence at the universities. After having entered service, through competitive examination, they get a general training, in more or less every branch of administration up to a comparatively late age. This is, according to the argument of Macaulay and Jowett, a better qualification for intellectual work than a special training, and that success in that training is likely to indicate desirable qualities of character. It also accounts for the liberal outlook of the civil servants in England.

The members of the Administrative class are recruited between the ages of 20½ and 24 by a severe competitive examination, and normally 100 are appointed to the Service every year. New recruits serve a two-year probationary period and, then, if considered satisfactory, advance as rapidly as their industry and talents justify.

Recruitment into the class is by no means confined to ordinary competition entrants and to candidates of University standard who entered by special competition in the two post-war periods. About 40 per cent of the total are recruited from other classes, mainly the Executive class, by promotion, limited competition, or transfer. This is partly due to the pressure from staff associations representing the other classes, anxious to secure opportunities of promotion for their members and partly due to the greater needs of government than could be met from the regular planned intake into the class.

2. The Executive Class. The next is the executive class. It is mainly recruited from both men and women between the ages of 17½ to 19, who have completed secondary education, and pass the competitive examination. If the members of the clerical classes show resourcefulness, initiative and judgment, they may also be promoted to this class. The duties of the Executive Class can best be understood in the words of the Reorganization Committee. "To this class," reported the Committee, "we would assign the higher work of supply and accounting departments, and of other executive and specialised branches of the civil service. This work covers a wide field, and requires in different degrees qualities of judgment, initiative, and resource. In the junior ranks it comprises the critical examination of particular cases of lesser importance not clearly within the scope of approved regulations or general decisions, initial investigations in matters of higher importance, and immediate direction of small blocks of business. In its upper ranges it is concerned with matters of internal organization and control, with the settlement of broad questions arising out of business in hand or in contemplation, and with the responsible conduct of important operations." Members of this class, in brief, undertake preliminary investigations of the problems before the Department, collect data, arrange and classify it, and make observations thereto. They may have some direction in matters of minor importance. Their functions, thus, may be compared to those of the non-commissioned officers in the army. Members of this class may, after entry, be trained for specialist work such as that of auditor, actuary or statistician. The Executive class numbers some 80,000.

15. Finer, H., The Theory and Practice of Modern Government, op. cit., p. 770.

3. The Specialist Classes. The specialist classes (General and Departmental), which number about 130,000, include Scientific, Professional and Technical classes and other classes which carry out the wide range of specialised activities now undertaken by the Government. The categories include Accountants, Architects, Doctors, Economists, Engineers, Lawyers, Librarians, Statisticians, Surveyors and Scientists in all branches of science. The recruitment to such jobs is not subject to competitive examination. Specialists who possess duly recognised qualifications and a particular standard of training and experience are appointed for individual jobs. Vacancies are advertised and the selection is made through the method of interview.

4. The Clerical Class. This is the largest of the main classes, comprising about 120,000 officers, both men and women. The age limits are sixteen and seventeen years and the competitive examination corresponds to the point at the intermediate stage of a secondary school course. Considerable number of members of those who are admitted to this class enter by promotion. Apart from the routine clerical duties which they may be required to perform in their early career, the duties of this class involve the preparation of accounts and the keeping of records, the handling of particular claims in accordance with known rules, and the summarising and annotation of documents for the assistance of senior officers.

5. The Ancillary Clerical Classes. They number some 97,000 and include clerical assistants, shorthand typists and typists, duplicator operators.

6. Messengerial and minor classes. They number some 26,000 which, in addition to messengers, include paper keepers, office cleaners and similar workers.

In addition, there are many other departmental classes where employment is peculiar to one department, for example, Post Office, Factory Inspectorate of the Department of Employment and Productivity, School Inspectorate of the Ministry of Education and Science, the Inspectorate of Children's Department of the Home Office, and the Mines Inspectorate of the Ministry of Power.

The Diplomatic Service. The Diplomatic Service is a separate self-contained service of the Crown, which provides the staff (comprising some 6,200 civil servants) for services in the Foreign Office and Commonwealth Office and at United Kingdom diplomatic missions and consular posts in foreign and in independent Commonwealth countries. Its functions include advising on policy, negotiating with overseas governments and conducting business in international organizations promoting British exports and the advancement of British trade; presenting British ideas; and protecting British interests abroad.

The Service has its own grade structure, corresponding by salary with the grades of the Administrative, Executive and Clerical classes of the Home Civil Service. It also has Secretarial, Communications and Security Guard branches. Various specialists and advisers from Home Departments or the armed forces may serve at overseas posts on secondment or attachment to the Diplomatic Service.

CIVIL SERVICE EVALUATED

Role of Civil Service. The growth of the Civil Service in Britain is a comparatively modern phenomenon. During this period the British Civil Service has assumed a great constitutional prominence. Three factors are of particular importance in this respect. The first is the change from the negative State to the positive State. As the functions of the State increased, the services of a professional staff were increasingly recognised necessary and the complexity of the work involved compelled the Ministers to leave to their officials all but the largest decisions on major policy. But when the issue is one which must be submitted for the Minister's personal decision, it has even then to be fully and fairly presented to him so that all the material facts and considerations are before him. Civil Servants matter in the determination and presentation of the relevant material.

Here is a hierarchy of decisions given by Jennings in his book. The British Constitution.¹⁶

"Routine and minor discretion	.. Executive Class.
Discretion within a policy	.. Assistant Secretary.
Departmental policy	.. Permanent Secretary and Minister.
Government policy	.. Cabinet."

This is, indeed, a rough classification, but the fact remains that a very large number of decisions is taken by senior Civil Servants. Even if the decision is taken by the Minister or the Cabinet, the case must be prepared. Information is collected by the Principal or an Assistant Principal, and he gives his suggestions, if he is asked to do. His memorandum goes to the Assistant Secretary who gives his own comments and if he does not approve the work of the Principal he may prepare it anew. Then, the file may travel to others in the same Department or in other Departments, if it concerns any other, for their remarks and all concerned may add their comments of agreement or disagreement. At the end, when the file goes to the Minister, it contains "a definite statement of the practicable alternatives, with the arguments for and against each of them. He can see the files if he wishes, but generally there is no need, because the combined wisdom of the Department has brought the question down to an issue where commonsense and political savoir faire are the qualities required. If he says that he must consult the Cabinet, he makes up his own mind and gets an Assistant Secretary (who perhaps gets a Principal) to state the case in a Cabinet Memorandum."

The second is the method of recruitment by open competition conducted by an independent body, the Civil Service Commission. The open competitive examination is not an examination in special and professional subjects deemed necessary as a preparation for a career of professional administration. Such a system of examination has, no doubt, certain tangible defects. But the British system of competitive examination aims at testing the general ability of candidates. Coupled with the written test is the viva voce test. The object of the interview is to fathom their intelligence and alertness, vigour and strength of their character, and potential qualities of leadership so that the administrators of tomorrow may not only think, argue, and write, but also devise, act and lead.

It does not, however, mean that there is in Britain no political or purely personal influence on appointments or promotions. But the grossest forms of patronage are certainly absent. This is one of the very important reasons of the high standard of efficiency maintained by the Civil Service. The civil servant in Britain is not so ruthlessly subjected to the disappointment and irritation caused, as for instance in Canada, and for many reasons in India, by the imposition over their heads of ministerial proteges of minor capacity. The British public service traditions encourage honest opinion and fearless criticism. But so long as politicians can influence in any vulgar sense appointments, promotions and the distribution of honours there is, as Jennings aptly says, "a risk of toadying, flattery and self-seeking."

The third important reason is the ethics of the British Civil Service or the code of conduct which every civil servant is required to observe. This is a code laid down partly in Acts of Parliament and partly in orders, regulations, and instructions issued by the Government and by Departments of the Government. "It is a stringent code," as Barker puts it, "designed to prevent any chance of economic corruption and any opportunity of political influence." The principles it enjoins and the standards it sets work as effectively as the professional codes of the doctor and the lawyer in that country and like them the British administrative code of ethics, too, rapidly became a model for the whole world.

The British civil servant is rigidly neutral and rigorously impartial in economic and party political issues. He "may not make political speech, print a partisan article or tract, edit or publish a party newspaper, canvass for a party candidate or serve on a party committee." He probably by nature, but most certainly by training, stands somewhat aloof from political parties. He has neither any personal motive nor any design. By virtue of his security of tenure he represents the principle of continuity in government. He is, in fact, a link between successive Ministries and the repository of principles and practices which endure while governments come and go. He serves with equal fidelity whatever be the complexion of Government. In 1932, when Britain became protectionist the officials of the Treasury and the Board of Trade did their best to produce the most efficient protective system that their ingenuity could devise. When MacDonald succeeded Lord Curzon, in 1924, at the Foreign Office, the official who had served Lord Curzon continued as MacDonald's Private Secretary. The Labour Party had really no occasion in 1924, in 1929 or in 1945, as also in 1964 and in 1966 to change the occupants of some of the key positions in public service. "To prevent any possible difficulty in Foreign policy," writes Jennings, "Mr. Arthur Henderson, who became Foreign Secretary in 1929, circulated in the Foreign Office copies of the official Labour Party programme, Labour and the Nation.

By 1945, however, the views of Labour politicians were sufficiently well understood to make such a precaution unnecessary." The fact is, that the civil servants are servants of Her Majesty, the Government—whatever the political colour of that Government may be—and of the nation as a whole.

There is no evidence to show any kind of intrigue between civil servants and the Opposition. All civil servants feel a temporary allegiance to the party in power and its programme, no matter what their bias or personal conviction. All do their jobs with honesty. The men at the top give their advice frankly until their chief has reached his decision. But once the decision is there they deem it their duty to carry that out loyally. The British Civil Service is loyal to the Government of the day. Herbert Morrison relates an important incident to illustrate it. "Some American officials", he writes, "in attendance on the United States Government representatives at the Potsdam Conference in 1945 had an experience which to them was surprising. During the first part of the Potsdam discussions between representatives of the Governments of the United States, the Soviet Union, and the United Kingdom, the British General Election was proceeding. Some of the Americans said to some of the British: 'If there is a change of Government as a result of the election in your country there will be, we suppose, changes in your important civil servants. So may be we shan't see these British civil servants any more.' They were assured, though they were not wholly convinced, that this would not happen; they were genuinely surprised and could not follow it when Mr. Attlee turned up as Prime Minister and head of the British delegation in the second part of the Conference, instead of Mr. Churchill, accompanied by the same civil servants as served Mr. Churchill."

Confidential communications—and they are numberless—the Civil Servants treat as sacred even from their next parliamentary chief. If one Minister prepares a scheme which never materialises, the Permanent Secretary of the Department may refuse to show the relevant documents to the succeeding Minister and the beauty is that the latter would recognise the propriety of such a course. Here is an anecdote given by Mr. Morrison. He writes, "In talking in my younger days to a high civil servant who had formerly worked under me I was vigorously—perhaps in the circumstances too vigorously—denouncing the policy of his new master, my successor in office. At a moment when it became clear that I was somewhat embarrassing him, he said, 'Well, Mr. Morrison, I can only say that different Ministers have different ways', which illustrated the meritorious loyalty which the civil service quite properly owes and practises towards Ministers."¹⁷ Nor must the civil servant use any information gained through his work to improve his personal position or to gain pecuniary benefits. Examples are very rare when a Permanent Secretary, as it happened in 1936 when Secretary of the Air was dismissed for using his knowledge of public negotiation for his own private advantage, may be removed from office for violation of the principles of the civil service code. Morrison says, "We are proud of the British Civil Service. As a whole, they are efficient, public spirited, incorruptible; very, very rarely does a British Civil Servant get convicted of bribery, corruption, nepotism, treachery or favouritism."¹⁹

17. Morrison, H., Government and Parliament, pp. 319-20.

18. Ibid., pp. 38-39.

Should the Ministers be experts? It is very often complained that Ministers are amateurs in the art of government and the administration is actually carried on by the civil service. It is, no doubt, true that Ministers are laymen²⁰ with no knowledge of the Department they have to preside.²¹ Then, their appointment and allotment of portfolios is a matter of political consideration and expediency rather than their liking or aptitude for the work they are expected to perform. Even if a Minister is able to get a Department of his own choice, it is impossible for him to qualify as an expert. The work of a Department is a vast mass of administrative details. It is not possible for the Ministers to follow all the details and go into the heaps of files to master the case, particularly when their attention is largely engrossed in the more active field of politics; the Cabinet, Parliament, and the platform. They have, therefore, the critics argue, no decisions of their own to make and simply endorse what their subordinates tell them to do. It is, accordingly, suggested that only those persons should be appointed Ministers and Departments assigned to them who have adequate professional experience related to the work they will be expected to supervise. It is further asserted that if in France and other Continental countries it is not uncommon to put military and naval men in charge of War and Marine Ministries, why cannot a similar practice be followed in Britain? Another example cited is that of the United States where there is now a growing tendency to place at the head of at least a few of the Executive Departments, like agriculture and labour, experts in the work with which they are concerned.

But this is not the problem of the Parliamentary system of government. The essence of Cabinet Government is Ministerial Responsibility; responsibility for which the electorate had given its verdict at the time of the general elections and responsibility which the Government must conscientiously own and discharge during the tenure of its office. The Government is wedded to a particular policy and its first concern is to see it through to the satisfaction of those who have returned them to authority. Perhaps the best simple statement of the basic principle involved is that of Sir George Cornewell. It is quoted by Bagehot and has

19. Lord Morrison, British Parliamentary Democracy, p. 17.

20. Sir Winston Churchill was successively Under-Secretary of State for Colonies, President of the Board of Trade, Home Secretary, First Lord of the Admiralty, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Minister of Munitions, Secretary of State for War and Air, Secretary of State for the Colonies, Chancellor of the Exchequer, First Lord of the Admiralty, and Prime Minister.

21. "We require," wrote Sidney Low, "some acquaintance with the technicalities of their work from the subordinate officials, but none from the responsible chiefs. A youth must pass an examination in arithmetic before he can hold a second-class clerkship in the Treasury, but a Chancellor of Exchequer may be a middle-aged man of the world who has forgotten what little he ever learnt about figures at Eton or Oxford". The Government of Britain, p. 201. Disraeli, while forming a Ministry, offered the Board of Trade to a man who wanted instead the Local Government Board. "It does not matter", said Disraeli, "I suppose you know as much about trade as the First Lord of the Admiralty knows about ships."

been times out of number repeated: "It is not the business of a Cabinet Minister to work his department. His business is to see that it is properly worked." The late Mr. Ramsay MacDonald put it still more graphically. "The Cabinet," he said, "is the bridge linking up the people with the expert, joining principle to practice. Its function is to transform the message sent along sensory nerves into command set through motor nerves. It does not keep the departments going; it keeps them going in certain directions." The work of a Minister is, thus, to help framing general policies and to see that they are carried out by the staff employed for the purpose. The authority of the Civil Service and for that matter of the experts is, accordingly, one of influence, not of power. "It indicates," as Laski says, "consequences; it does not impose commands. The decision which results is the Minister's decision; its business is the provision of the material within which, in its judgment, the best decision can be made."

There are many advantages if the head of Department is a layman. A layman sees the Department as a whole. His vision is broad and his attitude compromising and, accordingly, progressive. The mental attitude of an expert is narrow and he is apt to exaggerate the importance of technical questions. When an expert supervises the work of an expert, there is likely to be friction and disagreement, for it is the habit of experts to disagree. In order to produce really good results, and avoid the dangers of friction, and consequently inefficiency and bureaucracy, it is necessary "to have in administration a proper combination of experts and men of the world."²² An amateur Minister may, again, serve as an intermediary between one Department and the other and his own Department and the House of Commons, to which body he is responsible for carrying out a certain policy. Government is one single whole and there is and must be organic unity in the various aspects of administration. A layman who takes a general view of a Department, considers himself and his Department a part of the bigger whole and endeavours to shape his policy in accordance with the general policy, and will see that its various parts keep in line, and in particular watch that experts remember that they are to work as members of a team as servants of the Crown, that is to say, of the Queen's Ministers and that they provide a store of knowledge and experience.

It is true that the political head of a Department should be well informed of the work to be carried on under his direction. But it does not mean that he is expected to qualify as an expert. In every Department there is division of labour and scores of problems come which demand high order of practical and technical proficiency, and even departmental experts with permanent tenure cannot claim specialisation in all those problems. How can, then, it be possible for a Minister, whose tenure of office is short and precarious, to master everything which concerns his Department? The permanent heads of Departments cannot be experts in the sense that a great physicist, a great surgeon, or a great artist is an expert. "They do not live in a realm", in the words of Prof. Laski, "into which the ordinary cannot enter." Any one who remembers the intellect and power of grasping details of Sir John Simon or Sir Stafford Cripps will agree that these are the qualities which a Minister requires in his relation with his Department. "We send men into the Treasury," concludes Laski, "not because they are trained economists; so also in the Ministry of Agriculture or the Board of Education. They are valuable as administrators less because they have expert knowledge of a technical subject-matter but because we believe, on the evidence rightly, that their training will endow them with qualities of judgment and initiative without which no Government can be successfully run. But these are exactly the qualities a politician must have if he is to be successful, normally in the struggle for place."²³

22. Lowell, A.L., The Government of England, Vol. I, p. 173.

Growing tendency towards Bureaucratic Government. A further criticism against Whitehall is the danger of bureaucracy. Ramsay Muir maintains that "bureaucracy" in Britain "thrives under the cloak of ministerial responsibility." He asserts that the continuous and persistent influence of the permanent civil service in the three functions of administration, legislation and finance is the dominating fact of British governance today and, as such, the element of bureaucracy is of vital importance, "though its strength is marked by the doctrine of ministerial responsibility."²⁴ This criticism implies that permanent officials control the life of the nation. Various, and not without much truth, arguments are advanced in this connection. First, it is contended that in the carrying out of established policy, many acts are done every day which involve a policy. The Minister simply conveys the general directions of a policy approved by Parliament and directs the Department to carry it through. He has no time to look to the daily working directions. The permanent civil servant is an expert fully conversant with the details and their implications and he, accordingly, tends to shape the day-to-day policy of the administration.

Secondly, in devising new policy, which may take the form of Bills to be put before Parliament, the influence exercised by the civil servants is supreme. Ministers simply receive vague indications of policy from their party or Cabinet. But the material to serve the basis for a draft Bill has to be provided by officials of the Department concerned. Then, the actual drafting of a Bill is a complicated and a difficult task. A layman will make the worst of a job if he attempts it. It is done by the officials of the Parliamentary Counsel under the Treasury. "Only an expert can fit the new policy into the old administration; and the permanent official may often have to suggest to the political Ministers what can and what cannot be done, as well as how to do what can be done. Thus new policy is very often the actual product, and still more often the result of corrections and suggestions of the permanent civil servants."²⁵ It is not the civil servants at the top who exert the influence alone and shape policy. There are many less important decisions and even some elements of policy which are influenced by the lower ranks of the civil service. In every Government Department responsibility must be delegated. This involves giving some control over policy to civil servants lower on the ladder.

23. Laski, H.J., Parliamentary Government in England, op. cit., p. 293.

24. Refer to Ramsay Muir's How Britain is Governed, Chap. 11.

25. Burns, C.D. Whitehall, p. 69.

Thirdly, the method of asking questions in Parliament is deemed to be the best method by which the governed can exercise some control over the acts of the administrative departments and, thereby, getting redress of wrong done. But the critics of Parliamentary system of government in Britain point out that this method "is crude and largely ineffectual." The questions are, undoubtedly, answered by the political heads of Departments, yet the answers are formulated by the permanent officials. It is very difficult for a Private Member to get information if the answers prepared by experts tend to obscure the issue. More than this, even if the officials be willing and keen to tell the whole truth, the questioner is often at a disadvantage, because he does not know enough to frame an effective question. And even if the question is effective, it is put after the administration has acted and there is no effective method yet devised to control the day-to-day policy of a Department before it is formed.

Then, there is usually a clear and rigid hierarchy of authority from the Minister down to the most junior official and all this inevitably creates what is popularly known, "red tape." It means that many official decisions "are taken by rather wooden, rule-of-thumb methods." The citizens feel aggrieved, because of the stereotyped method of disposal of the cases and rigid application of the rules without taking cognizance of the peculiarities involved therein. The system also takes pretty long time to dispose them of finally. All this is nothing short of bureaucracy which defeats the purposes of a democratic government, more so parliamentary democracy. "The faults most commonly enumerated are over-devotion to precedent; remoteness to the rest of the community, inaccessibility, and faulty handling of the general public; lack of initiative and imagination; ineffective organization and misuse of man-power; procrastination and unwillingness."²⁶ The officials regard the routines more important than the results and value the means employed more than the needs aimed at. "The trained official," as Bagehot said, "hates the rude, untrained public. He thinks that they are stupid, ignorant, reckless."²⁷

But the real danger of bureaucracy, it is pointed out, is the process by which the Departments have been made a source of legislation in the shape of orders and regulations issued in supplement of the legislation passed by Parliament, and a source of jurisdiction, in the sense of issuing decisions on a number of contentious issues which arise in the course of their work. In other words, the exercise of what is described as delegated legislation and administrative adjudication are really a great enhancement in the powers of the Executive. It is true that, in form, such powers of legislation are exercised in the name of the political chief of the Department, but, in fact, they are actually exercised by administrative officials. Then, the Executive goes a step further by establishing departmental tribunals or quasi-tribunals, which decide disputes arising under these orders and regulations. As long as the decision is within the scope of broad grant of powers given by Parliament, it is legal and the justice or wisdom of the Minister's decision cannot be questioned in a court of law; it is final. But at the back of this final decision of the Minister is some anonymous civil servant. Moreover, the Minister, or rather the civil servant, is not governed by the rules of judicial procedure, which are incumbent upon the courts, and may, therefore, make decisions without giving an opportunity to the affected party to submit evidence or to plead and argue his case. It would, accordingly, seem that both these powers of legislation and jurisdiction have made the authority of the administrative departments arbitrary and unduly free from restraint. For, both these methods oust Parliament and the courts of law from the exercise of their respective authority and the natural outcome is omni-competent bureaucracy.²⁸

26. Report of the Committee on the Training of Civil Servants (1944).

27. The English Constitution, p. 172.

But this is, again, not a correct appraisal. Lowell suggested in his now classical book, The Government of England, that in England the danger of bureaucracy had disappeared through the particular type of relationship between amateur and professional involved in the clear distinction of political from non-political agents.²⁹ Bureaucracy, according to Laski, "is the term usually applied to a system of government, the control of which is so completely in the hands of the officials that their power jeopardizes the liberties of ordinary citizens." The permanent officials in Britain are not the masters of the situation. The Civil Service is, no doubt, the reservoir of experience and knowledge. They furnish the Cabinet and Parliament with much of the information and material which is required in shaping and enacting policies on a multitude of subjects. But they do not dominate the administration and fix the tone and character of the Government. At the head of every Department is a responsible political chief who really rules. It is he who is responsible to Parliament and the people for carrying out the policy, and the civil servants must adjust themselves to carry out that policy. If a Member of Parliament, who represents the people, feels that an injustice has been done to an individual, or a wrong principle is being applied, he may ask the Minister privately for an explanation. And all Ministers do it readily. If the explanation offered does not satisfy him, he can ask the question in the House. If the answer, again, does not meet his criticism, he may raise like subject in a debate. But a responsible Minister will like to avoid such an eventuality, because, as Jennings correctly remarks, that "even more important than the fact that questions are asked is the fact that questions may be asked."³⁰ This fact makes the Minister alert. He must not make mistakes because he is responsible. He will exercise a greater degree of care and caution because he can be questioned in Parliament about the mistakes of the most junior official. The Civil Servants, also, know the precarious position of their political chief, and, therefore, they, too, must not make mistakes. This they have to remember all the time and at every step.

A bureaucracy, therefore, controlled by Parliament, and subject to Parliamentary chiefs is not a bureaucracy. The Civil Service in Britain is part of a democratic and responsible form of government in which abuse of power would lead to a quick and drastic public reaction which would cause some "heads to roll". The responsible Minister, who is at the head of the civil servants, would continue reminding them the inner meaning of Sir William Hercourt's remark "what the public won't stand."³¹ This is the primary function of a Minister and this is the real meaning of Cabinet Government. The whole development is, accordingly, permissive development proceeding from Parliament, subject to Parliament, and terminable by Parliament. The difficulties created by 'red tape' are perhaps a small price to pay for compensating advantages.

28. Hewart, Lord, The New Despotism.

29. Vol. I, Chap. VIII.

30. The British Constitution, op. cit., p. 134

SUGGESTED READINGS

- | | |
|--|--|
| Bridges, Sir Edward | : Portrait of a Profession. |
| Burns, C.D. | : Whitehall. |
| Campbell, G.A. | : The Civil Service in Britain. |
| Campion and others | : Parliament: A Survey , Chap. VI. |
| Clarke, J.J. | : Outlines of Central Government. |
| Critchley, T.A. | : The Civil Service Today. |
| Dunnill, Frank | : The Civil Service. |
| Finer, H. | : The British Civil Service. |
| Finer, H. | : Governments of Greater European Powers , Chap. 8. |
| Finer, H. | : The Theory and Practice of Modern Government , Chap. XXX. |
| Hewart, Lord | : The New Despotism. |
| Jennings, W.I. | : British Constitution , Chap. VI. |
| Jennings, W.I. | : Cabinet Government , pp. 110-133. |
| Keith, A.B. | : The British Cabinet System. |
| Laski, H.J. | : Parliamentary Government in England , pp. 263-308 and Chap. VI. |
| Laski, H.J. | : Reflections on the Constitution , Chaps XI-XIII. |
| Low, S. | : The Governance of England , Chap. VI. |
| Lowell, A.L. | : The Government of England , Vol. I, Chaps VII, VIII. |
| Mackenzie, W.J.M. and Grove, J.W. | : Central Administration in Britain. |
| Muir, R. | : How Britain is Governed , Chap. II. |
| Ogg, F.A. and Zink, H. | : Modern Foreign Governments , Chap. VI, VII. |
| Ogilvy Webb, M. | : The Government Explains. |
| Robson, W.A. | : The British Civil Servants. |
| Royal Commission on the Civil Service. | |
| Wheare, K.C. | : The Civil Service in the Constitution. |
| Wilson, F.M.G., and
Chester, D.N. | : The Organization of British Central Government. |

31. As quoted in Laski's Parliamentary Government in England, op. cit., p. 288.

CHAPTER VII

PARLIAMENT

The origin of Parliament. Parliament is often described by its critics as a mere "Talking Shop". This description is used opprobriously and yet that is what the word Parliament means and to a great extent it describes the actual institution. It is a place where people talk about the affairs of the nation.

The earliest document in which the word 'parliament' is found is the eleventh-century Chanson de Roland, where it is used simply to refer to a conversation between two persons. But the word early acquired a derivative meaning, that of an assembly of persons in which discussion took place. A contemporary referred to the meeting at Runnymede as the parliament in which King John "gave his charter to the barons." Anyway, by 1258 Parliament had evidently begun to acquire a special meaning. In June, of the same year, one of the reforms demanded by the barons at Oxford was three parliaments a year "to treat the business of the King and Kingdom." Clearly, therefore, the essence of Parliament is discussion and when the word was first applied to the great councils of the English Kings it was with the view to emphasise their deliberative function.

The origin of Parliament may be traced to two ideas and both these ideas are of great antiquity. The one is that the King, though himself the supreme law-giver, always sought the advice and counsel of the wisest and most experienced of his subjects. In Saxon times Kings governed with the advice and counsel of the "Witanagemot", or meeting of wise-men. The other idea is that of representation. The Norman Kings held their courts in different parts of the country, and summoned therein for discussion of national affairs prominent members of the Church, big land-lords, and Knights. They were really not representatives of the people in the sense in which we understand them today. But it does indicate the idea of selecting some prominent individuals, even by the Norman Kings whose power was unlimited, for purposes of consultations. This kind of consultation took a significant shape in 1213 when King John, who was hard pressed for money, ordered the Sheriff of every Shire to send up four 'Knights' from his Shire to discuss the affairs of the realm with the King. Here are the seeds of a modern idea of Parliament; a representative assembly of the people where their affairs are discussed and laws made for them.

Growth of Parliament. We have referred to the growth of Parliament in a previous Chapter.² Its growth was more or less spontaneous,

1. Mackenzie, K.R., The English Parliament, p. 12.

2. See ante Chap. II.

slow, and sometimes haphazard. But its form was very different from what it is today. And so were its powers. It took eight centuries to transform Parliament into a governing body resting on the suffrage of all adult persons in the country and the process has only been completed in our own times. All these eight centuries had been a period of struggle which had been more intense during the reign of evil Kings. It began with King John. All of us know how the barons, in desperation, took the King prisoner and made him sign at Runnymede, on June 15, 1215, Magna Carta or the Great Charter.

This was not a victory of the people over the King, but a victory of the rich and powerful men of Britain over the King. The Magna Carta, all the same, gave them, inter alia, assurances against arbitrary arrest and it provided that the King could not impose taxes on his chiefmen without the common counsel for the realm. For the next eighty years the struggle was between the Kings who were anxious to get money, and the other great men of the land who claimed the right to meet, and consider whether the King's demands were reasonable or not, and get their grievances redressed. Out of this struggle emerged the present political dogma of no taxation without representation, and the conversion of these assemblies into legislative bodies.

The original idea of calling 'Parliament' was, thus, associated with the pressure of the money demands of the Kings. It was called when the King wanted it and its primary business was to hear from the King why money was needed, how it was going to be spent, and to consult those who had been summoned as to the best means of raising it. This is still the most important business of Parliament.

The 'Parliament' summoned by Simon de Montfort, in 1265, is generally described as the first Parliament in anything like the modern meaning of the word. For, he called two knights from each county and also representatives from certain towns, although much of the credit for its being representative is lessened by the fact that he summoned only his own supporters. In 1295, Edward I, who needed money for wars, called together, what has been named, the 'Model Parliament'. To this were summoned archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls and barons; all of whom attended as land-holders on personal writs. General writs were also issued to the Sheriffs for the election of two knights from each county, two citizens from each city, and two burgesses from each borough. Representatives of the lesser clergy were also summoned through the bishops. Thus, a large representative element was added to the feudal council.

Two important things, however, emerged out of this transaction of business. The persons summoned to the King's Parliament only discussed the best way of raising money by taxes. They grumbled, no doubt, but they could hardly afford to come into conflict with the King and question the propriety of his demands. But whenever they came to attend the meetings of Parliament, they brought with them their local grievances and presented petitions to the King detailing the wrongs and injustices done in their part of the country and prayed for their redress. If the King refused to redress the grievances, the apprehension was that the representatives of the tax-payers might create difficulties about meeting the financial needs of the King. Gradually, therefore, was established the principle that the redress of grievances should precede the grant of supply. With the lapse of time another development took place. The grievances were at first personal and particular. But it was soon discovered that many people and many localities had common grievances. They, accordingly, began talking about it in Parliament and if other members supported them in their requests, then, they would send a petition from Parliament to the King. If the King agreed to grant what they asked, he would send back the petition with the words Le roy le veut (the King wills it) written on it. If he did not accept it, he would send the petition back with the words Le roy s'avisera (the King will think about it). Even today public Bills are assented to with the words Le roy le veut. Le roy s'avisera has not now been used to a measure for more than two hundred years, as it amounts to vetoing a Bill.

Even more important was the second development. There began a custom that the King could not tax his people unless Parliament voted him the money and devised ways of raising it. This finally became a mighty law, and the struggle between Cromwell and Charles is the culminating point in this connection. Another important result of this struggle was the decision of the issue: who was to govern in Britain—King or Parliament. The struggle ended in the execution of King Charles by Parliament and subsequently the suppression of Parliament for some years by Cromwell. But the Glorious Revolution of 1688 finally decided the supremacy of Parliament. With the abdication of the last Stuart King, Parliament turned to the Hanoverian dynasty. It had two definite results of constitutional importance. First, Monarchy became the gift of Parliament, and, secondly, any future Monarch of Britain would be a constitutional Monarch acting on the advice of his Ministers responsible to Parliament. This ended four centuries old conflict between the Kings and Parliament, and, then, followed the process of democratization of Parliament.

The Magna Carta had curtailed the King's powers over his barons. The struggle between Cromwell and Charles had represented the claim to a share in power of the new rising class. The Revolution of 1688 had established the sovereignty of Parliament by reducing Monarchy to dependence upon it. But Parliament was still very far from being a democratic Parliament. Before 1832 there were only a few thousands of voters spread all over the country, and parliamentary seats—"pocket boroughs" or "rotten boroughs" as they were called—were in the gift of rich men, and were bought and sold like shares on the Stock Exchange. The First Reform Act of 1832 was a cautious measure which left the working class completely unrepresented. After all it added only 1,00,000 persons to the voters' lists and it represented just the partial acceptance of the claim of the middle class. Parliament was, therefore, still a long way from being a people's Parliament.

At intervals after 1832 extending to 1928 there had been successive electoral reforms. First to the more substantial middle class, then to the lower middle class and the workmen in the towns, then to the mass of householders, then to adult males over twenty-one years of age and most women over thirty and afterwards to almost every person over twenty-one of either sex. The age of voting has now been reduced from January 1, 1970, to 18, thus, adding another two million to the voting population of the country.

Summary of the changes brought about. The essential changes which these eight centuries have brought may, thus, be summarised:—

1. Eight centuries ago Parliament was called when the King wanted it. When it met, it could not make laws. All that it had to do was to grant the King the money he asked for, and to discuss the best way of raising the money by taxes. Today, the King must call a Parliament. It has become now a regular thing and its meetings, except for intervals of recess, go all the year round.

2. From being a selected thing it is now an elected thing. The King does not select whom he will call to a Parliament. Members are elected by the people at regular intervals.

3. The right to take part in the election of members of Parliament, instead of restricted to a small section of the people, is enjoyed by all adults, men or women in the country who had attained the age of eighteen. This right they express through a system of secret ballot.

4. That power has passed from King to Parliament. The King is only a constitutional head of the State who acts on the advice of his Ministers and they in turn are responsible to Parliament.

5. That within Parliament, power has passed from Upper to Lower Chamber—from the Lords to the Commons.

Sovereignty of Parliament. This brief survey of the development of Parliament discloses how Parliament conducted a struggle with the Kings to determine the residence of authority and to vindicate sovereignty for itself. The issue of the struggle was practically determined in the seventeenth century and consolidated in the eighteenth. Three landmarks illustrate the result. It was Parliament, mutilated and under the control of the army but, nevertheless, Parliament, that resolved in December 1648 to bring Charles I to trial³ and to his subsequent execution in 1649.⁴ It was, again, the same Parliament that abolished⁵ Monarchy by an Act and declared Britain to be a Commonwealth.⁶ In 1660, it was, again, Parliament which restored Charles II to the Throne, and on the condition of his co-operation with Parliament.

The second landmark is the Revolution of 1688, when James II, failing to co-operate with Parliament, was made to abdicate, and it was again Parliament which supported the invitation to William of Orange to come over to defend Britain's rights against James II.⁷ Parliament also deter-

3. Act Erecting a High Court of Justice for the Trial of Charles I, Adam and Stephens, Select Documents of English Constitutional History op. cit., p. 389.

4. Sentence of the High Court of Justice upon Charles I, Ibid., pp. 391-393.

5. Act abolishing the office of the King, Ibid., pp. 397-399.

6. Act declaring England to be Commonwealth, Ibid., p. 400.

7. It was called the Convention Parliament. The assembly resembled Parliament in every way, except that it was not convened by the King's writ; (Continued to next page)

mined, by the Bill of Rights of 1689, not only who should reign next, but also on what express conditions he should reign.⁸ In 1701, Parliament made the Act of Settlement, an Act which, inter alia, actually determined the succession to the Throne.⁹

The third landmark is 1783, when, with the accession of Younger Pitt to office, the Cabinet system in all its essentials was finally fixed, and the King ceased to choose and dismiss his Ministers. Henceforth, in reality if not in form, Ministers came to be chosen and dismissed by Parliament.

The power of Parliament, thus, is supreme and unlimited. It embraces a vast field including the making of laws, levying of taxes, the sanction for declaring of war and the making of peace. It controls and supervises all governmental machinery. Moreover, it can dethrone Kings; it can elect Kings; it can abolish Kingship. The power and jurisdiction of Parliament, says Sir Edward Coke, "is so transcendent and absolute, as it cannot be confined either for persons or causes within any bounds. Blackstone held the same view and used language to the same effect. De Lolme said that, "Parliament can do everything but make a woman a man, and a man a woman." But like various other remarks made by De Lolme this statement also involves confusion. If the power of Parliament be envisaged wholly from the legal point of view, the proposition that Parliament cannot make a man a woman is inaccurate. Should Parliament enact a law causing a confusion in the sexes, legally speaking, a man would be a woman and no other body can set the law aside on the grounds that it is unconstitutional or undesirable. Parliament is not legally subject to any physical limitation.

"The Sovereignty of Parliament," says Dicey, "is from a legal point of view the dominant characteristic of our political institutions," and the principle of Parliamentary Sovereignty, he adds, "means neither more nor less than this, namely, that Parliament thus defined has, under the English Constitution, the right to make and unmake any law whatever; and further no person or body is recognised by the law of England as having a right to override and set aside the legislation of Parliament."¹⁰ Dicey, thus, sets the following propositions:—

- (1) That there is no law which Parliament cannot make; and
- (2) That there is no law which Parliament cannot unmake.

From the above two follows the third:

- (3) That there is under the British Constitution no marked or clear distinction between laws which are fundamental or constitutional and laws which are not; and

- (4) That there is no authority recognised by the law of England which can set aside and make void such legislation.

(Continued from previous page)

a state of affairs rendered inevitably by the flight of James II, and by the fact that William had not yet been crowned as King. The proceedings were however validated by the Confirmation Parliament Act passed on February 20, 1689, Ibid., pp. 454-456.

8. Ibid., pp. 462-69.

9. Ibid., pp. 475-79.

10. Dicey, A., Introduction to the Law of the Constitution, pp. 39-40.

Finally, Dicey adds:

(5) That Parliamentary Sovereignty extends to every part of the King's Dominions.

To sum up, Parliament can legislate what it pleases, as it pleases, and that what Parliament enacts is law. What Parliament has enacted, the courts interpret and apply unless Parliament has otherwise provided. Parliament is both a legislative body and a Constituent Assembly. No formal distinction is made in Britain between constitutional and other laws, and the same body, Parliament, can change or abrogate any law whatsoever and by the same procedure. An Act of Parliament cannot be called into question in any court of law. Nor can it be declared invalid, for no law exists in Britain higher than that made by Parliament. Although Equity and Common Law are the oldest and most fundamental to the British Constitution, yet neither Equity nor Common Law can overrule the laws enacted by Parliament. If two Acts of Parliament are in conflict with each other, a more recent Act of Parliament takes precedence over a less recent and supersedes any earlier statutory provisions inconsistent with it.

The principle of the legal supremacy of Parliament also helps to explain the status of certain "fundamental and historical documents," like Magna Carta, the Petition of Rights, the Bill of Rights, the Habeas Corpus Act, the several Acts dealing with suffrage, etc., which are accepted as a distinct element or source of the British Constitution. In reality such "documents" possess the general character of statutes, and as they are connected with the structure or functions of government, they, undoubtedly carry with them greater sanctity than an average statute. But any recent statute, though it is unlikely to be in conflict with the provisions of these legal landmarks, would nonetheless in law take precedence over them.

Finally, the right to this legislative supremacy resides in Parliament and in Parliament alone. Executive in Britain has not the power of issuing decrees which have the force of law save in so far as that power is conferred on it by Parliament itself and so can be taken away by Parliament.¹¹ Neither through the Royal Prerogative nor by any other means can any legal limitation be placed on Parliament. As a corollary, the right to impose taxes resides with Parliament alone. Again, Parliament alone has the right to legalise the past illegalities. Legally, therefore, Parliament can make or unmake any law, destroy by statute the most firmly established convention or turn a convention into a binding law, and legalise past illegalities reversing thereby the decisions of courts. It even has power to prolong its own life by legislative means beyond the normal period of five years as determined by the Parliament Act, 1911.

Sovereignty of Parliament examined. Sovereignty of Parliament, however, is really nothing but a legal fiction and a legal fiction may assume anything. Dicey, and many others like him, dealt with only legal aspects of sovereignty divorcing it from the realities of actual life. And the reality of actual political life in Britain is that a legal truth very often turns out to be a political untruth. Parliament cannot do any and everything, and make or unmake any kind of law. There are many moral and political checks which limit its powers, and Parliament would find many other things as difficult to accomplish as to make a man a woman. Blackstone has correctly said that, "It (Parliament) can, in short, do everything that is not naturally impossible." All proposals for law are considered on the touchstone of practical utility and moral considerations. In a law-abiding community, such as the British community, the very fact that Parliament has enacted a law is strong presumption that it will be obeyed. The ordinary citizen does not readily set up his own private judgment against that of Parliament. But there are limits to obedience too. "If a legislature decided," as a writer suggests, "that all blue-eyed babies should be murdered, the preservation of blue-eyed babies would be illegal; but legislature must go mad before they could pass such a law and subjects be idiotic before they could submit to it." In fact, no legislature can even think of such a legislation, particularly in a country like Britain where public opinion is strong and has the ready means of expression. Democracy is a government by consent and laws in a democratic government must necessarily be the manifestation of the will of the people. If they are not, the political sovereign takes his revenge. The supreme legislature, therefore, always takes care to keep itself within the practical restraints, though legally there may be none.

11. The famous exception, the Statute of Proclamations which only remained in force for a few years, is in one sense an illustration itself of this principle, since it was considered necessary to confer the decree-power on Henry VIII by an Act of Parliament.

It is true, as Dicey says, that law is a law whether it is moral or not and legislation passed by Parliament may not have any reference to the moral aspect. But Parliament cannot pass a law which is against the facts of nature or is against the established codes of public or private morality. Similarly, it dare not pass legislation against the established customs of the country unless the people want it. Even the supremacy of Parliament is itself nowhere laid down as a fundamental and unalterable law. It is the expression of custom, the result of a long and ultimately successful struggle against the ordinance-power of the King. The will of the people triumphed in making Parliament supreme and sovereign and in this way sovereignty of Parliament became an organic principle of the British Constitution. And so are the Conventions which carry with them the acquiescence of the people, the supreme and sovereign will. The Conventions of the Constitution are, thus, an organic principle of the British Constitution as the Sovereignty of Parliament itself is and, accordingly, are beyond the practical possibility of the competence of Parliament. This is a significant restraint against the Sovereignty of Parliament.

Another important feature of the British Constitution is the Rule of Law. The conception of the Rule of Law was given classical exposition by Dicey as he had given to the Sovereignty of Parliament. The Rule of Law means that the ordinary law of the land is of universal application, that there is no exercise of arbitrary authority, and that there is no division into separate systems of law, one for officials and another for the ordinary citizens. It also carries with it the rule that the remedies of the ordinary law will be sufficient for the protection of the rights and liberties of the citizens, and, there is nothing in Britain as the Fundamental Rights. The Rule of Law is closely inter-woven with the supremacy of Parliament. To put it in another way, Parliamentary supremacy is, in part, only tolerable, because the Rule of Law is recognised. If Parliament passes a legislation which is contrary to the principles of the Rule of Law, it imperils its own supremacy. Sovereignty of Parliament and the Rule of Law, remarks Barker, "are not only parallel: they are also inter-connected, and mutually interdependent. On the one hand the judges uphold and sustain the sovereignty of Parliament, which is the only maker of law that they recognise (except in so far law is made, in the form of 'case law', by their own decisions); on the other hand Parliament upholds and sustains the rule of law and the authority of the judges, who are the only interpreters of the law made by Parliament and of the rest of the law of the land."¹² Rule of Law is, therefore, an effective limitation on the legal Sovereignty of Parliament.

The most decisive proof of the legislative sovereignty of Parliament, it is maintained, are those Acts which fix the limits of its own duration. The Triennial Act provided that no Parliament should last longer than three years, and the Septennial Act of 1716 enacted that it should last for seven years unless previously dissolved by the King. The Parliament Act of 1911 reduced its life to five years, and the same Parliament that introduced the change extended its own life by successive statutes until it had sat for almost eight years. All these extensions were made in times of war with the express approval of all the political parties and the tacit consent of the nation. What is more important to note is that in 1945, after the precedent of the First World War had been followed for almost five years, it was universally recognised that the Conservative majority in Parliament must not get another extension without the consent of the Labour minority. Accordingly, when Churchill asked his Labour colleagues to remain in the National Government without a general election until the end of the Japanese War, he coupled his request with a suggestion that the electorate should be asked to signify its approval of the postponement of General Elections by a referendum. The Labour Party did not agree and though Britain was still in the midst of hostilities, General Elections were held and the electorate returned the Labour in majority to form the Government. No Parliament, therefore, dare extend its duration, permanent or temporary, until it has with it the tacit consent of the nation. While discussing the question of Sovereignty of Parliament, Herman Finer says, "All is true except that, in fact, there are limitations in practice to the authority of Parliament, limitations that are embodied in the authority of the electorate, mediated or not through the political parties. The sovereignty of Parliament is limited by the power of the people—but by no other instrument."¹³

Yet, what is Parliament? Jennings says, indeed, we talk in "fictions on concepts even when we mention 'Parliament'. Parliament is not an institution."¹⁴ Parliament consists of the King, the House of Lords, and the House of Commons. All the three functionaries join together to complete the actions of Parliament. We need say nothing about the 12. Barker, Ernest, Britain and the British People, pp. 24-25. It should, however, be noted that the Executive has now acquired a power of administrative jurisdiction.

13. Finer, H., Governments of Greater European Powers (1956), p. 47.

14. Jennings, W.I., Parliament, p. 2.

King, for his part in legislation has become little more than formal. The House of Lords and the House of Commons are two different institutions having different characteristics and different functions. The authority of the House of Lords with the passage of the Act of 1911, as amended in 1949, has become rigorously limited and if today the House of Commons were to pass a law abolishing the House of Lords, it can do and the Queen must give her assent thereto. There is nothing to obstruct it. The conception of the Sovereign Parliament, therefore, now stands fundamentally changed. Under the present circumstances Parliament really is the House of Commons, and in the broader sense it means the majority party in the House which in its turn is the Cabinet. Parliament endorses what Cabinet proposes. And yet it is normally the joint action of the Queen, the Lords, and the Commons which law requires to make legislation possible. This is evident from the words with which an Act of Parliament opens: "Be it enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same...."

Though, Parliament may legally legislate for the Dominions, yet its powers are rigidly limited by constitutional limitations. As a result of these constitutional limitations it is in accord with the constitutional position of all the Dominions, "in relation to one another that any alteration in the law touching the succession to the Throne, on the Royal Style and Titles shall hereafter require the assent as well of the Parliaments of all the Dominions as of Parliament of the United Kingdom." Moreover, no Act of British Parliament passed after 1931, is to extend to a Dominion unless the Act expressly affirms that the Dominion concerned has requested and assented to it. Legally, North America Act of 1867 can be amended by the British Parliament, but the convention which governs the constitutional amendment is that it proceeds from the Canadian Parliament and the British Parliament quietly and quickly passes the required amendment. The British Parliament is simply an agent in the realisation of the wishes of the Dominion Parliament. Dicey's assertion that the right or power of Parliament "extends to every part of the King's dominions" is fundamentally unrealistic.

But the great inroad made on the Sovereignty of Parliament is by the delegated legislation. Dicey, perhaps, did not visualise this modern development when he maintained that legislative supremacy lies in Parliament and in Parliament alone. Parliament cannot find time for all the work it has to do, and so lightens its task by permitting other bodies to take share in law-making. In some cases the Crown, acting on its prerogative powers, is left to issue orders, usually Orders-in-Council, and in other and numerous cases an Act of Parliament gives some Minister, Department, or other authority, the power to make Orders and Regulations. It is true that it is the Act of Parliament which authorises the issuing of Rules and Regulations, but a great mass of these Rules and Regulations practically remain unknown except to those who administer them. Cecil Carr divides the 'Statutory Instruments', as these Rules and Regulations are now called under the Statutory Instruments Act of 1946, into separate classes, 'general and local' and estimates that their average exceeds 1,200 a year.¹⁵ In 1946, the total just topped 2,287. Their number has since then still more increased. Parliament does not and cannot keep a check on this tremendous increase in the delegated legislation and they have the force of law and the courts can intervene only when the rules and regulations so made are against the delegation of power or when proper procedures have not been used.

Finally, the jurisdiction of Parliament is also limited by the practices of International Law. It is now a recognised principle of the British Constitution that International Law is a part of the Municipal Law of the land. It was decided in West Rand Gold Mining Co. vs. The King "that whatever has received the common consent of civilised nations must have received the assent of our country." Any legislation, therefore, which is repugnant to the principles of International Law Parliament cannot enact.

Dicey himself recognised the formal and purely legal aspect of the doctrine of the Sovereignty of Parliament and proceeded to point out that this formal concept operated within two limits, external and internal. Ultimately, the legal sovereign derives its authority from the political sovereign. Political sovereignty is tersely but fully stated in a Labour Party pamphlet circulated in the election of 1945.

"It really does rest with you. You may complain about statesmen and politicians. You may criticise Parliament. But you give statesmen power. You elect politicians to Parliament. You determine the membership and thereby the policy of the House of Commons."¹⁶

You meant the voters, and the House of Commons is really Parliament; it is the principal pillar on which national democratic government rests. Legally, Parliament can make and unmake any kind of law, but in actual practice it must bow to the will of those who determine the membership and policy of the House of Commons. It cannot ignore the wishes and interests of those who are likely to be affected by its legislation. The Sovereignty of Parliament, therefore, operates within the limits imposed by conventions, public opinion, morals of the community, expediency, International Law, and International Agreements.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS

Origin and Growth. Parliament now consists, apart from the King, himself, of two Houses—the House of Lords or the Upper Chamber, and the House of Commons or the Lower Chamber. It was not always so, and on the most formal occasions it is not so even today. When the King opens Parliament, or prorogues it, or when his assent to the Bills is announced, all members of Parliament—Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons—assemble in one Chamber, and there listen to the King in his person or his message. Ordinarily, however, the Peers do their business in one Chamber and the Commons in another.

In Britain nothing is arranged. It just grows and the House of Lords is the child of this growth. When Edward I called his Model

15. Campion and Others, Parliament: A Survey, p. 241.

16. Finer, H., Government of Greater European Powers, p. 59.

Parliament in 1295, all the different classes of people summoned to attend met in one single assembly. But afterwards they broke into three groups or "estates"—Nobles, Clergy and Commons—to hear separately the King's plea for money and "to make such response as they individually chose". Gradually, however, practical interests led to a different arrangement. The greater barons and the greater clergy¹⁷ had many interests in common and they, accordingly, associated together in one body. The lesser clergy found attendance at Parliament very irksome. Moreover, they were jealous of their clerical privileges and preferred to make their money grants to the King in their "Convocations." They soon ceased, therefore, to attend Parliament altogether. Similarly, the Knights, after a good deal of wavering, found their interests identical with the burgesses and finally united with them for all purposes. The result was the division of Parliament into two Houses. In one House sat the Peers—Temporal and Spiritual—in the other the representative Knights of the Shires and the representative Townsmen. The first, which became the House of Lords, was a non-representative House, as it was composed of men who attended in response to personal summons. The second was a completely representative House, called the House of Commons, as it consisted of the representatives of the Shires and the Boroughs.

How and when exactly this arrangement came about, nobody knows. It was accidental and the result of social and economic circumstances. By the close of the reign of Edward III, this bicameral organisation seems to have been fully established.¹⁸ Thenceforward the distinction between the two Houses became political.

The hereditary principle came into being similarly. The term "peer" means equal and originally it referred to the feudal tenants-in-chief of the King all of whom were legally peers of one another. After the division of Parliament into two Houses in the fourteenth century, it was being used for those members of the baronage who were "accustomed" to receive a personal writ of summons when a Parliament was to be held. There is no evidence to show that the Kings had ever a mind to create a peerage of a hereditary character. It was, however, a custom that a King, whenever he summoned a Parliament, would send for the same peers who had sat in an earlier one, or if in the meantime they had died, for their eldest sons. In course of time custom became a right and a seat in the House of Lords descended from father to eldest son, just as did the family estate under the rule of primogeniture.

Composition of the House of Lords. Potential membership of the House of Lords is over 1,000, but this number is reduced to about 760 by a scheme which allows peers who do not wish to attend to apply for leave of absence, either for the duration of a particular Parliament or for a single session.¹⁹ Average daily attendance is upwards of 200, but many more may attend when some matter in which they have a special interest is under discussion. Its composition may be divided into the following

17. The greater clergy were not simply clergies, but they were feudal and landholders too.

18. Adams, G.H., Constitutional History of England (1951), pp. 194-95.

19. Provision is made for a Peer to terminate his leave of absence on giving a month's notice.

seven categories:

1. The Princes of the royal blood, who nowadays take no part in the proceedings of the House.²⁰

2. The Lords Spiritual. 26 in number and include the two Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Bishops of London, Durban and Winchester, and 21 most senior Bishops of the Church of England. When a sitting Bishop dies or resigns, the next senior on the list becomes entitled to a writ.

3. The Lords Temporal subdivided into:

(i) all hereditary Peers and Peeresses, now 700 in number who have not disclaimed their Peerage under the Peerage Act, 1963. Hereditary Peers carry with them a right to a seat in the House of Lords, provided the holder is 21 years of age or over. Under the Peerage Act, 1963, however, anyone succeeding to Peerage may, within twelve months of succession, disclaim Peerage for his or her life time. Those who disclaim their Peerage lose their right to sit in the House of Lords, but are eligible for election to the House of Commons;

(ii) until 1963 the Scottish Peers elected for each Parliament sixteen representative Peers to sit in the Lords. The Peerage Act, 1963 now opens membership of the Lords to all Scottish Peers;²¹

(iii) nine Lords of Appeal in Ordinary (commonly called the Law Lords), appointed under the provisions of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876 to assist the House of Lords in the performance of its judicial functions. They hold their seats for life; and

(iv) life Peers and Peeresses created under the provisions of the Life Peerage Act, 1958.²²

By far the most important and the most numerous are the hereditary Peers and they account for more than seventy per cent of the total membership of the House. A great bulk of them hold their seats simply as a result of chance as they happen to be the eldest son of an eldest son back to an ancestor who was first created a peer. They are the "accidents of an accident", as Bagehot has called them. Nearly one-half of the total of the hereditary Peers are the creation of the twentieth century. Another 300 go to the nineteenth century and the rest go up to the thirteenth century. The bulk of the Peerage is, therefore, of recent origin.

The power of the Crown to create hereditary Peers is unlimited and

20. There are now four peers of royal blood; Prince Charles, the Prince of Wales, Dukes of Windsor, Gloucester and Kent.

21. By the Act for the Union of Great Britain and Ireland, the Irish Peers were entitled to elect 28 representatives, but no elections have been held since the creation of the Irish Free State (now the Irish Republic) in 1922, and no Irish Peers now remain.

22. Some of the appointments under the 1958 Act are recommended by the Prime Minister after consultation with the Leader of the Opposition or with the Leader of the Liberal Party. There are at present some 150 Life Peers.

in modern times has been used with great freedom. Normally, it is usual to create anything from two to half a dozen new peers a year and the object is to honour men of distinction in law, letters, science, politics, diplomacy, war, or for any other meritorious services. But it had also been an important constitutional weapon in the hands of the Crown to change the complexion of the House of Lords in order to overcome its resistance to the avowed policy of the party in power. It was actually used by the creation of twelve Tory Peers in 1711 in order to secure approval of the Treaty of Utrecht. In 1832, the continued resistance of the House of Lords to the Reform Bill incurred the threat to create as many new Peers as Earl Grey's Ministry deemed necessary to get the measure passed. A similar situation arose over the Parliament Bill of 1909. Once again, the reluctant House of Lords succumbed to the threat. In view of the provisions of the Parliament Act of 1911 and scrupulous adherence to the "mandate convention" there had been no more occasion to resort to this method of securing the assent of the House of Lords over an issue on which electorate had given its verdict.

Sometimes the Government of the day needs spokesmen in the Lords or must fill Royal Household appointments. Peerage is, accordingly, conferred on men of talent and loyalty. Lord Passifield, formerly Sidney Webb, was raised to peerage in the first Labour Government and a score of others have been elevated since 1945-46.

Privileges and disabilities. Members of the House of Lords have certain privileges and are under certain disabilities. They enjoy freedom of speech and are exempt from arrest while the House is in session. The Lords can individually approach the King to discuss public affairs. They have also the right of recording a protest against any decisions of the majority in the House in its Journals. They have the right to commit for contempt of their privileges and that right extends beyond a session. A peer when charged with treason or felony had the right to demand trial by his fellow peers, but the privilege with regard to felony was withdrawn in 1936. The peers have, also, the right to act as a court of final appeal for the realm, but this right is now exercised by the Law Lords only.

The members of the House of Lords had no right to vote at Parliamentary elections, and they were disqualified for election to the House of Commons. They could not divest themselves of their titles or refuse to inherit them when their elders died. Consequently, it was a matter of much tribulation, "when their heir who has made a career for himself in the Commons and Ministry must leave the excitement of these centres of government with the prospects of high office, even the Prime Ministership, to go to the House of Lords". Three recent examples are good to illustrate the point. One is Quintin Hogg, son of Lord Hailsham, an eminent lawyer and once a commoner who bitterly suffered his "promotion". The other is now the Marquess of Salisbury. Lord Stansgate's son and heir, Anthony Wedgwood Benn, in vain fought hard to avoid eventually inheriting his father's title. Winston Churchill was willing to be knighted, but he firmly refused the peerage, for he rejoiced in remaining a "House of Commons man".

With the passage of the Peerages Act, 1963, the old position is changed. It now enables any hereditary peer with political ambitions to disclaim peerage, and seek election to the House of Commons. Wedgwood Benn, Viscount Stansgate, was the first to renounce his title and won back his seat as Labour M.P. The enactment of Peerages Act was the result of nearly ten years' struggle of this "reluctant peer." Persons who disclaim their peerages lose their right to sit in the House of Lords, but they are able to vote at parliamentary elections and are eligible for election to the House of Commons. Lord Home disclaimed his peerage and became Sir Alec Douglas-Home. He became Prime Minister after the resignation of Harold Macmillan.

The membership of the House of Lords was hitherto entirely male. Although there were some twenty-six Peeresses in their own right, holding titles by virtue of descent from male ancestors, but they were not admitted. Even now those who are allowed to sit and vote in the House of Lords are the life Peeresses. The male Peers, who have not renounced their titles, cannot seek elections to the House of Commons, but the wives of Peers may sit, as did Lady Astor for many years. Similarly, the husbands of new life Peeresses will retain their right to seek election to the House of Commons, as they will get no title.

The Peers receive no salary for their parliamentary work, but they are entitled to travelling expenses from their homes to the Palace of Westminster, provided they attend at least one-third of the number of sittings. They may also claim, with the exception of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chairman of Committees, the Law Lords and any member in receipt of a salary as the holder of a ministerial office, payment for expenses incurred for the purpose of attendance at the House (except for judicial sittings) within a maximum of four and a half guineas (£4 14s. 6d.) a day.

Procedure and organisation. The two Houses of Parliament must invariably be summoned simultaneously and both are prorogued²³ together, but adjourned²⁴ separately. The House of Lords meets only for four days in a week—Monday to Thursday—and normally for two hours or thereabout. The precedent is that, except under direct pressure, discussion must be concluded in time to enable the noble Lords to dress for eight o'clock dinner. The House is sparsely attended. The usual attendance was from 70 to 80 members and that, too, on occasions when a matter of first rate importance was being discussed. Now the average daily attendance at a sitting is over 200. It is one of the results of the Reforms Act of 1957. Three members constitute a quorum, but at least thirty must be present in order to pass any Bill. According to Standing Orders promulgated by the House in 1958, holders of peerage are asked, at the beginning of each Parliament, whether they will attend the sittings of the House as reasonably as they can or whether they desire to be relieved of the obligation to attend. If they so desire, they are requested to apply for leave of absence, either for the duration of Parliament or for a shorter period, during which they are on their honour not to attend, and not to vote without notice. Failure to send a reply to the Lord Chancellor is tantamount to the wish not to attend. This is a useful step towards rationalising the composition of the House of Lords.

23. At the end of a session of Parliament, the King dismisses it and tells to reassemble on a certain date to begin a new session's work. This dismissal is called proroguing. Parliament prorogation both ends a session and terminates all pending business.

24. To adjourn means merely to interrupt the course of business temporarily. At the end of each day's work, and whenever it takes a holiday Parliament adjourns.

The debate is more leisurely than in the House of Commons. Freedom of speech is virtually unrestricted and the presiding officer, the Lord Chancellor, has far more limited power over debate than enjoyed by the Speaker in the House of Commons. The Lord Chancellor is a Chairman, not a Speaker as in the Commons. The level of debate is high and on certain occasions higher than the House of Commons.

The organisation of the House of Lords closely parallels that of the House of Commons. The Lord Chancellor is the presiding officer. The Crown, by commission under the Great Seal, appoints several Peers to take their place on the "Woolsack" in order of precedence in the absence of the Lord Chancellor. The first to act for him is the Lord Chairman of Committees, who is appointed each session and takes the chair in all Committees, unless the House otherwise directs. He also has important duties in connection with Private Bill Legislation in which he is assisted by his Counsel, who is a permanent salaried officer of the House. The House also appoints a number of Deputy Chairmen of Committees. The permanent officers of the House include the Clerk of Parliament, who is charged with keeping the records of proceedings and judgments and who pronounces the words of assent to Bills; the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, who enforces the order of the House, and the Sergeant-at-Arms, who attends the Lord Chancellor.

The Committee system of the House of Lords is more simple than that of the House of Commons. The Lords conduct some of their business in the Committee of the Whole House and it consists of the members present. It is presided over by the Lord Chairman of Committees and it operates under less formal Rules of Procedure than when the House is in regular session. The House has no Standing Committees except one for textual revision to which Bills are referred after passing the Committee of the Whole House. Sessional and Select Committees are utilised for the consideration of special kinds of legislation or for gathering of additional information on pending Bills. Sessional Committees may consist of all members present during the session or of small number as determined by the House. There are a number of Select Committees on Private Bills, consisting of five Peers, appointed in each session.

The Lord Chancellor. The presiding officer of the House of Lords is the Lord Chancellor, a member of the Cabinet. He presides while sitting on the traditional "Woolsack", a large and rather shapeless divan. The Lord Chancellor is usually a Peer and if he is not, he is created one immediately after his appointment. It does not, however, mean that a Commoner cannot be chosen to that office. The "Woolsack" is technically placed outside the precincts of the House of Lords to enable those who are Commoners to perform their official duties as presiding officers of the House.

The powers and functions of the Lord Chancellor are many and varied. Here we are only concerned with those connected with the occupant of the Woolsack.²⁵ His powers as presiding officer are absolutely insignificant as compared with the Speaker of the House of Commons. They even fall far short of those commonly assigned to a moderator. The questions regarding procedure are decided by votes of the House. For example, if two or more members simultaneously attempt to address the House, the House itself, and not the Chair, decides who shall have the floor. The proceedings of the House of Lords are extremely orderly, but if order in debate is to be enforced, it is done by the House and not by the presiding officer. When the members speak, they do not address the Chair, but the House and begin with "My Lords". If the Lord Chancellor is a peer, he may join in the debates of the House. When he does so, he steps away from the Woolsack. He may even vote, on party lines, like any other member, but in no case does he have a casting vote.

POWERS AND FUNCTIONS OF THE LORDS

Powers before 1911: Financial. We have seen earlier that Parliament began its career as an advisory body without legislative powers. We have also seen how Parliament gradually established the principle that the King should not levy taxes without the consent of Parliament, and how Parliament granted supplies to the King on the redress of grievances. But while this struggle between the King and Parliament was continuing, there developed a struggle within Parliament as to which House should speak for Parliament on financial matters. The Commons, in the reign of Richard II, demanded the right to be consulted on money matters, and in the reign of Charles I they claimed that the grants of money given to the King were exclusively their right. Later in 1671, they maintained that though grants of money required the consent of the House of Lords, but it was not within the power of that House to offer amendments to any financial proposals from the Commons.

In 1678, the Commons passed another resolution of a still more comprehensive character. It asserted "that all aids and supplies, and aids to His Majesty in Parliament, are the sole gift of the Commons, and all Bills for the granting of such aids and supplies ought to begin with the Commons; and that it is the undoubted and the sole right of the Commons to direct, limit and appoint in such Bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations, and qualifications of such grants, which ought not to be changed or altered by the House of Lords." The House of Lords never admitted this claim to sovereignty by Commons on financial matters, although by usage gradually the Lords acquiesced to the claims of the representatives of the people. In 1860, however, the House of Lords made a bold attempt to reject a Bill for the repeal of duties on paper. But the Commons made a defence and got it through. Control over financial matters, they reiterated, was the exclusive business of the House of Commons and any attempt on the part of the Lords to tamper with or in any way modify the financial powers of the Commons would be regarded by them as an infringement of their privileges.

The beginning of the present century witnessed another bid on the part of the House of Lords to revive its powers. Having become bold by rejecting some legislative measures in 1832, 1889, and 1893, they rejected the proposals of Lloyd George which aimed to levy certain new taxes on landed property and claimed it to be their political right to do so. This became a regular issue of first rate constitutional importance with the Liberal Government which was placed in power early in 1906, by the most sweeping electoral victory. The outcome of this struggle was the passage of the Parliament Act of 1911. This Act not only confirmed the Sovereignty of the House of Commons in money matters, but made it "omnipotent in matters of ordinary legislation too." The Act virtually abolished the power of the Lords either to amend or reject a Money Bill.

25. For other functions of the Lord Chancellor see Chap. IX

Powers before 1911: Legislative. With regard to ordinary legislation the House of Lords possessed co-equal powers with the House of Commons. All Bills, except Money Bills, could, and still may, originate with the Lords, although by usage nine-tenths of them start their career in the Commons.²⁶ The House of Lords could, and it did amend or reject a Bill passed by the House of Commons. It might continue to reject a Bill passed continually by the House of Commons and it did this on various occasions. When after a bitter struggle, Gladstone could see his second Home Rule Bill through the Commons only to have it rejected in the Lords he felt that "the cup of grievances was full." In his last speech in Parliament the retiring Prime Minister referred to the struggle that had begun between the two Houses and predicted that it would have to go forward to an issue. The prediction came out to be true and the issue was brought to a head in 1909 which ultimately ended into the Act of 1911 thereby curtailing its powers over ordinary legislation too.

Before the Parliament Act, 1911, the House of Commons had no means to assert its will. The only alternative with the Prime Minister was to ask the King to create enough peers to swamp the House of Lords. But it was a drastic measure and no Prime Minister would ask for it without being sure that he had the support of the electorate. The only recourse for him, under the circumstances, was to ask for dissolution and put the issue before the public at a general election. If it was ratified by the electorate, the Lords were expected to give way and this they usually did. But when the verdict of the people was sought in 1910, they did not care for the precedent. On November 16, the King agreed that if the Liberals were returned after a second general election and the House of Lords rejected the Government's Bill, to limit the power of the House of Lords to reject Bills, he would create sufficient new peers sympathetic to the Government to ensure the Bill's passage.²⁷ The general elections held later in the year showed little change, and the Parliament Bill, was accordingly, introduced again. Eventually the news of the King's pledge to create sufficient new peers was made public; and when it came to a vote on the Bill in the House of Lords, a number of opponents of the measure abstained, and it became a law of Parliament.

26. Most of the Bills which originate in the House of Lords are Private Bills and other non-controversial Bill like the Judicial Bills.

27. "After a long talk (with Asquith)", wrote the King in his diary "I agreed most reluctantly to give the Cabinet a secret understanding that in the event of the Government being returned with a majority at the General Election, I should use my prerogative to make the Peers if asked for. I disliked having to do this very much, but agreed that this was the only alternative to the Cabinet resigning, which at this moment would be disastrous." Nicolson, Sir Harold, King George the Fifth, p. 138.

The Parliament Act of 1911. The Parliament Act of 1911, is of fundamental constitutional importance. It sealed the victory of the House of Commons statutorily. Under this Act the House of Commons attained a recognition of three principles, and thereby of its own final and conclusive sovereignty. The first principle is that the Commons alone had control of all Money Bills. The House of Lords could only delay and its delaying power was limited to one month only. Out of this emerges the second that the House of Commons alone had control over the Cabinet, and finally, it could pass by itself alone and without the concurrence of the Lords, any legislative measure which is affirmed by its vote in three successive sessions; the Lords exercised only a delaying power for two years. The Act also declared that a Second Chamber constituted on a popular rather than a hereditary basis would be set up. The relevant clauses specified:—

1. "If a Money Bill, having been passed by the House of Commons, and sent up to the House of Lords at least one month before the end of the session, is not passed by the House of Lords without amendment within one month after it is sent up to that House, the Bill shall, unless the House of Commons directs to the contrary, be presented to His Majesty and become an Act of Parliament on the Royal assent being signified, notwithstanding that the House of Lords have not assented to the Bill."

It means, briefly, that should the House of Lords withhold its assent to a Money Bill for more than one month the Bill would be presented to the King and would become law on receiving the Royal assent, notwithstanding that the House of Lords have not assented to the Bill.

2. The term Money Bill was so defined as to include measures relating not only to taxation, but also to appropriations and audits. The Speaker was empowered to certify whether a given measure was or was not a Money Bill.

3. "If any Public Bill (other than a Money Bill or a Bill to extend the maximum duration of Parliament) is passed by the House of Commons in three successive sessions (whether of the same Parliament or not), and having been sent up to the House of Lords at least one month before the end of the session, is rejected by the House of Lords in each of those sessions, the Bill shall on its rejection for the third time by the House of Lords, unless the House of Commons direct to the contrary, be presented to His Majesty and become an Act of Parliament on the Royal assent being signified thereto, notwithstanding that the House of Lords have not consented to the Bill: Provided that this provision shall not take effect unless two years have elapsed between the date of the second reading in the first of those sessions of the Bill in the House of Commons and the date on which it passes in the House of Commons in the third of those sessions."

This clause provided that a Bill passed three times by the Commons in successive sessions, and each time rejected by the Lords might be presented to the King for his assent provided two years had elapsed between the initial proceedings of the Bill in the House of Commons and its final passing in that House in the third session.

The Amending Act, 1949. In addition to the specific provisions of the Parliament Act, 1911, there was an understanding that the House of Lords would not reject a measure for which there was a mandate from the electorate at the preceding General Elections. But the Labour Party was not satisfied with the statutory limitations which the Act of 1911 imposed, particularly relating to ordinary legislation in forcing a delay of two years before a Bill could be finally enacted. The 1945 manifesto of the Labour Party affirmed: "...We give clear notice that we will not tolerate obstruction of the people's will by the House of Lords." When the Labour Party came into power something dramatic was expected. But nothing actually happened till October 1947, when the Speech from the Throne disclosed the Government's intention to introduce immediately a Bill to amend the Parliament Act by reducing from three sessions to two and from two years to one the maximum period during which measures passed by the House of Commons could be held up. This sudden announcement was necessitated by the Government's determination to nationalise the iron and steel industry. The Government could rightly anticipate the opposition of the House of Lords and it was, accordingly, thought necessary to clear the way for the passage of the measure in the fourth year of its term of office. The Amending Bill was introduced in November 1947, and at all stages it met a stout opposition from the Lords.²⁸ It, however, passed over the Lords' veto two years later modifying thereby the procedure of the Parliament Act, 1911 relating to ordinary legislation.

According to the Amending Act of 1949, a Bill may now become law despite its having been rejected by the House of Lords if it has been passed by the House of Commons in two successive sessions (instead of three as provided for in the Act of 1911), and, if one year (instead of two) has elapsed between the date of the second reading in the first session in the House of Commons and the final date on which the Bill is passed by the House of Commons for the second time. The 1949 Act, thus, reduced from two years to one the period during which the Lords may delay Bills which had passed the Commons.

Present Powers and Functions of the House of Lords. The powers and functions of the House of Lords are, thus, fixed by the Parliament Act, 1911, as amended in 1949. They may be reduced into four main groups:—

- (1) The power of amending or delaying legislation other than financial legislation;
- (2) The power of influencing Government and people by debate;
- (3) Executive powers; and
- (4) Certain judicial powers.

1. On Money Bills the power of the House of Commons is absolute.

28. In the House of Commons the vote on third reading was 323 to 195, with Liberals supporting the Government whereas in the Lords it was 204 to 34 for rejection with the Liberals opposing the Government. It was a vote of very unusual size for the House of Lords.

If the House of Lords withhold their assent to a Money Bill and what is a Money Bill is determined by the certification of the Speaker, for more than a month, the Bill would be presented to the King and become a law on receiving the Royal assent. What is meant by a Money Bill was defined in the Act, but each such Bill has to bear a certificate by the Speaker that the Bill is a Money Bill within the meaning of the Act.

Enough has been said about a Bill other than a Money Bill. A Bill passed by the House of Commons in two successive sessions with an interval of at least one year between its first and second readings and final passage in the House of Commons will become a law after having received the Royal assent irrespective of its having been rejected by the House of Lords.

2. The second function of the House of Lords is the influencing of Government and the people by its debates. Among the Peers, who make a habit of participating in the debates and votes, are generally elder statesmen and others who have spent their lives in public service and whose talents place them high in the world's esteem. No Government which is obliged to submit to criticism and to the need for explaining its actions and views can ignore the opinion expressed by such elder, seasoned and veteran statesmen and politicians. The debates are free, outspoken and sometimes reach a much higher dialectical level than in the House of Commons. This is obviously due to many reasons. The Lords are not subject to so many restrictions on debates as the Commoners are. Their discussion is all the more free because of the impossibility of overthrowing a Government by an adverse vote in the House of Lords. The furthest that the Lords can do is to delay the passage of legislation for one year. Secondly, their positions are secure. Not being subject to dissolution, and not being liable to seek re-election every five years, the Lords do not have to speak with one eye on the reactions of their voters to their speeches. They are responsible to no one but then no one is responsible to them. They need not follow the Party Whip and are free from that form of parliamentary pressure known as "lobbying." Moreover, the House of Lords is an august Chamber, a reservoir of expertise knowledge. It contains amongst the galaxy of its members past Prime Ministers, may be three or four at a time,²⁹ and Ministers, who had made their mark on the political life of the nation.

As it is, the result is that debates in the House of Lords, which are based upon experience and ability, set a very high standard of discussion and a thorough thrashing of the issues. Lords' debates can and do exercise a very definite influence on Government, and through the press, on the public opinion generally. "It is sometimes a truer sounding board than the House of Commons itself."³⁰ Herman Finer gives a beautiful summing up of the influence which Lords exercise. He says, "The House of Lords still has important legislative authority, but this is distinctly inferior to that of the Commons. Yet still retains some, far from negligible. Beyond this, it remains one of the most distinguished forums of public debate in the world, for it has the right to discuss any phase of legislation, policy, and administration,...a substantial part of its membership is of exceptional distinction in intellect and political, social, and business experience. These constitute a body of public-spirited experts, able to talk with great intelligence and knowledge, and really to do so with an aloofness from immediate partisan politics because they are not dependent for their status on appeals for popular election, and with abundant time to deliberate, as the Lords are far less pressed with decisive business than the Commons. This candid expertise has influence with the public, the government, and the civil service."

29. There are two now, Anthony Eden and Harold Macmillan.

30. Brown, W.J., Everybody's Guide to Parliament (1952), p. 52.

Executive Power. The Lords had and still have the power to ask questions, to elicit information from the Government on any aspect of administration and a full right to debate its policies. They exercised and still exercise equal power with the Commons to approve or disapprove the Statutory Instruments and jointly participate with the Commons on the removal of the Judges. In the course of the sixteenth century the Lords lost actual power to control the Executive. But they still enjoy a share in the Cabinet membership, partly because the House of Commons Disqualification Act, 1957, as amended by the Ministers of the Crown Act, 1964, limits the number of Ministers who may sit in the House of Commons, and partly because every Government must be assured of spokesmen of standing to expound its intentions and actions to the House of Lords. In recent years, it has been usual for the House of Lords to include about 20 office-holders, among whom are the Government Whips, who are members of the Royal Household, and act as spokesmen for the Government in debate. The number of Cabinet Ministers in the House of Lords varies; there are usually between two and four out of a total number of about 20. In the Government of June 1955, Lord Chancellor, Lord President, the Minister for Colonies, the Minister for Air, Paymaster-General, Minister without Portfolio, Ministers of State for Foreign Affairs belonged to the Lords. Only the first four were in the Cabinet. In the Labour Government of 1950, three Cabinet Ministers, two outside the Cabinet, and five Under-Secretaries were in the Lords. Prime Minister Harold Macmillan appointed a Peer, the Earl of Home, as the Foreign Secretary. The appointment produced a storm of opposition from the House of Commons. The last Foreign Secretary to sit in the Lords was the Earl of Halifax before the outbreak of World War II. The only other one in this century was Lord Curzon in 1923.

Judicial Power. The House of Lords has two judicial functions. One, the trial of the impeachment cases on charges preferred by the House of Commons. With the acceptance of the principle of ministerial responsibility this power of the Lords has become obsolete. The last impeachment occurred in 1805. The second judicial function is that the House of Lords is the Supreme Court of Appeal in civil cases for Great Britain and Northern Ireland. But the whole House now never meets as a Court of Appeal. It is only the Lords of Appeal or the nine Law Lords, with the Lord Chancellor presiding, who do the judicial work of the House. The Law Lords are, so to speak, a small specialised committee of the House of Lords to whom the function of hearing appeals has been delegated.

REFORMING THE LORDS

No other political institution in Britain has been criticised to such an extent as the House of Lords. The slogan of the Labour Party since 1907 was to end the House of Lords as a hereditary Chamber was a political anachronism in a democratic age. The Liberal Party, on the other hand, had its political creed for reforming it and a comprehensive reform of both the composition and the powers of the House of Lords was envisaged in the Preamble to the Parliament Act of 1911, but was not enacted. Abolition of the Lords has not been attempted by any Labour Government, "partly it would seem because the Second Chamber is recognised as being capable of performing useful legislative and deliberate functions, especially for Labour Governments which tend to have heavier legislative programmes than Conservative Governments."³¹ Since 1911, two measures affecting the composition, but not the powers, of the Lords have been passed: The Life Peerage Act, 1958 and the Peerage Act 1963. Both these Acts came from the Conservative Governments. The general attitude of Conservative Governments towards the House of Lords in this century has been to defend its obstructive powers and advocate minor reforms of its composition "in order to make it more respectable and thus more justifiable in the use of its existing powers."³² Proposals to eliminate the present hereditary basis of the House of Lords and to reduce its powers have now been published in a White Paper and legislation to give effect to these proposals is promised within a year's time.

The arguments advanced against the present composition and powers either in favour or against the House of Lords are:

Arguments Against. 1. That the House of Lords as at present constituted is a political anachronism in a country with thoroughly democratic institutions. The composition of the House still remains what it has been for centuries and more than seventy per cent of the Peers sit in their places because their forefathers sat before them. There may be hereditary genius on a large and sweeping scale. Even if it may be conceded that all the Peers have the makings of capable legislators, no test of their aptitude has been applied. And even if ability of all the Peers were positively proved "the modern world," as Finer points out, "has rejected the application of ability to government unless it is representative of the interests of those expected to obey the law."³³ No elective principle, popular or occupational, characterises the composition of the House of Lords. The Peers are responsible to nobody save themselves. They take their seats by their own right. They need no party labels, and no jealous constituency watches their votes or takes a note how diligently and regularly they attend to their duties. In other words, as Jennings points out, "They have not to trim their sails to the breeze of public opinion."³⁴ And yet they claim that they are representatives of the people enjoying their full confidence. Webbs have, therefore, aptly remarked, "Its (House of Lords) decisions are vitiated by its composition: it is the worst representative assembly ever creat-

31. Punnett, R.M., British Government and Politics, p. 275.

32. Ibid.

33. The Theory and Practice of Modern Government, op. cit., p. 407.

34. The British Constitution, op. cit., p. 90.

ed....³⁵ Patrick Gordon Walker, speaking for the Labour Party in the House of Commons on the Peerage Bill maintained (June 19, 1963) that it should be considered only a first step towards complete abolition of hereditary peerage. The Life Peerages Act, 1958 was designed as a means of infusing new life into the House of Lords. But the Labour Party criticised the measure as an attempt by the Conservative Government to give no authority to the Lords, while avoiding the basic problem of the hereditary element. The Peerage Act, 1963 has not at all helped to change the complexion of the House. The hereditary principle remains intact as the Act specified that the title could pass, on the Peer's death, to his heir and that too if the heir also chose to disclaim. In the first twelve months of the operation of the Act, only eight Peers chose to disclaim and among the eight were Lord Home and Lord Hailsham, who were able to disclaim at the time of the Conservative Party leadership crisis in 1963. During the total span of six years the Act did not lead to any attractive figure of exodus. The general effects of both the Acts of 1958 and 1963, are, therefore, that the original basic problem of the composition of the House of Lords is left untouched. On November 21, 1968, the House of Lords approved by 251 to 56 votes planned abolition of its 600-year old aristocratic privilege in law-making. The Labour Government promised detailed legislation in this respect within a year. Till this finally comes about the complexion of the House remains as before.

2. The meagre attendance which the House attracts, and lack of interest which the Lords evince in their legislative duties is an argument by itself for either ending or mending it. Normally sixty or seventy members had participated in its deliberations.³⁶ Now the daily attendance on the average is rather less than two hundred, while one-hundred and fifty are regularly engaged in the work of the House. Many Peers so seldom show their faces in this gilded Chamber that the attendants even do not recognise them.³⁷ One-half of its membership has perhaps never spoken at all in the Lords. The number who have spoken several times is something like one in eight of the entire membership, and those who speak are largely Ministers or ex-Ministers. It is only on rare occasions that they "bring up the big battalions when the defeat of a progressive measure is desired."³⁸ And the quorum is only three. The smallness of the number of Peers who participate frequently in the work of the House is a grave defect, as Bagehot pointed out. "The real indifference to their duties of

35. Sidney and Beatrice Webb, A Constitution for the Socialist Commonwealth of Great Britain, p. 63.

36. "In 1932 and 1933, 287 Peers never attended the House. Between 1919 and 1931, 111 Peers never voted, and more than half never spoke; there were only 13 divisions out of over 440 in which more than 200 voted. In the whole period only 98 Peers spoke on an average more than once a year, and those were largely ministers and ex-ministers." Gieves, H.R.G., The British Constitution, p. 53.

37. In 1893 when the Lords made a great rally in order to defeat the Second Home Bill, one Peer was stopped by the door-keeper who asked him if he were really a Peer. He replied, "Do you think if I weren't I would come to this blankety, black hole."

38. At the second reading of the Bill to amend Parliament Act, 1911 in 1947, the voting in the House of Lords was 204 to 34 for rejection. This was a vote of very unusual size for the House of Lords.

most peers is a great defect, and the apparent indifference is a dangerous defect.... An assembly—a revising assembly especially—which does not assemble, which looks as if it does not care how it revises, is defective in a main political ingredient. It may be of use, but it will hardly convince mankind it is so."³⁹ Lord Samuel's remark on the composition of the House of Lords that the efficiency of that House was secured by the almost permanent absenteeism of most of its members was a telling blow aimed at the Lords.

3. Then, the large and predominant majority of these hereditary members belong to one political party, the Conservative, which appears to be permanently entrenched in the House of Lords. Of those whose party membership is known, it is computed that two-thirds of the members belong to the Conservative Party, and one-third are Liberal and Labour. The result is that whatever be the direction of the popular vote, and no matter which party controls the House of Commons, the Conservative Party, and even worst of it, its more reactionary members, remain in unchallenged mastery of the House of Lords. Some members of the House openly admit the claim of Lord Balfour that it was the duty of the Lords to see that the Conservative Party "should still control whether in power or whether in Opposition the destinies of this great Empire." And the Lords have proved true to their professions. A Conservative Government is always certain of its majority. No Bill promoted by a Conservative Government has been rejected by the House of Lords since 1832, "and, for the last fifty years at least, no Conservative Bill has been amended against firm Government opposition."⁴⁰ When any other Party is in power, the position is quite different. The Conservative majority in the Lords determines its strategy in consultation with the Conservative leaders in the House of Commons. Nothing passes the House of Lords except what the Conservative Party permits, no matter whether that Party is in office or in Opposition.

4. The House of Lords has become also, what Ramsay Muir has termed, the "common fortress of wealth." There is now no great national industry, says Professor Laski, whose leadership, so far as its capitalist side is concerned, does not find its appropriate representation in the House of Lords.⁴¹ In fact, property has always been the basis of the Upper Chamber, and is still adequately represented there. "Over one-third of them are Directors (some multiple) of the staple industries of the nation. One-third of them also own very large estates. Many of them are related by marriage, birth and business connections with the Conservative members of the House of Commons."⁴² The Peers are, therefore, predominantly an economic interest. It also provides a sufficient data to establish that the division between parties in Britain is in essence

39. The English Constitution, pp. 101-102.

40. Jennings, The British Constitution, op. cit., p. 90.

41. Laski, H.J., Parliamentary Government in England, op. cit., p. 712.

42. Finer, H., The Theory and Practice of Modern Government, op. cit., pp. 407-408. "There were 246 landowners in the House in 1931, while directors of banks numbered 67, railways 64, engineering works 49, and Insurance Companies 112, to name only a few." Greaves, The British Constitution, op. cit., p. 54.

a class division and Peers are drawn from one class only. How can it be possible then that this capitalist class with vested interests can look to proposals for radical social and economic reforms with any desirable sympathy? The answer to this question can be found from what Lord Acton wrote to Gladstone's daughter in 1881, when the Lords opposed the Irish Land Bill. He said, "But a corporation, according to a profound saying, has neither body to kick nor soul to save. The principle of self-interest is sure to tell upon it. The House of Lords feels a stronger duty towards its eldest sons than towards the masses of ignorant, vulgar, and greedy people. Therefore, except under very perceptible pressure, it always resists measures aimed at doing good to the poor. It has almost always been in the wrong—sometimes from the prejudice and fear and miscalculation, still oftener from instinct and self-preservation."⁴³

5. When the House of Lords is invariably wedded to the principles and policies of a single party, and it has avowedly retarded the forces of progress, then, the existence of the House of Lords, as Finer puts it, is a gross anomaly, "without justification in this era." The views of Abbe Sieyès, therefore, that if the Second Chamber agrees with the first it is superfluous, while if it disagrees, it is obnoxious, seems to many in Britain, according to Prof. Laski, "commonsense."⁴⁴ The formal policy of the Labour Party, though it has not contributed anything towards its realization, is still in favour of a single Chamber. Laski, while arguing his case for abolishing the House of Lords has maintained that an undemocratic institution like the House of Lords cannot survive in a democratic society unless it is always able to adjust its behaviour to the demands of democracy. And the demands of democracy are the speedy responsiveness to the public opinion and the social needs. The House of Lords cannot fulfil the demands of democracy, because, "where it is tempted to be active in defence is just where democracy is tempted to be active in offence."⁴⁵ The House of Lords, in simple words, is wealth and privilege personified and the real conflict, therefore, is between wealth and the masses. Democracy stands for the masses and in democracy nothing should exist which comes in conflict with their interests. The need is to end the House of Lords or to radically mend its composition.

Arguments in favour of the House of Lords. In spite of the determined policy of the Labour Party to abolish the House of Lords and the vigorous efforts of the Liberals to substitute for it a Chamber constituted on a popular instead of hereditary basis, the House of Lords still remains what it has been for centuries in the past. It is essentially a hereditary Chamber of Peers. The Liberals could not adopt a workable plan to democratize it. Even the Labour Party made no attempt in its four regimes either to end or mend it. The only change which the Labour was able to bring on the Statute book was an amendment to the Parliament Act of 1911.

1. The first and really the most important argument advanced for its preservation is that the British people will not tolerate this historic institution to be obliterated. In Britain nothing is created anew. Everything evolves gradually, over a long period of time and so it is that every British institution preserves into the present elements of the past. If the British had ever sat down to re-fashion the whole of their political machinery, it is possible that the hereditary House of Lords would have disappeared. If they had ever set out to reduce their Constitution into writing, the Lords might also have disappeared. But that is not their instinct and their method of doing things. They take everything as it is and put up with it as long as it works tolerably well. When its shortcomings are experienced, they are tried to be remedied as a matter of course. And when the inadequacies become unendurable, it is amended to the extent it is necessary to meet the revealed inadequacy or difficulty. It is not obliterated, because the British people intuitively know that life is more than logic. And having admitted that an hereditary House of Lords in a democracy is illogical, the practical way of life tells them that on the whole it works well, and in some ways "surprisingly" well. "The very irrationality of the composition of the House of Lords and its quaintness," says Herbert Morrison, "are safeguards for our modern British democracy."⁴⁶ Because changes intended to make the House of Lords democratic and representative would have undemocratic results. It would tend to make the Lords equal to the Commons, thus, creating rivalry, conflicts and deadlocks between the two.

43. As quoted in Finer's Theory and Practice of Modern Government, op. cit., p. 48.

44. Laski, H.J., Parliamentary Government in England, op. cit., p. 123.

45. Ibid., p. 136.

2. And democracy needs a Second Chamber. The United States of America expressly provided for a Second Chamber—the Senate—which, in fact, exercises vastly wider powers than does the House of Lords. The French, who are a very logical people, have included a Second Chamber in all their constitutions. So have the Scandinavian democracies. Even those countries which experimented with a single Chamber ultimately reverted to the double Chamber system because of the demands of democracy. Unless it is acceptably proved that democracy does not need a Second Chamber, it is not democratic to abolish one in Britain when the Parliament Act has destroyed the power of the Lords to interfere with Money Bills, and limited its power on other Bills to "delaying action" and, that, too, just for a year. Life Peerages Act, 1958 and the Peerage Act, 1963 tend to democratize it, accepting the democratic utility of bicameralism. Even the Labour Party, except for some members, do not favour its abolition. Lord Morrison portrayed the attitude of the Labour Party when he said, "So the powers of the Lords have been much diminished over the years. I think rightly so. But it remains an assembly of considerable importance where good debates are held. There are men of great experience in the Lords' Chamber. The debates are of petty good quality as a rule and in legislative revision, improving and polishing up parliamentary Bills, the House of Lords is useful and effective. Although its powers are more limited, its standing is still pretty high."⁴⁷

3. An argument that the House of Lords ought not to have a permanent Conservative majority is not necessarily an argument that there ought not to be a House of Lords. Conservatism is needed to check the radicalism of the Lower House. It is just like the appeal from Philip drunk

46. Government and Parliament, op. cit., p. 194.

47. Lord Morrison, British Parliamentary Democracy, pp. 7-8.

to Philip sober. A Second Chamber in a Unitary State is a means of checking what a nineteenth century Lord Chancellor called "the inconsiderate, rash, hasty, and undigested legislation of the other House." The House of Lords is a brake of considerable advantage on the decisions of a popularly elected House, sometimes reached under stress of great national emotion. When radicalism is injected with conservatism it is reason without passion and this is precisely what laws ought to be. Then, the real question, which needs a straight answer, is whether the House of Lords should be hereditary or elective.

4. There are certain advantages about having a non-elective Second Chamber. If the Second Chamber is to be the replica of the Lower Chamber, then, there is no point, or little point, in having the Second Chamber. The essence of the Second Chamber is that it should not be subject to the same impulses and the same pressures as the Lower Chamber. No member of the House of Commons can afford wholly to disregard the wishes of his constituents. "Some, indeed, are little more than the echoes of the popular emotions of their constituents, and trim their political sails to every wind of popular feeling. Even the most courageous and honest must keep a 'weather eye' on popular feeling." But a member of the House of Lords rarely speaks for the sake of speaking. He has no advantage to keep the debate going. He can speak freely, express unpopular views, advocate unconventional remedies. Nor has he any constituents to please. A Peer's constituency, it has been said, is under his hat. At the end of the debates, when all kinds of views have been expressed and opinions given, there is usually no division. Even if there is, it does not matter, for it does not involve the fate of the Government. The Lords also know that the Parliament Act sets a limit to their capacity of defying the will of the popular House, they resist but do not persist.

5. The result is that the House of Lords can afford to have full and free debates on non-legislative issues which the Commons "are too busy to discuss or which party leaders may consider too explosive to touch," because a Lords' vote does not of itself imperil the administration. The proceedings of the House of Lords receive wide publicity and the people at large find cue to their opinions in the utterances of these reverential statesmen. This is how the Lords prepare the public for the consideration of the important issues, educate public opinion, and make the Government susceptible to such reactions. The House of Lords, thus, performs a very useful function of influencing the people and the Government. Debates and votes on Motions in the Lords "can, and at times do", writes Morrison, "stir public opinion, or they may ventilate true public grievances or have repercussions in the House of Commons so they make the Government conscious of some failure or shortcoming. No Government, therefore, whatever its political complexion, studiously and systematically ignores the opinion of the House of Lords. Indeed, it is the duty of the Leader of the House of Lords in the Cabinet to indicate to his colleagues the feelings of his House on subjects under considerations."⁴⁸

6. Then, the House of Lords acts as a legislative chamber. Bills can be introduced there instead of in the House of Commons. The Bryce

48. Government and Parliament, p. 176.

Committee stated that partially non-controversial Bills, when they originate in the House of Lords, may find an easier passage in the House of Commons if they have been fully discussed and put into a well-considered shape before being submitted to it. Moreover, a finished Act of Parliament must be word-perfect. For, if mistakes are made, the Government may be involved in administrative embarrassment or confusion of it may place the community in grave difficulties as a result of legally correct but unexpected and disturbing decisions of the courts. The House of Lords is a specially valuable institution in this matter of spotting lack of clarity or doubtful matters of drafting, because it includes not only distinguished lawyers but a number of members who have functioned on the bench of a High Court of Justice, and also include the Law Lords.

7. The House of Lords usefully does the examination and revision of Bills, after they have passed through all the stages in the House of Commons. This is now more needed since the House of Commons almost on all Bills is obliged to act under special rules limiting debates, thereby, curtailing the possibilities of free and fuller discussion. The House of Lords functions under no such limitations. Moreover, the Lords is properly said to be a ventilating chamber consisting of men who have distinguished themselves in the field of public activity, and possessing varied and diverse experiences. Glancing down the list of those who have been created Peers during recent years, one notices that in addition to persons who may be described as "politicians" there are to be found former Diplomats, Admirals, Generals, Labour Union Officials, Businessmen, Newspapers proprietors, University Professors, Doctors, and civil servants. Such a galaxy of men with expertise knowledge in the various fields of public life can with confidence engage themselves in practical and highly intelligent discussion and criticism. Nearly a century ago Walter Bagehot wrote, "The House of Lords has the greatest merit which such a Chamber can have; it is possible. It is incredibly difficult to get a revising assembly, because it is difficult to find a class of respected revisers.... The Lords are in several respects more independent than the Commons.... The House of Lords, besides independence to revise judicially and position to revise effectually, has leisure to revise intellectually. These are great merits, and, considering how difficult it is to get a good Second Chamber, and how much with our present First Chamber we need a second, we may well be thankful for them."⁴⁹

8. The House of Lords is still a forum of debate on the administrative activities of the Government. The Lords had and still have the power to ask questions and a full right to debate its policies. The House of Commons has not the time to discuss all issues and problems, national and international, whereas the House of Lords has sufficient time and opportunity to do so. This is a useful national service rendered by the distinguished men whose views matter with the people and government. Even the apathy of the Peers to attend the meetings of the House has been characterised as a virtue in disguise. It would be impossible to get through the business of the House under present conditions if all who were entitled to attend and participate did so; a staggering number of more than 1,000. "The working of the House is made possible only," maintained Viscount Samuel, "by the absenteeism of a large number of members, and we should be grateful to those who grace the meetings of this House by their absence."

49. The English Constitution, pp. 99-100.

9. The Lords also relieve the Commons of the work of considering Private Bills. Most of these Bills are examined in the first instance by committees of the House of Lords. Such Bills undergo a "quasi-judicial" process which may take much time when they are opposed. "A Bill opposed in one House is usually not opposed in the other; and the result is that the Peers diminish by one-third the heavy and uninteresting labours which would have to be undertaken by members of the Commons if there were no House of Lords." Provisional Order Bills and Special Orders are much in the same position.

10. Interposition of delay is needed to crystallise public opinion on all Bills before they become Acts. In fact, it is of considerable advantage that the decisions of a popularly elected Chamber should be given a second thought and that, too, under conditions of calmer atmosphere in a Chamber which is less susceptible to immediate popular pressure. The problem of second thought is much needed on Bills which affect the fundamentals of the Constitution, or introduce new principles of legislation, or raise issues upon which opinion of the people may appear to be almost equally divided. George Washington illustrated the need for interposition of delay by pouring a cup of hot liquid into a saucer and allowing it to cool. "We pour legislation into the senatorial saucer to cool it," he said.

But the real point is how long the House of Lords should be allowed to interpose delay in the enactment of legislation? Churchill was of the opinion that all controversial legislation should be passed in the first two years of a Government's term of office, and thereafter the Lords should apply the brake to radical change until such time as "the engine of the popular will is refuelled by popular election". To this Attlee replied that it would mean that "the engine had to go to be repaired every five years for a Conservative Government and every two years when a Labour Government was in power." In the three-party conference, convened to consider the composition and powers of the House of Lords, when in 1947 the amending Bill to Parliament Act had passed in the Commons, the Conservatives suggested a delay of eighteen months after the second reading of the Bill. But the Labour's proposal was for nine months from third reading. No agreed compromise could be arrived at and the result was interposition of one year's delay after second reading was determined by the Act of 1949.

11. Perhaps, the greatest merit of the House of Lords, as Bryce emphatically maintained, is its moral authority. "A Second Chamber," he said, "ought to possess, if possible, the largest measure of moral authority. By moral authority I mean...the influence exerted on the mind of the nation which comes from the intellectual authority of the persons who compose the chamber, from their experience, from their record in public life and from the respect which their characters and their experience inspire....This House has a moral authority as well as the prestige, the unequalled prestige, of its long antiquity. There is no assembly in the world which can look back over so long and glorious a career as the great Council of the Nation, the Magnum Concilium of early Norman times, the form of which remains in this House as its oldest member.... I cannot help hoping that, whatever new Chamber is constructed, every effort will be made to preserve for it both the prestige of antiquity and the moral authority which this House inherits."⁵⁰ The House contains Peers who are members of ancient families in whom a sense of public service is ingrained by long traditions. Then, there are ex-Cabinet Ministers who have earned their titles through their political work.⁵¹ This argument, however, becomes untenable in the presence of reform proposals as embodied in the White Paper of November 1968.

12. Finally, it is argued that the House of Lords is also useful as a seat for Ministers, in that any figure who is called upon to serve in the Government, but who does not wish to enter the party political fray of the House of Commons can be raised to Peerage and thereby made eligible for Ministerial office. In 1957, Sir Percy Mill was created a Peer and he took up the post of Minister of Power in Macmillan's Government. Lords Bowden, Cadogan, Chalfont, and Gardiner were given Life Peerage in 1963 and 1964, and were, thus, made eligible for Ministerial office. But this argument does not cancel the case for abolition of hereditary Peerage.

REFORM PROPOSALS

Proposals for Reform: 1869-1917. With the Act of 1949, the issue of the powers of the House of Lords has been decided and the Labour Party does no longer argue for its abolition. The next question is about reforming its composition. This question is as old as several generations. Lord Russel introduced in 1869, a Bill providing for the gradual infiltration of Life Peers, but it was rejected. In the same year a project of Earl Grey came to naught and the same fate awaited the proposals of Lord Rosebury in 1874 and Lord Salisbury in 1888. No more was heard of the House of Lords reform until 1907. In 1907 the House set up a Select Committee to consider the suggestions made from time to time to increase the efficiency of the House in legislation. The report of the Committee suggested of new Constitution of the House consisting of Peers of the royal blood; the Lords of Appeal ordinary; 200 representatives elected by the hereditary peers; hereditary peers possessing special qualification; Spiritual Lords of Parliament, and Life Peers.

But it was too late. In the meantime the struggle between the Lords and the Commons had commenced and that, too, with great momentum. The result of the struggle was the Parliament Act of 1911. The 1911 Act was declared to be only a stage towards a more fundamental reform and its preamble was indicative of it. The preamble said that it was "intended to substitute for the House of Lords as it at present exists a Second Chamber constituted on a popular instead of hereditary basis." But the overwhelming occupation of the Asquith Ministry left the subject unpress-

50. Speech in the House of Commons, March 21, 1921. As quoted by Sydney D. Bailey, British Parliamentary Democracy.

51. Brasher, N.H., Studies in British Government, p. 108.

ed. Then, came the First World War and the issue remained untouched till 1917 when a Committee, consisting of 30 members equally chosen from both the Houses and representing all shades of opinion, presided over by Viscount Bryce, was appointed.

Bryce Committee Report. The Bryce Committee submitted its Report in the spring of 1918. It expressed the opinion that "in so far as possible, continuity ought to be preserved between the historic House of Lords and future Second Chamber. which obviously would mean that a certain portion of the existing peerage should be included in the new body." At the same time, the Committee agreed that its membership should be open to all the people so that it might represent adequately their thoughts and sentiments and no one set of political opinion should exercise therein a marked and permanent dominance.

The Committee, accordingly, proposed that the reconstituted House of Lords should have 327 members; three-fourths (246) to be elected by an electoral college composed of the members of the House of Commons grouped into 13 regional divisions. The commoners from each region would elect the quota to which their area on the basis of population was entitled to. The remaining 81 members were to be chosen from the whole body of peers by a Standing Joint Committee of both the Houses. The tenure of office was fixed at 12 years, one-third members in each group retiring after four years.

With regard to the functions of the House of Lords, the Committee agreed that the reconstituted Chamber ought not to have equal powers with the House of Commons. Nor should it aim at becoming a rival of the Commons, particularly in making and overturning ministers or of voting Money Bills. The Committee considered the following functions appropriate to a Second Chamber in Britain:—

- (1) The examination and revision of Bills brought from the House of Commons.
- (2) The initiation of Bills dealing with subject of a comparatively non-controversial character.
- (3) The interposition of so much delay (and no more) in the passing of a Bill into law as may be needed to enable the opinion of the nation to be adequately expressed upon it.
- (4) Full and free discussion of large and important questions.⁵²

Reforms Plan: 1918-34. The Bryce Committee Report and the plan it recommended was too much of a compromise and it pleased neither the Conservatives nor the progressives. The Government of Lloyd George, however, in 1922 moved in Parliament a resolution embodying the essentials of the Bryce plan. The plan was coldly received and three months after when the Coalition Government resigned it was left without official sponsorship. The short-lived Conservative Government marked its own time, and the first Labour Government under Ramsay MacDonald dared not touch the problem because of its own precarious position.

52. Conference on the Reform of the Second Chamber, 1918, (Report), p. 4.

When the Conservative Party came to power, it showed a genuine desire to do something in the matter so that Labour Government if it again came to office might not take some drastic measures. In fact, the Conservatives were pledged to the reform of the House of Lords in the elections of 1924, but the Prime Minister was not keenly interested in it and the matter hanged on. In 1925, Lord Birkenhead brought to the House of Lords a plan with no tangible results. In 1927, the Lords adopted a resolution declaring that they would welcome "a reasonable measure limiting and defining the membership and dealing with defects inherent in the Parliament Act." Nothing came out of it as well. In 1928, Lord Clarendon suggested a plan according to which 150 members should be elected by the peers and 150 nominated by the Crown in proportion to the strength of the various parties in the House of Commons, and a few Life Peers. The Labour when in office in 1929, did not consider the matter important to take it up and the National Government was pre-occupied in other things.

In 1932, a Conservative Party Committee made a fresh study of the subject and published the results of its deliberations in a document entitled Report of a Joint Committee of Peers and Members of the House of Commons. The Committee presented a plan for a Second Chamber with 320 members. Then, came the Salisbury plan in December 1933. It suggested that the House should consist of 300 members. The definition of the Money Bill was to be more restricted and interpreted by a Joint Select Committee of both the Houses with the Speaker as Chairman. No Bill, other than the Money Bill, was to be passed under the Parliament Act until after a dissolution. The Bill was passed by the House of Lords by 84 to 34 votes on the first reading and by 171 to 82 on the second reading. Baldwin, however, brought about the discontinuance of the discussion.

Reform by the Labour Government. In 1934, the Labour Party passed the resolution that, "A Labour Government meeting with sabotage from the House of Lords would take immediate steps to overcome it; and it will in any event take steps during its term of office to pass legislation abolishing the House of Lords as a legislative chamber." The Labour Manifesto in 1945, read, "...We give clear notice that we will not tolerate obstruction of the People's will by the House of Lords". This, of course, implied curtailing its powers rather than reforming its composition and the 1947 Amending Bill to Parliament Act, 1911, was a clear testimony of the intentions of the Labour. The Bill aimed to reduce the delaying action of the Lords on ordinary Bills to one year only and it became an Act in 1949 despite its rejection by the House of Lords.

When the Bill of 1947 was passed in the House of Commons an intra-party conference, under the Chairmanship of the Prime Minister, was convened early in 1948, the issue for discussion being the relationship of the composition to the powers of a Second Chamber. There appeared to be a "substantial agreement" on the following general principles with regard to the composition of the Lords:

(1) The Second Chamber should be complementary to and not a rival to the Lower House, and, with this end in view, the reform of the House of Lords should be based on a modification of its existing constitution as opposed to the establishment of a Second Chamber of a completely new type based on one system of election.

(2) The revised constitution of the House of Lords should be such as to secure as far as practicable that a permanent majority is not assured for any political party.

(3) The present right to attend and vote based solely on heredity should not by itself constitute a qualification for admission.

(4) Members of the Second Chamber should be styled "Lords of Parliament", appointed on grounds of personal distinction or public service. They might be drawn either from Hereditary Peers, or from Commoners who would be created Life Peers.

(5) Women would be capable of being appointed Lords of Parliament in like manner as men.

(6) Provision should be made for the inclusion in the Second Chamber of certain descendants of the Sovereign, certain Lords Spiritual and the Law Lords.

(7) In order that person without private means should not be excluded, some remuneration would be payable to members of the Second Chamber.

(8) Peers who were not Lords of Parliament should be entitled to stand for election to the House of Commons, and also to vote at elections in the same manner as other citizens.

(9) Some provision should be made for the disqualification of a member of the Second Chamber who neglects, or becomes no longer able or fitted, to perform his duties as such."

Future of the House of Lords. In spite of general recognition of the fact that a hereditary legislative chamber is an anachronism in a modern democratic State, there has been no progress in reconstituting the House of Lords at least until 1967. In 1967, the Labour Government announced its proposals for a major reform of composition together with proposals for further reduction in the powers of the House of Lords. It is now planned to abolish the 600-year-old privilege of law-making and the proposal was passed by the House of Lords itself on November 21, 1968. It is a sweeping reform that would virtually make the hereditary Peers extinct as a political force. The House will retain its ancient right to function as a brake on legislative measures sent to it from the House of Commons. But in future it will not be composed of aristocrats whose seats are guaranteed by hereditary birth-right. The Labour Government has promised detailed legislation within a year. Two issues are, however, clear. Abolition of the House of Lords is not the scheme of reform. Secondly, privilege will no longer remain the basis of entrance ticket to the House of Lords. It will be left with an obstructive power that amounts to a nominal delay. The Labour Government now recognises the utility of the House as a revising and deliberative Chamber. Lord Morrison had correctly expressed the point of view of the Labour Party. He said, "whilst willing to respect the House of Lords for the value and standard of its debates, and for its capacity as a Chamber of legislative revision, we should not tolerate, from such an institution any undue interference with the will of the House of Commons or of the people."¹⁰⁰ What the Labour wants is a Second Chamber strong enough for revision and weak enough to be no rival to the Commons.

SUGGESTED READINGS

- | | |
|---|--|
| Bailey, Sidney D. (Ed.). | : The Future of the House of Lords. |
| Boardman, Harry | : The Glory of Parliament. |
| Bromhead, P.A. | : The House of Lords and Contemporary Politics. |
| Brown, W.J. | : Everybody's Guide to Parliament , Chaps. II, VII, XVIII. |
| Campion and others | : Parliament: A Survey , Chaps. IV, IX. |
| Carter, G.M., and others | : The Government of Great Britain (The World Press Ltd., Calcutta), pp. 148-55. |
| Chorley, Lord, Crick, B., and Chapman, B. | : Reform of the Lords. |
| Finer, H. | : The Theory and Practice of Modern Government , pp. 406-42. |
| Gordon, Strathearn | : Our Parliament. |
| Greaves, H.R.G. | : The British Constitution , Chap. III. |
| Hansard Society | : The Future of the House of Lords. |
| Jennings, W.I. | : The British Constitution , Chap. IV. |
| Jennings, W.I. | : Parliament , Chaps. I, XI. |
| Laski, H.J. | : Parliamentary Government in England , Chap. III. |
| Lindsay, Martin | : Shall we Reform the Lords? |
| Lowell, A.L. | : The Government of England , Vol. I, Chaps. XXI, XXII. |
| Mackenzie, K.R. | : The English Parliament , Chaps. I, II, XII. |
| Marriot, J.A.R. | : English Political Institutions , Chaps. VI, VII. |
| Morrison, Lord | : British Parliamentary Democracy. |
| Morrison, Herbert | : Government and Parliament , Chap. IX. |
| Muir, R. | : How Britain is Governed , Chap. VII. |
| Ogg, F.A. and Zink, H. | : Modern Foreign Governments , pp. 40-42. Chap. X. |
| Stout, H.M. | : British Government , Chap. VII. |
| Wade, E.C.S. and Philips, G.G. | : Constitutional Law , pp. 35-44. |
| Weston, C.C. | : English Constitutional Theory and the House of Lords. |

CHAPTER VIII

PARLIAMENT (Continued)

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Composition and Organisation. The House of Commons has always been a purely elective body, but both the electorate and constituencies have varied greatly in the course of centuries. The distribution of seats in the Commons resulting from the general elections in 1966 is:—Labour 363, Conservative and Associates 253, Liberal 12, Republican Labour 1, and the Speaker one. In 1964 the complexion of the House was: Labour 317, Conservative and Associates 303, Liberal 9, and the Speaker 1. Members are elected from single-member constituencies. Before the House of Commons (Re-distribution of Seats) Act of 1944 and the Representation of the People Act, 1949, there were several two-member districts in London. There was also the business-premises vote, and the university graduates could vote in special university constituencies in addition to their regular residence voting. But plural voting is now a matter of the past.

All British subjects, of either sex, provided they are 21 years old or over, and from whatever part of Her Majesty's Dominions they come, are eligible for election,¹ provided they are not lunatics, bankrupts, persons convicted of certain crimes including corrupt practices, clergymen of the established Churches of England and Scotland and the priests of the Roman Catholic Church, and Peers of England and Scotland and the United Kingdom, and the holders of certain offices under the Crown, as also those expressly precluded under the House of Commons Disqualification Act, 1957 (for instance, holders of judicial offices, civil servants, members of the regular armed forces and the police forces, members of the legislature of any country or territory outside the Commonwealth, and holders of other public offices listed in the Act).

The life of the House of Commons is for five years unless previously dissolved. But normally Parliament is dissolved by the Sovereign, acting on the advice of the Prime Minister, before the expiry of the full legal term and general elections held. Where a particular vacancy occurs in the period between general elections, for example, on the death or resignation of a member, a by-election is held to fill the vacant seat. According to the ancient theory, service in the House of Commons is like a jury service, not a right but duty. Technically, a member may not resign his office. But resignation is possible through a fiction. There is a sinecure office "the steward of the Chiltern Hundreds" and the "Steward of the Manor of the Northstead" and a member intending to resign applies to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for appointment to one or other of these offices. Such a request is granted as a matter of course. The appointment automatically results in the vacating of a seat in the House of Commons, because it is a paid post under the Crown. Then, the office of the stewardship is promptly resigned.

1. The age of voting has been reduced from January 1, 1970 to 18. But adults of 18 getting the right to vote will not become members of Parliament or serve in the jury before 21.

The House of Commons, according to the usual practice, must meet at least once a year because certain essential legislation, including taxation and expenditure of public funds, is passed only for a year at a time and must be renewed annually. The session normally begins in October or November and continues for twelve months, except for brief adjournments. The session is brought to an end by prorogation and all business unfinished at the end of the session is terminated (with certain minor exceptions) until Parliament is again assembled. This means that a Bill not completed in one session must be reintroduced in the next, unless it is to be abandoned. The dispersal of the House through adjournment does not affect uncompleted business.

Since 1947, the normal times of meetings of the Commons have been the first five days of each week, except when Parliament is in recess. The hours of sitting for normal business are: Mondays to Thursdays from 2-30 p.m. to 10-00 p.m. and Fridays 11-00 a.m. to 4-30 p.m. Certain business is exempt from normal closing time and other business may be exempted if the House so chooses, so that the Commons often sits later than 10-00 p.m. on the first four days of the week, and all night sittings are not uncommon. On all these occasions time has to be rationed. From 2-30 till not later than 2-45 on Mondays to Thursdays private business is taken, questions following until 3-30. Immediately after questions is the time at which members may seek leave to move a motion of adjournment in order to discuss a matter of urgent public importance. If leave for the motion has been granted it stands over till 7 o'clock. It is only after such like preliminaries that comes the order for the day for the transaction of public business. This continues until 7 p.m., when adjournment motion or opposed private business may be taken. After that the interrupted business is resumed and continues until 10 p.m.

Members of the House of Commons are paid for their parliamentary work in order to enable them efficiently discharge their duties without undue financial worry. A member receives £3,250 a year. The income is subject to income tax. Under the Ministerial Salaries and Members' Pensions Act 1965 a compulsory contributory scheme has been introduced to pay pensions to members, after ten years' service, on retirement from the House if they have reached the age of 65. Provision has also been made for widows' and orphans' benefits.

Closure of debate. As the time of the House of Commons is carefully rationed in order to provide for an orderly conduct of business, some measure for an enforced closure of debate is, therefore, necessary. Ordinarily, an agreement is made "behind the Speaker's Chair" between the Chief Whips of the Government and the Opposition with regard to allocation of time to debate on different measures and the Speaker will see to it that the agreement is carried out. If such an arrangement fails, then, there are several expedients to cut short debates. This system of shortening the debates is known as the closure.

"A time must come," remarks Dr. Finer, "when debate ceases and action is taken. This is, also, a law of life itself." But before 1880, the procedure in the House of Commons was designed to obstruct and prolong discussion rather than make laws or oversee administration. In 1881, the Irish Nationalists adopted tactics by obstructing the business of the House. They would speak for hours on any subject, relevant or irrelevant, and yet the Speaker had no authority to stop that confusion and end such obstruction. The sitting of the House, which began at 4 o'clock on Monday, January 24, 1881, ended only at 9-30 a.m. on the following Wednesday. Speaker Brand declared, "The dignity, the credit, and the authority of this House are seriously threatened, and it is necessary that they should be vindicated. Under the operation of the accustomed rules and methods of procedure the legislative powers of the House are paralysed. A new and exceptional course is imperatively demanded." He declined to call any more members to speak, put the question, asked the House to change its rules or give the Speaker more authority.

The House did both. It altered the rules of debate so that time wasting and obstruction could be checked, and increased the authority of the Speaker in controlling the debate. Deliberate obstruction is rare now, and to some extent the members can be relied upon to recognise an obligation to be reasonably brief in what they have to say. But occasion may arise when cutting short the debate may become expedient. Closure may, then, take one of the following forms:

(1) Simple Closure. After a debate has been going on for some time, a member may move that "the question be now put—that is, that the subject on which discussion is taking place may be put to the vote. It is the discretion of the Speaker to accept or refuse the motion. He will refuse it, if he thinks that such a motion is an abuse of the rules of the House, or an infringement of the rights of the minority. If the Speaker permits it, and the motion is carried by not fewer than a hundred votes, the debate is closed and the matter under discussion is voted upon.

The procedure of closing the debate in this way makes the Government, if it is despotically minded, the master of the debate. With a comfortable majority at its back, it can get the motion to put the question moved, get 100 members to support it, and carry the issue. It is only the impartiality of the Speaker which can stem such designs of the Government and see that the right of the Opposition to have sufficient say is not choked.

(2) Guillotine or Closure by Compartment. In addition to the simple closure device, which may be used on any kind of motion, there are other devices whose use in general practice, is confined to legislation. This kind of closure involves allotting a certain amount of time to various parts of a measure or to its several stages, and at the appointed time taking a vote no matter any part of the measure or even its important aspects had been discussed or not.

The closure by compartment is introduced in a resolution before the House, planning the various stages, and provides that at the end of each, at a time fixed, the Speaker shall put the question without further debate.

This kind of closure has been developed in order to deal with long and obstinate Opposition, and in order to give the Opposition some measure of choice as to how the time allotted for discussing the various parts of the Bills is to be used. Since 1946, Standing Committees use the "guillotine" also.

(3) "Kangaroo" Closure. Another form of closure provided for in the Standing Orders is known as the "Kangaroo". It was first used in 1909, by which the Speaker is empowered to select those clauses and amendments to be proposed which he thinks most appropriate for discussion. That is to say the Speaker at the Report Stage is invested with power to decide which amendments may be debated when several have been submitted to the same clause. The practice of missing some amendments is called the Kangaroo since the Speaker "leaps over" some amendments either because they are not in order, or had been talked about before, or are merely time wasting. Kangaroo may be used either in conjunction with Guillotine or separately. The Chairmen of Committees, too, possess a similar power. The device of Kangaroo invests the Speaker with grave responsibility, but there is virtually no evidence of real abuse. The principle which the Speaker follows in the application of the Kangaroo is to select those amendments that "raise the most important points of principle and concern the most important sections of opinion, and the most effectively worded in this sense."

Parliamentary privileges. Each House of Parliament enjoys certain privileges and immunities designed to protect the House from unnecessary obstruction in carrying out its duties. These privileges apply collectively to each House and individually to each member.

In the House of Commons the Speaker formally claims from the Crown for the Commons "their ancient and undoubted rights and privileges" at the beginning of each Parliament. These include freedom from arrest in civil proceedings for a period from forty days before to forty days after a session of Parliament; freedom of speech, so that Members of Parliament cannot be prosecuted for sedition or sued for libel or slander for anything said in the House or reported in Parliamentary publications and the right of access to the Crown, which is a collective privilege of the House. Further privileges include the right of the House to control its own proceedings; the right to pronounce upon legal disqualifications for membership and to declare a seat vacant on such grounds; and the right to penalise those who commit a breach of its privileges. The House is, thus, protected from criticism that affronts its dignity. In 1947 Garry Allingham was expelled from the House on account of critical articles he had written about Parliament, and at times, outside offenders against privilege are summoned to the House and reprimanded.

OFFICERS OF THE HOUSE

The chief officer of the House of Commons is the Speaker who is elected by the Members to preside over the House immediately after a new Parliament is formed. Other officers of the House are the Chairman of the Ways and Means, and the Deputy Chairman, both of whom may act as Deputy Speaker. These officers are elected by the House.

Permanent officers of the House, i.e., those who are not members of Parliament, include the Clerk of the House of Commons, who is charged with such matters as keeping the records, endorsing bills and signing orders, and the Serjeant-at-Arms, who attends the Speaker in the House.

Mr. Speaker. At the hour appointed for the House of Commons to meet, Mr. Speaker enters the Chamber with time-honoured ceremonial. The Oxford English Dictionary defines the Speaker as "the member of the House of the Commons who is chosen by the House itself to act as its representative and to preside over its debates." This is a fairly correct definition and it brings out three important points: that the Speaker is himself a member of the House of Commons and elected like all the others; that the House itself elects its own Speaker; and that he is the House's accredited Deputy and the Chairman of its deliberations. The dictionary definition, however, gives no idea of the Speaker's indispensability. Without the Speaker the House cannot meet. On the death of Speaker FitzRoy,³ for instance, the House rose at once and could not function until the election of his successor, although the country was in midst of the Second World War.⁴

The Speaker is an office the origin of which is obscure, but it is an office of much dignity, honour and authority. The first Speaker officially recorded in the Rolls of Parliament was Sir Peter de la Mare in 1376. In old days the Speaker was the spokesman for the Commons when they wished to lay their petitions before the King and in a sense he is that still. Today, in all his work, both in and out of the Chair, the Speaker interprets the will of the House and speaks for it as well as to it. For nearly six hundred years the office has developed, but not essentially changed.

In the earlier days the King appointed the Speaker, but long after when the office became elective the usage was, as Coke testified in 1648, that the Sovereign would "name a discreet and learned man" whom the Commoners would then proceed to "elect". It was not till the reign of George III that the Royal influence wholly ceased to be exercised in the choice of a Speaker. Even now the election of the Speaker is subject to the approval of the Crown. But the real choice is that of the House of Commons, and normally the practice is to have the unanimous election of the Speaker.⁵ He is chosen by the Party in power from its own benches when there is a vacancy. The Opposition is always consulted before his name is proposed and if the Opposition objects, his name is withdrawn. As the Speaker is expected to be as impartial as any human being can be, the candidate proposed for the Speakership is one who has not been an active partisan, or a member of a Government, and has ordinarily served a long apprenticeship as Chairman or Deputy Chairman of the Ways and Means or of some other Committee. The purpose is to secure general respect, and "no violent animosity." In 1945, when Labour had a majority of over 200, it did not oppose to the re-election of Colonel Clifton Brown, who had been the Conservative nominee in 1943. In 1959 the Conservatives, thought that they might elect a Speaker from the Labour Party. It could not materialise as the Conservatives insisted that the choice of the candidate should be theirs. Sir Frank Sorkiss refused the appointment and the Conservatives refused to consider any other Labour candidate. Sir Harry Hylton Foster was accordingly elected.

3. FitzRoy died in 1943.

4. Briers, P.M., and Others, Papers on Parliament, A Symposium, p. 2.

5. A contest for the Speakership is possible. Shaw Lefevre was elected for the first time (in 1839) in a contest and so was Speaker Gully in 1895. Another contest over the election of a new Speaker took place in 1951, when the Conservatives were returned to Office. The Labour Party, in Opposition, did not object to the Conservative candidate for the office, but at the same time proposed that the former Deputy Speaker was most suitable a candidate because of his greater experience. Votes were, accordingly, taken, the Conservative candidate ex-Minister W.S. Morrison was elected defeating Major Milner of the Labour Party.

The Speaker, thus, elected continues in office for the whole life of Parliament.⁶ But once elected he continues in office for so long as he wishes no matter whether or not the party which first proposed him for the Speakership is returned in majority.⁷ In fact, once elected, the Speaker retains office until death or voluntary retirement. It is a tribute to the impartiality of the presiding officer of the House. Onslow, who was Speaker for thirty-four years at the beginning of the eighteenth century, set a good example of impartiality by resigning his office as Treasurer of the Navy in order to show that he was independent of the government. But his successors for the next hundred years did not adhere to his conception of office. Not until the nineteenth century it became the generally accepted principle, never questioned since 1870, that a Speaker, once elected, takes no further part in party politics.

Since the time of Shaw Lefevre it has come to be understood that the Speakership is a strictly judicial office, wholly divorced from politics. As the Speaker abstains from any kind of political activity, its natural corollary is that a Speaker should not have to fight an election. Accordingly, for a long time there was a tradition to re-elect him unopposed. Since 1832 this had been the general rule. But in 1935 and again in 1945, the Labour Party contested the re-election of Conservative Speakers, FitzRoy and Clifton Brown, though without any success. In 1951, no official Labour candidate opposed the Speaker. But an independent Labour candidate who ran against him was overwhelmingly defeated. In 1955 elections the Speaker was opposed but re-elected by a large majority. It appears that the electorate feels alive to its duty of re-electing the Speaker unopposed and are determined to continue with a tradition which is now more than a century old, although since the end of the Second World War the Speaker has, almost always, been opposed. But when a candidate at the polls the Speaker remains aloof from party issues, standing as 'the Speaker seeking re-election.' The endeavour has been, as Herman Finer remarks "to make the Speaker the objective embodiment of the rules and laws of the Commons, purgating from him the last milligram of partisanship."⁸

6. The Speaker remains in office after dissolution until the next Speaker has been elected. He does not, however, after the dissolution execute duties such as issuing writs, etc., as he does during a parliamentary recess.

7. During the nineteenth century, for instance, only three Speakers were elected from the Conservative Party. The Party came to office in 1841, 1874, 1886 and 1895, but in each case the Speaker already in office was reappointed, although he was elected to Parliament as a Liberal and to the Chair under a Liberal Government.

Duties and Functions of the Speaker. As an impartial arbiter in the proceedings of the House, the duties of the Speaker are many and arduous. Some of these duties depend on age-old practice, some on statutory authority, and some on the Standing Orders of the House. We divide them, accordingly, into three main categories.

(1) On occasions he acts as spokesman of the House, e.g., when he claims the Commons' privileges, and executes its orders and decisions. Sometimes he bears their loyal address to the Throne. The Commons have access to the King only through the Speaker, or, in a body, with the Speaker at the head. In the name of the Commons the Speaker conveys thanks and censures. He presents Money Bills at the Bar of the House of Lords.

(2) In certain ways, the Speaker acts as the House's representative and executive. He is, indeed, its active and the only constitutionally recognised deputy. He issues a number of warrants in the name of the House for various purposes. For example, when a seat falls vacant during a session, the House directs Mr. Speaker to cause a writ to be issued for a new election. Similarly, he issues warrants for the commitment of offenders and for the attendance of witnesses in custody.

The Speaker is also in charge of the administrative department, specifically called the Speaker's Department of the House of Commons. To it belong the Clerk of the House, a Librarian and staff, an Examiner of Petitions for Private Bills, officers of the vote office, and various others.

Occasionally, the Speaker is required to preside over a constitutional conference like the Buckingham Palace conference in 1914, the Speakers' Conference in 1920.

(3) Gladstone once said that the Speaker's chief function was to defend the House against itself. He does this when he presides in the Chair of the House during the debate. In the Chair, his functions are three-fold. First, to keep order in the House. Second, to keep members in order. And third, to select the speakers in the debate.

(i) The Speaker presides over the sittings of the House of Commons, except when it sits as a Committee of the Whole, and decides who shall have the floor. All speeches and remarks are addressed to the Chair. In any political assembly feelings are apt, from time to time, to run high. When they do, there is always the possibility of disorder. It is the business of the Speaker to see that the proceedings of the House are conducted with decorum and, if possible, with effect. He has, accordingly, wide powers to check disorder, irrelevance, tedious repetition and unparliamentary language or behaviour. It is a rule that when the Speaker stands, no member must remain on his feet. When he finds signs of disorder, the Speaker will stand and with a few well-chosen words, of admonition or appeal, will try to cool down the passions of Members, and, thus, avoid disorder. Usually this is effective, but if any Member persists in disorder, the Speaker may ask him to resume his seat. If he still continues to be disorderly, the Speaker may order him to withdraw from the House. If he does not go, the Speaker will 'name' the Member. This means expulsion of the Member from the House.' If the Member refuses to leave the House he will be escorted out (by force if necessary) through the Serjeant-at-Arms.¹⁰ He adjourns the House, if the disorder becomes serious. A Standing Order to this effect was brought in after certain Irish members had forced Speaker Gully into a very difficult position and it was applied in May 1905.¹¹ But it must be emphasised that such occasions are really very rare in the Parliamentary life of England.

8. Governments of Greater European Powers, p. 107.

Here is a lengthy quotation from Herbert Morrison to illustrate the high traditions of the office and the great reverence with which the Members hold the incumbent. "The Speaker," says Morrison, "has no bell with which to restore order, not even a gavel. When he rises in his place and says 'Order, Order' it is rare for the House not to come to order at once. And if some Members should be noisy a large proportion of the House will aid the Speaker by crying 'Order, Order' until the noisy and disorderly ones are quietened, or a Member standing at the same time as the Speaker rises resumes his seat. One evening between the wars I was impressed by a comparison with the French Chamber of Deputies. The occasion was exciting and the Deputies were thoroughly enjoying themselves in one of their occasional outbursts of noisy and persistent disorder. The President sat in his place ringing the bell vigorously and at length, it almost seemed that the louder he rang the bell, and the longer he rang it, the worse the disorder became. I could not help thinking, with some British Parliamentary pride, of Mr. Speaker in the House of Commons."¹²

(ii) His second function is to keep members in order and this relates to the judicious conduct of debates. The Speaker is, in fact, "Lord of Debate." He must see that the debate centres on the main issue before the House and Members do not wander, accidentally or deliberately, in the realm of irrelevance. Any Member can point out to Mr. Speaker that the Member who is speaking is out of order. But generally, the Speaker himself calls such a Member to order. Then, there are constant direct appeals to him for his rulings on points of procedure. Here the Speaker acts as a judge interpreting the Law of Parliament. His ruling is final which need not be contested. Each decision of the Speaker ranks as a precedent, to be heeded like the judgment of a Court on the next occa-

9. On the first occasion when the member is named he must stay away for five days. On the second, for twenty-one days. On the third, until the end of that sitting of Parliament.

10. The Serjeant-At-Arms attends the Speaker with the Mace (the symbol of Speaker's authority) and arranges the policing of the House. The Speaker can also order the arrest of a member and confinement to the Tower of Big Ben. In 1930, one member in a fit of anger seized the Mace and lifted it from the Table. There was talk of Mr. Speaker using this power for the offence, by Parliamentary standards, was very grave, but he did not use it and the offending member was merely expelled for a period.

11. For one whole hour the House refused a hearing to the Colonial Secretary. The Deputy Speaker was in the Chair and he adjourned the House.

12. Government and Parliament, op. cit., pp. 204-205.

sion. Similarly, he advises the Members and the House on points not covered by Law. He puts questions and announces the results of votes.

(iii) Mr. Speaker's third duty in presiding over Commons' debates is to "call" the Members to participate. He decides who is to speak, for so little time is available now-a-days that only those who are fortunate enough "to catch the Speaker's eye" can hope to speak. The Speaker is guided in his choice by many considerations. He will usually give a Member a chance of making his first, or maiden speech, but generally he will choose those Members who, in his opinion, are likely to be in a position to make the best contribution to the debate; the Government and Opposition leader share a conventional priority. And since his object is to give opportunities for the expression of all the main shades of opinion, he exercises his judgment most discreetly. In fact, Members apply to the Speaker beforehand through their Whips, so that his choice is by no means haphazard, and, of course, the Leaders of the House and Opposition decide who shall be their principal speakers. But he preserves his freedom to depart from this list.

(iv) Another less obvious function of the Speaker is to protect the House against the encroachments of the Government. When Ministers tend to encroach upon the freedom of Members, or refuse to answer questions, or do not give sufficient information, it is to Mr. Speaker that the Member appeals to safeguard and enforce the rights of Members against the executive.

There are some other functions of the Speaker and they are of crucial importance. He can prevent the putting of the question to a vote, when moved by a Member of the majority and usually a Government Whip, until he is personally satisfied that the minority has been given due opportunity to debate its views. After all Closure is an "infringement of the rights of the minority and it is the duty of the Speaker to protect the liberties and rights of debate of the minority." He, also, decides whether to admit or rule out amendments. Then, he has the power of decision on the admissibility of questions. He may, on his own judgment, decide whether a matter is of definite public and urgent importance and so put it on the immediate agenda for debate. The Act of 1911 empowers the Speaker to certify that a Bill is a Money Bill and thereby eliminates the obstruction of the House of Lords. He decides how Bills are to be allocated between the various Standing Committees, and in this respect has a comparatively free hand. The Speaker also appoints the Chairmen of Standing Committees, whom he chooses from the Chairmen's panel, a list of not less than ten Members drawn up by the Committee of Selection. It is for the Speaker to decide who is the leader of the Opposition should this ever be in any doubt.

The umpire like quality of the Speaker is characteristic of the trust which the Commons repose in him. He does not vote, except in a case of a tie. But the Speaker usually endeavours to give his casting vote in such a way that it maintains the status quo, upholds established precedents and previous decisions of the House, and avoids making himself personally responsible for bringing about any change. What he really does, therefore, is to put a temporary stop to the debate on an issue that will probably be revived at a later date.

What precisely the office of the Speaker is and his functions have been succinctly described by Douglas Clifton Brown, who was Speaker from 1943 to 1954. On the occasion of his re-election in 1945, he said, "I have to try to see that the machine runs smoothly. The Speaker can help here, in the Chair and behind the Chair. I have to see that the government business, while I am not responsible for it, is not unduly hampered by wilful obstruction. I have to see that minority views have a fair hearing... Of course, there will be various shades of opinion on all sides of the House, and all these have to be considered when one is calling speakers. Free speech and fair play for all must be my main duty... As Speaker, I am not the Government's man, nor the Opposition's man. I am the House of Commons' man, and I believe, above all, the back-benchers' man... As Speaker, I cherish the dignity of the office very much. I wish to uphold it, and I shall."

The Speaker is, thus, the impartial custodian of the rights of the members of the House. For him, the humblest back-bencher is no less than a Member, and the greatest Minister is no more than a Member. The essence of his impartiality lies in the way he maintains an atmosphere of fair play by ensuring that the Opposition have an opportunity to express their views and criticisms, yet at the same time seeing that there is no parliamentary obstruction to hinder the Government in its task of governing the country. "It is Mr. Speaker's function to safeguard the privileges and rights of the Members of the Commons not only against the Crown and Lords but as between each other, to the end that the whole basis of Parliament, as a forum in which the elected representatives of the people speak their minds and say what they think—popular or unpopular—should be reserved."¹³ The Speaker's conduct reflects the spirit, as Briers says, which is ultimately more important than the forms of Government.¹⁴ "In some measures he is responsible for the continued existence of the House of Commons, for it will survive only so long as its procedure and facilities are adequate for the functions it has to perform; and the adjustment of established procedure to novel conditions is the Speaker's task."¹⁵ The Speaker must, accordingly, possess high and varied qualities of character and intellect. He should be able, vigilant, imperturbable, tactful, enthusiastic for and interested in the institution of Parliament. Sir William Harcourt said of the Office: "We expect dignity and authority, tempered by urbanity and kindness; firmness to control and persuasiveness to counsel; promptitude of decision and justness of judgment; tact, patience, and firmness; a natural superiority combined with an inbred courtesy, so as to give by his own bearing an example and a model to those over whom he presides; an impartial mind, a tolerant temper, and a reconciling disposition; accessible to all in public and private as a kind and prudent counsellor." The Speaker seldom speaks, but when he does, "he speaks for the House, not to it."

The varied qualities needed in an ideal Speaker are not commonly found. But the ideal is recognisably there and for all these burdens the Speakership carries compensation in social status and material well-being.

13. Brown, W.J., Guide to Parliament, p. 61.

14. Briers, P.M., Papers on Parliament, A Symposium, p. 27.

15. Ibid.

He receives a salary of £8,500 a year, borne on the Consolidated Fund (plus £1,250 as a Member of Parliament), tax free, and a free residence within the Palace of Westminster. In the official precedence, he ranks after the Lord President of the Council, that is, the seventh subject in the land. He is the only subject who holds levees at which court dress must be worn, and to which invitations are in the nature of commands. On retirement, he gets a handsome pension of £4,000 a year and is created a Peer. Speaker Whitley (1921-28) was the first to refuse peerage. On his retirement Labour Members opposed the grant of his pension. They thought that the Speaker's pension was too much whereas his salary too little.

FUNCTIONS OF THE HOUSE

The House of Commons has, broadly speaking, three functions: legislation, financial business, and deliberation and criticism or controlling the Government. Legislation developed from the practice of petitioning the King. Financial functions were the original and the procedure involved therein originated in the practice of granting "aids". The critical and deliberative functions are the earliest, rudimentary in the beginning but the most essential feature of the governmental system in Britain. It is, perhaps, not always realised that the prime task of the House of Commons is not to govern or legislate, but to criticise and control the executive government and it is the essence of parliamentary democracy. John Stuart Mill illustrated this point in his own characteristic way. "The meaning of representative government is, that the whole people, or some numerous portion of them, exercise through deputies periodically elected by themselves the ultimate controlling power, which, in every Constitution, must reside somewhere.... The proper duty of a representative Assembly in regard to matters of administration is not to decide them by its own vote, but to take care that the persons who have to decide" are subject to its constant control.

LEGISLATION

Process of Legislation. The process of making laws is the business of Parliament as a whole, King, Lords and Commons. The House of Commons can by itself do nothing. But, in practical terms, the role of the Monarch in Parliament is just formal, and in a number of respects the legal power and political authority of the House of Lords is subservient to that of the Commons. Today, the Commons composed of the 630 elected representatives of the people, is the dominant element in Parliament, so that in almost all practical (though not legal) respects Parliament and the House of Commons are interchangeable terms. The House of Commons, thus, can initiate any measure, ordinary and financial, and most of the great contentious and important laws originate there and the verdict of the House of Commons finally determines their fate.

Every law begins as a Bill which is read three times in each House of Parliament and after receiving the King's assent becomes an Act. Why the Bill is read three times, it is difficult to say. It may only be assumed that if the House has given its assent to a measure three times there can be no question of unpremeditated acquiescence to it. The practice of reading a Bill three times dates from medieval times, "when the number three was regarded with especial reverence; and by the end of the sixteenth century it appears to have become invariable."¹⁶ It is, indeed, a sensible practice, but it is only a practice and not a legal necessity.

Kinds of Bills. Bills, in Britain, are classified in accordance with two important distinctions. In the first place, Bills are divided on the basis of a difference of substance, into Public Bills and Private Bills. Public Bills are of general application and contain subject-matter applicable uniformly to the public as a whole or to large parts of it. On the other hand, Private Bills affect particular local or private interest and are concerned with establishing legal arrangements that will apply to a specific person, corporation, group, community or the like. They are not generally of public concern and are passed by a special procedure distinct from Public Bills. Most Private Bills come from local government authorities.

Public Bills are subdivided, according to a formal distinction, into Government Bills and Private Members' Bills. Both Government Bills and Private Members' Bills are, as far as subject-matter is concerned, Public Bills, but their origin is different. A Government Bill, as its name implies, is a Public Bill introduced by a Minister on behalf of the Government. A Private Member's Bill is a Public Bill promoted by a Member of Parliament, who is not a member of the Government. Public Bills run between 90 to 150 per year as finally enacted laws, of which a very small number originate from Private Members. Public Bills may originate in the Commons.

Public Bills or Government Bills. A Public Bill, in becoming law, passes through three readings but five stages in the House of Commons. The five stages are: (1) First Reading; (2) Second Reading; (3) Committee Stage; (4) Report Stage; and (5) Third Reading. If there are financial clauses in a Bill, and most Bills have such clauses, there will be two extra stages, either before or after the Second Reading. A financial resolution is moved and debated in the Committee of the Whole House (the House without the Speaker) and report to the House itself.

Before a Public Bill begins its career in the House of Commons, the Cabinet discusses the proposal to introduce a Bill at the initiation of the Minister concerned. If the Cabinet accepts the proposal, a memorandum is sent to the Office of the Parliamentary Counsel, a subordinate department attached to the Treasury, set up in 1869 and staffed by non-practising lawyers, containing a general description of the scope of the Bill. The Parliamentary Counsels are the skilled lawyers who draw up the Bill on the lines suggested by the memorandum. Then, the draft Bill is laid before the Cabinet for approval, printed and discussed with the representatives of the various interests affected. No Government can afford to ignore or trample upon the various groupings of opinion. There is the next general election to be always remembered. It means that there are endless negotiations, deputations and interviews before even a final draft of the Bill is settled. The Bill may have to be redrafted many times and this process may occupy a considerably long time. At the end of such consultations the Bill may have to receive Cabinet approval once again.

16. Taylor, E., The House of Commons at Work, p. 131.

(1) First Reading. When the Bill has been finally approved by the Cabinet, it stands its turn for introduction. There are two ways of introducing a Bill. It may be introduced on a motion, or it can be introduced on written notice. The former procedure has now fallen into disuse as far as Government Bills are concerned. The normal method of introducing a Bill is on written notice and is prescribed in Standing Order No. 35 of the House of Commons. On the day appointed, of which notice has been given, the introducer merely comes forward and hands to the Clerk of the House a "Dummy Bill." The Clerk reads out the title of the Bill. The 'Dummy' does not contain the text of the Bill. It is just a special form of stationery officially furnished on which the title of the Bill is written down. There is no debate and discussion and that finishes the first reading of the Bill. The Bill is printed as soon as it is ready and members get its copies to study. The measure then waits its turn for the Second Reading. The First Reading is thus a formal stage.

(2) Second Reading. The crucial stage in the life of the Bill is the second reading and, ipso facto, the second stage in its career. On a day fixed in advance by an order of the House, the Minister-in-charge of the Bill will rise and move that "the Bill be now read a Second time." He will explain, elaborate and elucidate what the proposed measure will do, and how the necessity of such a measure is important and urgent. Some leading member of the Opposition will follow the Minister. He might move to amend the Minister's motion and say that "the Bill be read a second time this day six months hence." Or he might propose a substantive amendment to the policy embodied in the Bill. Then would ensue a general debate in which many Members on both sides of the House would participate, and it would end with the Minister winding up for the Government. Upon the conclusion of the debate there would be a division. If the Government were defeated it would have to resign. But it would never be defeated so long as it commands majority.

It should, however, be noted that the second reading is not the time for detailed discussion or amendments and vote upon the clauses. It is the Bill as a whole, its merits and principal policy issues involved, which is discussed and amendments are proposed not to the Bill, but to the motion that "the Bill be now read a second time." The object is to approve the Bill or throw it out entirely. The second reading in Britain, therefore, corresponds more exactly to the Continental practice of "discussion generale," which usually precedes passage to the specific articles.

Another point to be noted is that we described the second stage as crucial in the life of the Bill. Erskine May, the former Clerk of Parliament, said that "The second reading is the most important stage through which the Bill is required to pass; for its whole principle is then at issue, and is affirmed or denied by a vote of the House."¹⁷ But the truth is that one stage in the course of the Bill is as important as the other. In fact, decisions are made in the Committees and not in the second reading. The organs of opinion and interested groups, as Dr. Finer maintains, are "extremely vocal from now onward and seek to exert influence upon the Minister-in-charge of the Bill. These obtain their opportunity for concrete amendments in the states of cogitation which immediately precede, and operate during consideration in committee."¹⁸

17. As quoted in Herman Finer's The Theory and Practice of Modern Government (1954), p. 485.

(3) Committee Stage. Upon being read a second time, ordinary Public Bills¹⁹ go automatically to one of the Standing Committees, unless some member rises immediately after second reading and moves that the Bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole House or to a Select Committee or to a Joint Committee of Lords and Commons. Public Bills to which Cabinet attaches great importance are often sent to the Committee of the Whole House.

The Committee stage provides the occasion for a detailed discussion of the Bill. Every clause must be put separately to the Committee and accepted, amended or rejected, with or without debate. Discussion is generally of a very restrained, persuasive character. "The Minister is generally terse and quiet and the speeches of the critics have something of the same dry, businesslike flavour." The government, it must be noted; maintains with persistence its guiding hand throughout the Committee stage. It does not relinquish its leadership to a Reporter, as in France or to a "member-in-charge" as in the United States. A Minister, in Britain, sponsors the Bill in Parliament and pilots it through all stages. The fate of the Bill depends almost exclusively upon him. "He must guide the Bill through the Committee with tactful, and if necessary forthright, firmness in respect of principles, and with the appearance of amiable resignation and broad-mindedness in connection with unimportant detail."

A member of a Committee may speak any number of times to the same question without being exactly repetitive or demonstrably irrelevant. To avoid such obstructionists, the Government may be forced to apply a 'guillotine' motion, or by moving the Closure on every amendment. This is a salutary if not a drastic remedy and yet it cannot prevent obstruction. If the Opposition feels inclined they will force a division on every clause.²⁰

But once a Bill is passed through the second reading, its fundamental principles are supposed to have been accepted. It is, therefore, out of order to propose an amendment in a Committee intended to negative the effect of the Bill. Similarly, amendments which are not strictly relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill, and amendments which are not in conformity with the general intention of the Bill are out of order. Then, the amendments must not be inconsistent with whatever has already been agreed to in the Committee on the Bill, and "they must not be trifling, vague or jesting".

18. Ibid.

19. The exceptions are Bills for imposing taxes, Consolidated Fund Bills and Provisional Order Bills.

20. "In Standing Committee on the Cinematograph Films Bill 1927, a minority of six Members divided the Committee no fewer than three hundred times, and prolonged the Committee stage from April to July: twenty-five sitting days. In 1948, the Opposition prolonged the debate on the Gas Bill for months in Committee, and even forced several all-night sittings on the Bill—the only case where a Standing Committee had sat all night." Taylor, E., The House of Commons at Work, p. 139.

Kinds of Committees. The Committee stage has existed for centuries. The Commons had in the past, when the Speaker was the servant of the King and "an office-seeking spy," always wanted to discuss affairs without the presence of the Speaker. Now the Committees derive their importance and utility from the increased legislation and the inability of the House to spend time on its detailed discussion. The modern Committee system was established in 1882. "It was", as Finer says, "one answer (the other was Closure) to the congestion of the House with business, aggravated at that time by the ingenious obstructive tactics of the members from Ireland, who had made up their minds that if Ireland was not to be freed to govern herself, they would not let England govern herself." The main purpose of the Committee system was decongestion to save the time of the House of Commons by devolving its business to other bodies of the House which functioned at other times.

Now there are five types of Committees: (1) Committee of the Whole House; (2) Standing Committees; (3) Select Committees; (4) Joint Committees; and (5) Private Bills Committees. The Private Bills Committees are for the discussion of private and local legislation and have nothing to do with the Public Bills. The Joint Committees are Select Committees of the House of Commons and the House of Lords and consist of an equal number of members from each House to consider Bills or other matters in which both Houses are interested. We are primarily concerned with the first three types of Committees.

(1) Committee of the Whole House. The Committee of the Whole House is the first in importance. It consists of all the members of the House of Commons. But it is distinguished from the House itself that it is presided over not by the Speaker, but by a Chairman of the Committee or in his absence by the Deputy Chairman. The Mace which is the symbol of authority of the Speaker is placed, so long as the Committee is in session, under the Table. Then, the Rules of Procedure in the Committee are relaxed. The motion need not be seconded and the members are allowed to speak any number of times on the same question. There is no restriction on speech in the Committee of the Whole House and all devices which aim at cutting off debate cannot be moved.

Committee of the Whole House meets for four distinct purposes. There is, (1) the Ordinary Committee of the Whole House on a Bill; (2) the Committee of the Whole House on a Money Resolution; (3) the Committee of Supply; and (4) the Committee of Ways and Means. The first comes into being whenever the House resolves that any ordinary Bill shall go to the Committee of the Whole House rather than to a Standing or Select Committee. When the work of the Committee is done, it rises. The House of Commons again comes into session, and the Speaker occupies the Chair and the Mace is placed on the Table. The Chairman of the Committee, then, approaches the Chair and says, "I beg to report that the Committee have made progress in the matters referred to them, and ask leave to sit again." The Speaker asks when the Committee is to sit again and one of the Government Whips answers him. The appointed day is announced from the Chair and becomes an order of the House. If a Committee has completed its assigned task, its Chairman says, "The Committee have come to a certain resolution." The Committee of the Whole House it should be noted, is not set up permanently. It is a temporary body appointed from day to day.

The Committee of the Whole House on a Bill is rare. If it is desired to send the Bill to a Committee of the Whole House, a motion to that effect must be moved immediately after the Bill is read a second time. Otherwise the Bill will go automatically to a Standing Committee. The Committees of Supply and of Ways and Means are Committees of the Whole House of Commons, which discharge the financial duties of the House concerning the grant of public money and the levying of taxation.

(2 Standing Committees. After the Second Reading automatically a Bill, other than a Money Bill, goes to one of the Standing Committees, unless the House resolves that the Bill would go either to the Committee of the Whole House or to a Select Committee. "Constitutionally important Bills" are referred to the Committee of the Whole House, because the House has always preferred to deal with them directly rather than in smaller Committees. A Bill is referred to a Select Committee when examination of expert evidence is necessary to carry the legislation with technical efficiency involved therein.

Most Bills, therefore, go to the Standing Committees. Originally, there were two Standing Committees. In 1907, their number was raised to four; in 1919, to six; and in 1947, to "as many as shall be necessary." Currently, there are seven such Committees appointed, though the number can be increased at need. The Committees are not named as in other legislatures by subject-matter, for example, Education, Health, Armed Services, etc. They are distinguished only by a letter of the alphabet: A, B, C, D. Only three Committees, the Scottish Standing Committee, the Scottish Grand Committee and the Welsh Grand Committee are distinctly named. The Standing Committees are appointed by the Committee on Selection; a body normally consisting of eleven Members drawn from the main parties in the House at the beginning of each session. The members of a Standing Committee are constantly changing, from session to session. Each Committee consists from twenty to fifty members, who are specialists and experts in the subject which is the substance of the Bill. The parties are represented in proportion to their numbers in the House. Chairmen of Standing Committees are appointed by the Speaker from a Chairmen's panel consisting of not less than ten persons nominated by the Selection Committee. Now the Committees meet in the mornings from 10-30 a.m. to 3-30 p.m., with the recess, and may continue even afterwards. The House has now admitted that Committee might sit while it is in session. The "guillotine" form of closure has more recently become applicable to Standing Committees. The Government may also use its power to move the Closure on each amendment.

Bills come to the Standing Committees quite arbitrarily, according to their order on a calendar and according to which Committee finishes its work first. There is no specialisation on different topics. The Standing Committees are composed of members of Parliament and have no vestige of executive power. They cannot summon persons and papers before them. They cannot debate or discuss matters irrelevant to the actual text of the Bill before them. They are, in brief, legislative Committees and not investigative Committees. All information that is needed is supplied by the Minister-in-charge of the Bill. The Opposition supplies the contrary information. The public are admitted to meetings of a Standing Committee, unless the Committee decides to exclude them.

In addition to the normal Standing Committee, there are three others, the Scottish Standing Committee, the Scottish Grand Committee and the Welsh Grand Committee. The Scottish Standing Committee consists of thirty members nominated from Scottish constituencies with up to twenty other nominated members. In its plenary form, as the Scottish Grand Committee, it comprises all the members for the Scottish constituencies and not less than ten nor more than fifteen others. These Committees have three functions: to discuss for two days of each session matters of exclusively Scottish concern; to consider for six days such estimates as refer exclusively to Scotland; and also to consider the principles of any Bill which the Speaker certifies as relating exclusively to Scotland. Such a Bill can then, on the motion of a Minister, be referred to its Committee stage to a Scottish Standing Committee. The Welsh Grand Committee consists of 36 members for constituencies in Wales and Monmouthshire, with up to 25 other nominated members. The Committee considers the Annual Report for Wales and certain selected subjects for debate.

(3) Select Committees. Select Committees are appointed to inquire into and report to the House on special matters of great importance or to give special consideration to Bills that are controversial and propose radical changes. They are employed on specialised tasks which the House itself is unsuited to perform. They chiefly carry out inquiries rather than to discuss legislative details. Since Select Committees are specialised Committees they seldom have more than fifteen members, who are more or less technical experts adequately familiar with matters referred to them for investigation. They hold hearings, collect evidence, examine witnesses, sift evidence, and draw up reasoned conclusions to report to the Commons. As soon as the investigation conducted by a Select Committee is completed and its report submitted to the House, the Committee passes out of existence. The findings of a Select Committee are not binding. It simply makes recommendations to the House.

Apart from temporary Select Committees of this kind, a number of perennial Select Committees on various topics are appointed every year and they remain in existence throughout the session of Parliament. Hence these are called Sessional Select Committees. Examples of Sessional Select Committees are: the Selection Committee, the Committee of Privileges, the Committee on Public Petitions and Committees on Public Accounts, on Estimates, on Statutory Instruments and on Nationalised Industries. In addition three 'specialist' Committees have been set up: The Committee on Agriculture, the Committee on Science and Technology, and the Committee on Education and Science. These Committees have the power to ask Ministers to give evidence and their meetings are held in public.

(4) Joint Committees. Joint Committees are Committees composed, usually of an equal number of Members of each House, appointed to consider either a particular subject or a particular Bill or Bills, or to consider all Bills of a particular description, for instance Bills dealing with statute law revision and consolidating Bills. A Joint Committee to consider a particular subject may be appointed at the instance of either House, but the proposal that a particular Bill should be committed to a Joint Committee must come from the House in which the Bill originated.

The members of a Joint Committee are usually chosen in equal numbers by the respective Houses. The Committee has only such authority as both Houses agree to give it. The time and place of its meetings are also fixed by agreement between the two Houses. The Chairman is elected by the Committee itself from amongst its members. Decisions are taken by vote and the Chairman votes like any other member of the Committee.

The Report of a Joint Committee is presented to both Houses—by the Chairman to the House of which he is a Member, and by a member selected by the Committee for the purpose to the other House. A Bill is reported to the House in which it is pending, and a member directed to report accordingly to the other House.

(5) Private Bills Committees. Finally, are the Private Bills Committees. A Private Bill Committee consists of four members chosen by the Committee of Selection of the House and the members selected on the Committee are required to sign a declaration that they are not interested personally in the Bill and that their constituents are not locally affected by it. We shall refer to such Committees while dealing with Private Bills.

Committee System evaluated. In Britain as early as the reign of Queen Elizabeth, it was not unusual to refer a Bill after a Second Reading to a Committee which can be compared to a Select Committee of our times. The Committee system in its present form was established to relieve the congestion of business in the House of Commons, caused partly by the obstructive tactics of the Irish Nationalists, as mentioned above. They have, consequently, no resemblance whatever between the Committees of the American or Continental type. The Committees in the United States and Continental countries are bodies of relatively stable membership specialising in particular aspects of public policy. In the United States there are Committees of Congress which formulate policy, and intervene in the actions of the Government. In the Third Republic of France a system of eleven Commissions, chosen by lot from the Chamber of Deputies, performed the same functions to an even greater extent. The Fourth Republic constitutionalised the Commissions. Article 15 of the Constitution provided that "the National Assembly should study in its Committees the Bills laid before it...." They were nineteen in number and were powerful enough to find themselves often in conflict with the Government.

But such a conception of Committee system is entirely foreign to the spirit of the British Constitution. The Committees of the House of Commons are not small expert bodies undertaking special studies of the merits of the Bills and possessing the power of life and death over them. They are rather miniature editions of the House headed by a Chairman whose powers and functions are very much like those of the Speaker including the Closure rules. They have no permanence or individuality. Their members are constantly changing. The Standing Committees of the House are distinguished only by a letter of the alphabet, and they have no special subjects to deal with.²¹ The Speaker assigns Bills to them more or less at will. The purpose of the Committees is to put the Bill into final shape for adoption after its general character has already been approved at second reading and before it has to be reported out. Public hearings are not conducted by Standing Committees and they take no evidence.²² The House of Commons still jealously guards its responsibility of making laws and criticising policy in full session. Its Committees are only auxiliaries, "the mere accessories of the legislative and critical machine."

The Committee system, as it obtains in Britain, has engaged the attention of parliamentarians and public men and they advocate for the creation of specialized Committees of the House of Commons, each concentrating on the affairs of a Department or group of Departments. The advocates of Specialized Committees included Lloyd George, L.S. Amery, Sir Stafford Cripps, Sir Ivor Jennings, Harold Laski and D.W. Brogan. The many reforms that have been suggested along these lines vary in detail. But all are agreed that Specialized Committees would enable Members to acquire the detailed information about the work and problems concerning the Department; would enable the members to acquire information about and to criticize those aspects of defence policy "which are now shrouded in secrecy"; the Members would discuss administrative problems in a non-partisan way; would help Members of the Opposition not only to criticize the Government in an informed way, but also to prepare themselves to take over responsibility for the Departments if they should win an election.

The suggestions for reform of the Committee system have been widely discussed in the press, platform, books, in debates in the House of Commons, and before the Select Committees on Procedure of 1930-31, 1945-46, 1958-59, and 1964-65. But "they have met unyielding opposition from the spokesmen of whatever government to be in power."²³ The government point of view is that Britain should not try to copy the institutions of foreign countries and if American or French pattern was adopted, "we would be doing something absolutely opposite to British constitutional development."²⁴ It has further been maintained that specialized Committees would constitute a radical constitutional innovation" which would be a challenge to the responsibility of the Minister that he is individually accountable to the House as a whole for the work of his Department.

21. The Public Accounts Committee and the Estimate Committee have special functions in connection with the expenditure of public funds.

22. The Public Accounts and Estimate Committees have the power to send for persons and papers. In some ways they have functions like Congressional investigating committees, though they act in a non-partisan manner and within the policy limits laid down by the House.

23. Birch, A.H., Representative and Responsible Government, p. 161.

24. R.A. Butler in a debate in the House of Commons in 1958 and as cited in Birch's Representative and Responsible Government, p. 162.

But Birch, a strong advocate of specialized Committees, even suggests that "it may be appropriate to reconsider the nature of responsible Government in Britain"²⁵ if ministerial responsibility blurs by the creation of the Specialized Committees. Whatever, be the merits or otherwise of Specialised Committees, it cannot be denied that the British Committee system is defective and under the existing arrangement Parliament cannot control administration because M.Ps. lack knowledge about administrative affairs and the House lacks time for detailed discussion. To remedy the position partially three Specialized Committees have recently been set up; the Committee on Agriculture, the Committee on Science and Technology, and the Committee on Education and Science. They are in addition to the Public Accounts Committee, the Select Committee on Estimates and the Select Committee on Statutory Instruments. All these Committees are set up at beginning of each session in Parliament, but are in effect permanent features of the House of Commons' Committee system. R.H.S. Crossman, Leader of the House of Commons, while pleading for reform in the Parliamentary procedure gave a note of warning. He said, "...we must take care to see them up in the right way. We cannot make the American-style Committees. They must be in our tradition. We must take trouble and care on this. We are on the edge of getting it right, but do not let us set up too many Committees."²⁶

(4) Report Stage. The next stage in the career of a Bill is called the Report Stage, when the Bill is reported back to the House by the Committee. If the Bill has been dealt within the Committee of the Whole House, the report stage is formal. Where it has been dealt with "in Committee upstairs"²⁷ debate may arise and amendments may be moved on Report. The Government sometimes avails itself of the opportunity to make amendments which were promised at an earlier stage, but could not be drafted or could not be moved or amendments which it is felt are so important that they ought not to be in a Committee. There is always a tendency for the Report stage to lengthen out, "the tendency of a parent body", as Finer puts it, "to reconsider the discretion it gave its offspring." To save the time of the House, the Government resorts to motions for Closure and "the Speaker assists by keeping the debate to the clauses rather than generalities."

(5) Third Reading. The final stage in the House is that of the Third Reading. The rules governing Third Reading are substantially those which apply to Second Reading. There is a debate again on principle. The idea of the debate at this stage is that the Bill "having been approved in principle on the Second Reading, having been licked into shape in detail on the Committee stage, the House should take one more look at the Bill as amended before it finally gives its approval." Only amendments involving verbal alterations are accepted. When the motion that the Bill be read for the third time is carried, its career in the House of Commons comes to an end. "The Third Reading", remarks Dr. Finer, "is a political mustering: the Government expresses its thankfulness that it has been able to do the country some good, in spite of the opposition; and the Opposition replies by claiming that it has made a bad Bill better than the Government first presented it, and that, even so, it has doubts for the future of the country's prosperity."²⁸

25. Birch, A.N., Representative and Responsible Government, p. 164.

26. Extract from Parliamentary Speeches on Reform given in Bernard Crick's The Reform of Parliament, Appendix D, p. 308.

27. 'Upstairs' signifies that the Standing Committee meets in a Committee Room on the floor above the Chamber, so the phrase commonly used.

A Bill becomes an Act of Parliament. The Bill passes through much the same stages in the House of Lords. If the House of Lords has no amendments to offer, then it becomes an Act of Parliament after receiving the formal assent of the King. The House of Lords may amend the Bill or even throw it out altogether. But overthrowing the Bill by the Lords makes operative the Parliament Act of 1911, as amended in 1949. In case of amendments, they have to be approved by the Commons. On the day appointed for the consideration of amendments, the Speaker puts the question: "That the Lords' amendments be now considered." As each amendment is read by the Clerk, the Minister-in-charge of the Bill rises and moves: "That the House doth not agree with the Lords in the said amendment" or "That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment." In case of disagreement, a Committee is appointed to "draw-up reasons" for not agreeing to amendment. Then, an exchange of messages takes place between the two Houses. If there is no agreement and both the Houses insist on their own plea, the Bill is lost unless the Commons invoke the Parliament Act of 1911, as amended in 1949.

The ceremony by which Bills receive the Royal assent represents one of the many examples of ancient parliamentary pageantry. It is sometimes given by the King in person, but more often by a Royal Commission. It takes place in the House of Lords. The King is represented by Lords' Commissioners, who sit in front of the Throne. At the bar of the House stands the Speaker of the House of Commons who has been summoned from that House. The Clerk of the Crown reads out the title of each Bill and the Clerk of Parliament pronounces the Royal assent—Le Roy le veult. With the Royal assent the Bill has become a law.

Private Members' Bills. The procedure for the Public Bills introduced by Private Members is slightly different. What actually happens is that before the beginning of session the Private Members send their Bills to be introduced in Parliament. Then, ballots for precedence are drawn. Private Members' Bills must be introduced on a Friday, for the Government monopolises the time of the House on the earlier days of the week. The Members who are successful in the ballot for precedence on Fridays present their Bills upon written notice. There is another method to introduce the Bills under the "Ten Minutes Rule." This method gives to the sponsor of the Bill an opportunity to make a short speech, for ten minutes, in favour of the Bill. This will usually be followed by an equally brief speech from a Member or Members who oppose the Bill. After that the Speaker will put the question that leave be given to bring in the Bill. If the motion is carried the Bill is presented and has its first reading.

The Private Members' Bill suffers from certain tangible disabilities. In the first place, the time allotted is absolutely insufficient. The time allotted for all stages of all Private Members' Bills is ten days in the session. Secondly, the Private Members, in comparison with Members of Government, lie under a heavy disadvantage in the drafting of the Bill. Finally, even if it is well drafted, its passage depends on a combination of various circumstances. If the Government is opposed to the Bill, it will have no chance. If the Government is indifferent, various procedural difficulties stand in the way. If the Government definitely approves it, as to make its own, the Bill would, of course, become a Government Bill. "However, it would appear that if the Private Member is popular or at least not unpopular, if the Bill is popular or at least not unpopular, and if the member possesses some skill in respect of parliamentary procedure, the Bill will have a fair chance of being passed into law."

Apart from these rather restricting circumstances, Private Members' Bills follow exactly the same course of Public Bills promoted by the Government.

Private Bills. Private Bills are quite different from Private Members' Bills. A Private Bill is a Bill which is designed to further, and which only affects, specific private interests, as opposed to the general classes of the community which are affected by most Public Bills. They deal with a special situation or a limited locality, and the great majority of such Bills concern the rights and powers of local authorities. Private Bills resemble Public Bills in that most of the work is done before the Bill reaches Parliament. There are lengthy negotiations, conferences on disputes between the interested parties and every effort is made to 'settle' opposition before the Bill is presented in order to reduce the expenses to which parties are liable and in case of contested Bills they are enormous.

A Private Bill is presented in the form of a petition by the promoters and it is deposited in the Private Bill Office of the House of Commons. The promoters are not the members of Parliament, but outside persons or bodies acting through a firm of parliamentary agents. Thereafter the agents must appear before the Examiners²⁹ of Petitions for Private Bills and prove that they have observed the provisions of all the Standing Orders relative to giving notice to interested persons and the general public. The Examiners report to both the Houses simultaneously and if their report is favourable the Bills are presented in one or the other House within the dates prescribed by Standing Order, and read a first time.

The presentation and first reading of Private Bills are mere 'book entries', and the Members of Parliament will normally have nothing to do with them until they come up for Second Reading. The Second Reading is also likely to be entirely a formality, except in the rare cases where an important new principle is contained in the measure. The real hearing takes place at the Committee stages. Opposed Private Bills go to an ordinary Private Bill Committee—a Committee known as a "Private Bill" group, i.e., a Committee on a group of Private Bills. It consists of four members, chosen in the Lords by the House and in the House of Commons by the Committee of Selection. Members selected on the Committee must sign a declaration that they are not personally interested in the Bill before the Committee, and that their constituents are not locally affected by it.

29. The Examiners are permanent officials appointed jointly by the two Houses.

In Committee the semi-judicial nature of private legislation is seen at its plainest. A Committee on a Private Bill is to decide whether the Bill is justified at all; whether the promoters really need it; whether it is the only way of furthering their ends. The Committee must decide whether it is to the public advantage that the Bill should pass into law. Above all, it must also assess the claims of the opponents of the Bill who appear before them. Persons who are interested in the passage of a Private Bill support it before the Committee. Those who oppose it, marshal their objections. Both sides are represented by expensive legal lawyers, expert in this kind of work.

The Committee, then, makes a report which for practical purposes is its decision. This is normally accepted as a matter of course by the House. The Report and Third Reading stages are, therefore, with few exceptions, formalities. After Third Reading the Bill passes to the other House, and in due course, if no mishap occurs, becomes an Act.

Private Bills which are unopposed go to an unopposed Bill Committee consisting of five members plus the Counsel to Mr. Speaker. The proceedings of this Committee are brief and usually formal. The senior partner of the firm of parliamentary agents appears before the Committee, explains the general purpose of the Bill, produces the formal evidence, and accounts for any clauses of an unusual nature. In fact, most of the work is done in private conferences between the Speaker's Counsel and the parliamentary agents.

Provisional Order Bills. Instead of promoting a Private Bill, the Company or Local Authority may in some cases obtain an order from a Government Department allowing them to proceed. In all such cases the Department concerned holds a local inquiry, and if it is satisfied that the application is justified, issues the order and presents a Bill in Parliament to confirm the Provisional Order. Most of the work has, thus, been done before the Bill, which is called a Provisional Order Bill, reaches Parliament. Almost all Provisional Order Bills are unopposed as the Department is not likely to make an order to which Parliament would object. If there is opposition, the Bill goes to a Select Committee, but the chances of its being defeated are negligible.

Delegated Legislation. Delegated legislation is a term employed to describe the Statutory Instruments—Rules, Orders, and Regulations—issued by Government Departments to supplement, amplify and apply statutes passed by Parliament. We have seen how slow and complicated is the process of law making. This is in order that every detail of the Bill may be carefully examined by the representatives of the people, and British legislation is always lengthy and detailed.³⁰ Although the draftsmen of the Bill try to provide for all contingencies, but there is a limit to the details which the Bill can contain. And, then, the conditions vary and circumstances change. To meet those varying conditions and circumstances Parliament delegates through its statutes power to Ministers and their administrative assistants to make Orders and Regulations in their discretion, that is, to apply the provisions of the statutes to the situations they are intended to regulate. "Much of our social and economic legislation", L.S. Amery said, "covers so vast and detailed a field that no statute, however cumbrous—and many of them are already cumbrous and unintelligible enough—could possibly provide for all contingencies. Some power of ministerial variations or interpretations is obviously necessary, subject to the attention of Parliament being drawn to what is being done."³¹

30. Jennings, I., The Queen's Government, p. 92.

The main purpose for which powers are delegated by Parliament to the Executive are thus: (1) to allow the amendment of existing legislation in order to bring it up to date; (2) to create machinery to administer the Act; (3) or, most generally, to allow the Departments to decide details within the framework of legislation that consists only of broad principles. This often also involves, sub-delegation, whereby the Minister is empowered by the Act to delegate these powers to his Departmental officials, subject to his confirmation. In this way, two or three tiers of delegation can be involved in the granting of delegated power.

Delegated legislation, accordingly, means the function of sub-legislation by the Executive. It is legislation not by direct functioning of Parliament, but by powers conferred on the Executive by an Act of Parliament (or, more rarely, by Royal Prerogative). The Committee on Ministers' Power defined it "as the exercise of minor legislative power by subordinate authorities and bodies in pursuance of statutory authority given by the Parliament itself." It is not an original power of the Executive itself, but delegation of authority by Parliament and strictly subordinate to the terms of the Statute authorising delegation. It is, as such, termed delegated Legislation and sometimes subordinate Legislation. If it is inconsistent to the parent law, or is in excess of the power granted, it is void. Otherwise, it has the force of law and the law courts cannot interfere therein. What a supreme body delegates no other agency of Government can abrogate. Parliament, being sovereign, may delegate powers to whomever it wills and may similarly withdraw the powers that it has delegated. This is unlike the powers of the American Congress. Congress there is itself a delegated agency and the Constitution forbids a delegated agency to delegate any further on.

The power to legislate, when delegated, is normally confined to matters of detail bordering upon administration, but in case of sudden emergency power may be delegated to legislate on major matters. In 1931, the Gold Standard (Amendment) Act empowered the Treasury to legislate for the control of the Exchange. The National Economy Act empowered the King-in-Council to effect reductions, including cuts in salaries, in certain public services. The Foodstuffs (Prevention of Exploitation) Act authorised the Board of Trade, subject to annual resolution by either House of Parliament, to control supply price of certain foodstuffs.

Delegated Legislation is Inescapable. Professor Laski points out that "the habit of delegated legislation is not new."³² The Report of the Committee on Ministers' Powers³³ gives examples of delegation of legislative powers in the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. It existed even in the fourteenth century; a Statute ordered that "no wool should be exported until the King and his Council do otherwise provide." It delegated to the King-in-Council the specified power of deciding when to end the ban on exporting wool. But it is only during the last century and a half that the bulk of delegated legislation has enormously increased to meet the ever increasing needs of a modern State. For example, in 1890, 168 of such Instruments (till 1946 called Rules and Orders) were issued; in 1913, 444; in 1937, 1,500; and never less until in 1945, it rose to 1,706; it then fell from 1,166 in 1951 to 706 in 1952,³⁴ and now again it runs into four figures. The factors which are responsible for this over accelerated pace may be summarised as follows:

31. Amery, L.S., Thoughts on the Constitution, p. 50

1. So long as the functions of the State were limited and it existed mainly for maintaining internal order and external security, Parliament had few laws to make and, accordingly, it could provide conveniently the necessary legislation. Nowadays the province of the State has increased considerably and so have the activities of government. Schemes of social welfare and economic problems of a national and international character form the primary functions of the State. The provision of social services, like national health insurance, unemployment insurance, town and county planning, involve the making of detailed regulations to provide for individual benefits. The exercise of economic control involves the imposition of a variety of restrictions and positive duties. It is obvious that when we are using duties, quotas, bounties, licences and various other expedients as instruments of policy, some accurate, flexible and speedy means must be found to give effect to the policy of Parliament. And whenever it seemed clear to the House of Commons that it was a convenient way of operating a statute, it has never hesitated to grant such a power through the means of delegated legislation.

2. Moreover, Parliament no longer has the time, nor, indeed, the necessary data to enable it to produce the mass of detailed regulations which the present functions of government required. Delegated legislation relieves the pressure on Parliamentary time by removing details of administration from Acts of Parliament. Then, it enables Parliament to settle broad principles without entering into highly technical details. The Committee on Minister's Powers says, "Apart from the broad principles involved, technical matters are difficult to include in a Bill, since they cannot be effectively discussed in Parliament...." The National Insurance Act, 1946, contained 79 clauses and schedules, "but if it had not provided for ninety-nine sets of regulations, it would have contained at least three hundred clauses."³⁵ Delegated legislation has, thus, the merit of shortening Bills and consequently the time in considering them. "The province of Parliament", wrote Lord Thring,

32. Reflections on the Constitution, p. 43.

33. The Committee was appointed in 1929 under the Chairmanship of Lord Donoughmore. The Committee submitted its Report in 1932.

34. Finer, H., Governments of Greater European Powers, p. 133.

35. Molson, Hugh, Papers on Parliament, A Symposium, p. 97.

Parliamentary Counsel to the Treasury, in 1877, "is to decide material questions affecting the public interest, and the more procedural and subordinate matters can be withdrawn from their cognisance, the greater will be the time afforded for the consideration of more serious question involved in legislation." This is probably "the only mode in which Parliamentary government can with respect to its legislative functions be satisfactorily carried on."

3. Delegated legislation enables the Executive to provide for all unforeseen contingencies without having to return to Parliament for amending Acts or additional powers. The details can be regulated after a Bill passes into an Act with greater care and minuteness, and to better adaptation to local or other special circumstances. Besides, Statutory Instruments mitigate the inelasticity which would often otherwise make an Act unworkable. Even the smallest and most uncontroversial amendment of an Act requires the passage of another Act through all the parliamentary stages in both the Houses. It may also happen that no parliamentary time may be available to push the amending Bill through. This would frustrate the object of the original legislation. Delegated legislation, on the other hand, can rapidly be revised by the issue of another Statutory Instrument. Parliament has the same rights over such a changed Instrument as over the original.

4. Next, Delegated legislation is ideal in an emergency. It is the means by which the Executive can be armed with power to take immediate action and, indeed, without public discussion. The Economy Act of 1931, enabled the Government to effect economies they deemed necessary by Orders-in-Council. The Defence of the Realm Act, 1914, and the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939 and 1940 empowered the Government to do whatever it deemed necessary to meet the wartime emergencies. The Committee on Ministers' Powers while dealing with this aspect reported, "In a modern State there are many occasions when there is a sudden need for legislative action. For many such needs delegated legislation is the only convenient or even possible remedy."

5. Sir William Graham Harrison, First Parliamentary Counsel to the Treasury, assigned another reason in favour of delegated legislation. He says, "I should like also to emphasise a side of the question which appeals to me particularly as one who has drafted, not only a large number of statutes, but also a very large number of Statutory Rules and Orders, viz., the superiority in form which, as a result of the different circumstances and conditions under which they are respectively prepared and completed, delegated legislation has over statutes. In most cases the time available for drafting Bills is inadequate, and their final form when they have passed both Houses is generally unsatisfactory. On the other hand, statutory Rules can be prepared in comparative leisure and their subject matter can be arranged in a logical and intelligible shape uncontrolled by the exigencies of Parliamentary procedure and the necessity for that compression which every Minister (however much in debate he may use the draftsman as a whipping-boy) invariably requires in the case of a Bill."³⁶ Delegated legislation, thus, provides a speedy, convenient and accurate means of giving effect to the policy of Parliament and also to meet the ever-increasing need for speed in the governmental process.

36. Cited by Jennings in Parliament, pp. 457-58.

Dangers of delegated legislation. Delegated legislation is thus quite inescapable. But delegated legislation, its critics point out, is a clear threat to Parliamentary system of government as it offends the principle that legislation should be made in Parliament. If Parliament uses its unlimited legislative powers to delegate the power to another body, Parliamentary government itself is suspended. In Germany, this was, in fact, the method used by Hitler. Long before the collapse of France in 1940, the Government had been authorised to issue decrees by French Parliament which thereafter scarcely ever met. It means that Parliament abdicates its own proper functions to the Executive. Then, the ever-expanding scope of Government action has resulted into an inconceivable regulation of the citizens' life. "Bureaucrats tend to exalt administrative convenience and the national advantage at the expense of the individual and his freedom. The official in his zeal to achieve a desirable result may impose an unreasonable burden upon the subject. The power under a statute to make rules gives him just the opportunity that he wants." The Committee on the Ministers' Powers pointed out that delegated powers might be so wide as to deprive the citizens of protection by courts against action by the executive which is harsh or unreasonable. The courts can declare delegated legislation ultra vires only when the rule is against the delegation of power or when proper procedures have not been used. They cannot ensure that powers are exercised reasonably in the wide sense.

Some public anxiety at the practice of delegating legislative power was occasioned on the publication in 1928 of a vigorously written book, The New Despotism, by Lord Chief Justice Hewart. Lord Hewart claimed that the Old Despotism of Royal domination had been replaced by the New Despotism of Executive domination of Parliament, which was proving to be just as big a threat to Parliament's authority and to public liberties, with Parliament being used as a cloak for Executive Despotism. Similarly, W.A. Robson in his book, Justice and Administrative Law, emphasised the constitutional problems involved in these developments. Much of the concern of the critics was not over the delegation of powers to the Ministers, but was over the sub-delegation of powers to civil servants. The disquiet that was, thus, aroused led the Government in 1929 to set up a Committee under the Chairmanship of the Earl of Donoughmore to consider the powers exercised by or under the direction of (or by persons or bodies appointed by) Ministers of the Crown, and to report what safeguards were considered necessary. It was a distinguished Committee (The Committee on the Ministers' Powers) and its recommendations were of great importance. The Committee reported in 1932 and came to the conclusion that whether good or bad the development of the practice of delegated legislation was inevitable. The system of delegated legislation, the Committee concluded was "legitimate....for certain purposes, within certain limits, and under certain safeguards." Nothing was done to implement the recommendations of the Donoughmore Committee until the War, when the Select Committee on Statutory Instruments was set up in 1944.

In 1946, the Select Committee on Procedure criticised the existing machinery for Parliamentary scrutiny and in 1952 the Select Committee on Delegated Legislation made a more detailed analysis of the problem. The main criticisms that emerged from these post-war enquiries were that the Executive was assuming the legislative role of Parliament to an extent that endangered liberty, and that many of the powers that were delegated to Ministers were too loosely defined. It was pointed out that prior consultation with those affected by delegated legislation was not always possible, and that the protection of the courts was denied by many of the regulations.

The post-war period also witnessed a further spate of literature, for example, Christopher Hollis's Can Parliament Survive? and G.W. Keeton's The Passing of Parliament, which criticised the effect of delegated legislation in increasing Parliament's subservience to the Executive. In recent years, however, concern over the question of delegated legislation has been less marked.

Safeguards against abuse of power. Dangers of delegated legislation are not inherent in it. With proper safeguards they can be avoided. The first safeguard is provided by the process of consultation that takes place with affected parties before a Bill is introduced in Parliament. Thus, some of those parties who are to be affected by legislative powers that are to be delegated to the Executive are able to comment upon, and perhaps influence the contents of the parent statute. But the real safeguard against the abuse of power to legislate must be sought in Parliamentary control. Herbert Morrison has said, "The principle of delegated legislation is, I think, right, but I must emphasize that it is well for Parliament to keep a watchful and even jealous eye on it at all stages."³⁷

Thus, Parliamentary scrutiny of the actual granting of delegated powers remains the most important safeguard. The existing methods of scrutiny are based primarily on the Statutory Instrument Act, 1946. The Act clarified and modified the existing method of control. The term 'Statutory Instrument' was used to describe the documents that grant delegated powers (replacing the multiplicity of Rules and Orders that had existed before), and the Select Committee that had been set up in 1944 to scrutinize the process of delegated legislation, was put on a permanent basis as the Statutory Instruments Committee. Now the methods of Parliamentary control rest partly on the activities of the Statutory Instrument Committee and partly on the initiative of individual Members of Parliament.

All Statutory Instruments are published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office and are placed on general sale for the information and use of the public. They are formally presented to Parliament, with copies being sent to the Speaker and the Lord Chancellor, and to all Members of Parliament who ask for them. A Member of Parliament can take action according to the prescribed procedure. There are three distinct procedures which can be used for the presentation of Statutory Instrument, the parent Act defining the procedure to be adopted. The first is, simply to present the Statutory Instruments to both Houses of Parliament. They become operative immediately after presentation to Parliament. Neither of the Houses has the power to annul them. Nor any positive acceptance of the Instrument is necessary. It is only a method of publicity and generally it is used for minor matters. This method, accordingly, affords little chance of Parliamentary control.³⁸

37. Morrison, Lord, Government and Parliament, p. 151.

The second procedure is for the Statutory Instrument to be laid before both Houses for a period of forty days. Under this procedure no Statutory Instrument can come into operation until it has been approved by the affirmative resolution of both Houses. The third and the most used procedure is for the Statutory Instrument to be laid before both Houses for a period of forty days and the Instrument is operative until, or unless, it is annulled by a prayer for Annulment in either House in this period. It may, however, be noted that an Instrument can be annulled, but it cannot be amended. The difference between the second and third procedure is obvious. According to the second procedure the Instrument does not become operative unless the Government takes the initiative and secures by a resolution of both Houses its positive approval. According to the third procedure, the Instrument becomes automatically operative unless there is successful move to stop it.

The second safeguard is the process of scrutiny. The Committee on Ministers' Powers recommended "the appointment of a small Standing Committee of each House to consider and report on Bills conferring law-making powers and on regulations and rules made in pursuance of such powers and laid before Parliament." In 1944, a Select Committee on Statutory Instruments—known as the Scrutiny Committee—was established and its existence is renewed each session. The Committee consists of eleven members based on party composition in the Commons, with the Chairman coming from the Opposition. The function of the Select Committee is to consider every Statutory Instrument or draft of an Instrument laid before the House and draw the attention of the House to provisions (1) that it imposes a charge on the public revenues; (2) that it is made under an enactment which excludes challenge in the law courts; (3) that it appears to make some unusual or unexpected use of the powers conferred by statute; (4) that it has been withheld from publication by unjustifiable delay; (5) that it calls for elucidation of their form or substance.

In the House of Lords the Special Orders Committee examines orders which require an affirmative Resolution of the House or an Address to the Queen before becoming effective or continuing in force. The Committee does not report on the expediency of an order but reports its opinion as to whether the order raises important questions of policy or principle and how far the order is founded on precedent; it also advises the House whether the order can be passed without special attention, or whether there ought to be a further enquiry before the House proceeds to a decision.

The Select Committee on Statutory Instruments is reputed to spend much time on sifting in the Instruments which need be brought before the House; Counsel of the Speaker of the Commons assists it with advice, summons civil servants for explanation what it cannot understand, and finally reports to the House within the time limit for action. From 1944 to the end of 1954, 19,400 instruments were made and out of these 10,250 had to come before Parliament. The Select Committee scrutinised 7,000 and drew the attention of the House to 93 of them. In other words, as Dr. Finer says, "over eight years, about 1,380 public instruments per year were made; about 900 a year were scrutinised; and an average of 11 per year were brought to the attention of the House."³⁹

38. Punnett, R.M., British Government and Politics, p. 322.

It follows from the supremacy of Parliament that no Court of Law can question the validity of a statute. But the same does not apply to Statutory Instruments. They are only valid if they comply in substance and in form with the provisions of the parent Acts. It must, however, be emphasised that the courts cannot consider the wisdom or otherwise of a Statutory Instrument. "If it is bureaucratic, vexatious, embarrassing and harassing to the subject it is for Parliament to take a decision and object in whatever way is appropriate."⁴⁰

Moreover, powers are delegated to the Queen in Council or to authorities directly responsible to Parliament, i.e., to Ministers of the Crown, to Government Departments for which Ministers are responsible, or to organisations whose legislation is subject to confirmation or approval by Ministers who thereby become responsible to Parliament for it. Certain Acts also require direct consultation with organisations which will be effected by delegated legislation before such legislation is made.

Laski maintained that "the protest against the growth of delegated legislation collapses as soon as it is submitted to serious scrutiny."⁴¹ The existing safeguards offer Parliament, the Courts, and the public the chance to keep delegated legislation in its proper place. No administration, much like the one in Britain can remain oblivious of the reactions of Parliament and pressure groups when it is formulating regulations. In fact, there is always some form of prior consultation between a Department exercising legislative powers and the interests most likely to be affected, although it is not a formal obligation. Nonetheless, here, too, as it is in so many other activities of Government, the price of liberty is eternal vigilance. It is wise to delegate power of legislation but "Parliament must ensure that the powers given to Ministers are not abused and the law courts must retain their power to see that they are not exceeded." There is, however, one missing element in the whole scheme of parliamentary control. When a proposed Instrument is debated in the House it has no power to amend it. It can only pass or reject it as a whole. The House, accordingly, has to accept the part, that is objected to, in order that the rest, which it approves, may be passed.

FINANCIAL FUNCTIONS

Money Bills. "Who holds the purse holds the power", wrote Madison in the Federalist. It was through the control of the nation's purse

39. Governments of Greater European Powers, p. 134.

40. Papers on Parliament, A Symposium, op. cit., p. 107.

41. Parliamentary Government in England, p. 350.

that the House of Commons rose to supremacy. Hence it is no matter of surprise that Money Bills should occupy a large portion of time that the House devotes to its work. The enactment of Money Bills is somewhat different from that of others. In the first place, they must originate in the House of Commons and in the Committee of the Whole. The House of Commons cannot vote money for any purpose nor impose a tax except at the demand and responsibility of the Crown, which in effect means the Cabinet. The Government, thus, has complete and undivided power of initiative in financial matters. Likewise, the power of the House of Commons is complete and decisive. The Parliament Act of 1911 prescribes that a Money Bill passed by the House of Commons and sent to the House of Lords one month before the ending of session, may be submitted to the Royal Assent and become law after one month whether passed by the House of Lords or not. The role of the House of Lords in matters of Money Bills is, accordingly, formal.

The Budget. The principal financial function performed from year to year is the preparation, consideration, and authorization of the Budget. "Budget" is an old word meaning a bag containing pages or accounts. The use of the word in public finance originated in the expression "The Chancellor of the Exchequer opened his Budget," which was applied in Parliament to the annual speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer explaining his proposals for balancing revenue and expenditure.

The Budget speech is the main occasion of the year for reviewing the Exchequer finances and the economic state of the nation, and its formal basis is the Chancellor's proposals for raising money by taxation. Viewed in simple outline, it involves, on the one hand, estimates of annual financial expenditure and, on the other, a calculation of anticipated revenue. The formal action by Parliament that renders legal the expenditure of public money takes the form of an Act of Parliament. Such an Act authorises the payment of money out of the Consolidated Fund. Consolidated Fund is a great reservoir into which all the revenues of the Kingdom are poured and out of which all the money required for public expenditure is drawn. Consolidated Fund has no physical existence. It is just an account lodged with the Bank of England and money is paid out from it when authorised by Acts of Parliament. The principal Act of this kind is the Annual Appropriation Act.

The Consolidated Fund is replenished through moneys paid into it by authority of Act of Parliament which gives legal validity to the raising of revenues. The principal Act in this respect is the Annual Finance Act. Annual Budget prepares a way for the passage of Appropriation Act and Finance Act.

The financial year begins on April first. The estimates for the coming financial year are presented to the House of Commons somewhere in the second or third week of February. A little later the Chancellor of the Exchequer makes his Budget Speech reviewing the finances of the past year and detailing the financial programme of the current year, particularly as regards new taxes, or increased taxes, or reduced taxes. The estimates are discussed in the Committee of the Whole on Supply. This Committee, like the Committee of Ways and Means, meets under the Chairman of Ways and Means, or his Deputy, in place of the Speaker.

The procedure is more informal than in a sitting of the House. Motions do not have to be seconded, debate cannot be cut off by Closure rules and members may speak any number of times.

The estimates are presented in sections and each section is taken up in "votes" or groups of items. The number of days allotted to consideration of the annual estimates are fixed at twenty-six, all of which must be taken before August 5. The debates in Supply on the Estimates are very seldom devoted to properly financial matters. They are almost invariably general debates on the policy of the Government to the services provided for. This gives an opportunity to the Ministers to explain and defend their proposals and to the Opposition an opportunity to air their grievances or to criticise the general policy of the Government. The Members may propose to strike out or reduce any item of expenditure, but they have no right to add or increase any amount. The debates must be concluded within the allotted time. When the estimates have all been debated, the whole is then embodied in an Appropriation Bill and put through the usual stages and passed by the House.

But the Appropriation Bill is not passed until July or August. It follows that money must be provided for the Government between April 1, and the passing of the annual Appropriation Act. So the Departments draw up provisional estimates of the money they are likely to require during those four months. These estimates are presented to Parliament as a Vote on Account and considered as expeditiously as possible. In the case of Service Departments—Army, Navy and Air Force—no Vote on Account is usually necessary. The item 'Pay, etc., of officers and Men' is brought up, and debated which is invariably passed before the beginning of the financial year. Unlike the Civil Departments, Service Departments may use for one purpose money voted for another. It must, however, be remembered that the Committee of Supply sanctions all expenditure of public money which is not (a) otherwise sanctioned by an Act of the same session, or (b) paid directly out of the Consolidated Fund.⁴²

The Committee of Ways and Means has two functions to perform. In the first place, before any money voted in the Committee of Supply can be withdrawn from the Consolidated Fund, it must be authorised by a resolution of the Committee of Ways and Means. But the second and more important function of the Committee of Ways and Means is the raising of revenues. Revenue, like expenditure, is partly raised under statutes that continue until repealed, partly under the authority of annual statutes. The bulk of the revenue is raised by the former method. Proposals are taken up in groups or sections and approved by the Committee in the form of resolutions. The rules prevent private members from moving any increase in the taxes or imposition of any new tax. Their action is only restricted to approving, striking out, or lowering the taxes proposed by the Government. After the Committee of Ways and Means has voted all the revenue proposals, its resolutions are embodied in annual Finance Bill, just as the resolutions of the Committee of Supply are embodied in the Appropriation Bill. The Finance Bill is, then, introduced and put through the different stages prescribed for an ordinary public Bill. After passing through the Commons, the Finance Bill goes to the House of Lords where it is subject to the provisions of the Parliament Act, 1911.⁴³

42. Certain high officials are paid out of the Consolidated Fund, e.g., Judges, the Speaker, the Comptroller and Auditor-General. This means that their salary has not to be voted annually. They are supposed to be above political considerations. Interest on the National Debt is also paid directly out of the Consolidated Fund, and it is by far the largest of the amounts so paid.

CONTROLLING THE EXECUTIVE

A third great function of the House of Commons is that of controlling the executive. The responsibility of the Ministry to the House of Commons, a primary characteristic of the British system of Government, involves a constant control of the House over the Government. Indeed, control and responsibility go naturally hand in hand. Since responsibility of Government means its resignation from office whenever the policy of Government proves fundamentally unacceptable to the House of Commons, "an obligation rests upon the House of Commons to exercise a day-to-day control over the Ministry in such a way that fundamental disagreement between the executive and the representatives of the people will be clear and manifest." If the actual and possible mistakes of government were not apparent, the Government might become irresponsible. Control by the House of Commons prevents this. It tends to keep the Ministers constantly conscious of the fact that they will be called upon to give an account of what they do. "A Government," says Laski, "that is compelled to explain itself under cross-examination will do its best to avoid the grounds of complaint. Nothing makes responsible government so sure."⁴⁴

The House of Commons maintains its control in two ways. The first is the constant demand in the House for information about the actions of Government; the second is the criticism that is constantly aimed at the Government in the House. These two methods are closely related to each other and take various forms.

The most effective instrument by which the House of Commons seeks information from the executive is the oral or written question. "Parliamentary Government," asserts Laski, "lives and dies by the publicity it can secure not only on governmental operations, but on all the knowledge it can obtain on the working of social processes."⁴⁵ Any member of the House of Commons may, by following prescribed regulations, direct questions at Ministers and for four days in a week, at the beginning of the sitting of the House, Ministers devote almost an hour to answering questions which have been put to them. An average of 15,000 questions are asked every year. Except for "Private Notice" questions, which are questions of an urgent character of which the normal advance notice is not given, two days' notice of a question is normally required. Questions may be answered orally or in writing. A member cannot put down more than three questions for oral answer on any one day. Supplementary questions arising out of the original answer may be allowed at the discretion of the Speaker. Questions either seek for information or press for action. The person to whom they are addressed must be officially responsible for the subject-matter of the question. They may deal with the grievances of individual citizens or with great issues of public policy.

43. See ante.

44. Laski, H.J., Parliamentary Government in England, p. 149.

45. Ibid., p. 159.

The device of asking questions has important results. In the first place, it brings the work of the various Departments of Government under the public scrutiny. This fact makes all concerned with the working of the machinery of Government realise that their efficiency and honesty are being regularly tested. Secondly, it mitigates the danger of bureaucratic habits, because "men who have to answer day by day for their decisions will tend so to act that they can give account of themselves." Finally, it is the most effective check on the day-to-day administration. Questions, in brief, bring to light the activities of Government and subject Government to the public scrutiny, and this is according to Finer, "the fundamentally characteristic British way of keeping the Cabinet painfully sensitive to public opinion."⁴⁶

The House of Commons is also a debating assembly. "A society that is able to discuss," writes Laski, "does not need to fight, and the greater the capacity to maintain interest in discussion, the less danger there is of an inability to effect the compromises that maintain social peace."⁴⁷ If the original meaning of the word Parliament is not used opprobriously, it is really a place where people talk about the affairs of the nation. This is done when laws are made and policy of the Government is under review. The most important function of His Majesty's Opposition is to criticise matters of administration and policy making and, thereby, make the Government to defend its intentions and its practices. The best opportunity for the Opposition to criticise governmental policy as a whole is when it debates the reply to the King's "Gracious Speech". At the beginning of each Session of Parliament, the Government's legislative programme is announced in the King's or Queen's Speech—known as Speech from the Throne. An address in reply to the Speech from the Throne is moved and seconded and followed by a debate, usually lasting six days, on the policy of the Government as outlined in the Speech and on amendments from the Opposition regretting that the Speech contained no reference to some matter, or was in some other way unsatisfactory. Then, discussion of public finance, more especially of proposals for expenditure, offers a very real opportunity for discussion and criticism. If the Opposition disapproves the Government's foreign policy, it uses the debate on appropriations for the Foreign Office as an occasion for criticism. Indeed, the House of Commons devotes to criticism of the Government the whole time allotted to the examination of the estimates.

The normal occasion for criticism of the Executive is, of course, a debate on a motion for adjournment. A Member may, during a sitting, between the time when all questions have been answered and the time for the beginning of the public business, move the adjournment of the

46. Governments of Greater European Powers, p. 162.

47. Parliamentary Government in England, p. 149.

House for discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance. If the motion is supported by forty members and the Speaker has agreed that the matter is definite and urgent, the sitting is suspended until evening when a full debate on the issue is held. What is important to note is that even a Government which commands an overwhelming majority in the House of Commons cannot prevent the ventilation of an important grievance. Even the weakest Opposition can conveniently command the support of at least forty votes and once the Speaker, who is an impartial and non-party man, recognises the urgency of the matter, the debate is assured. "Such motions are accepted," says Finer, "roughly only twice a year. Yet the possibility of instantaneous arraignment keeps the Government alive to opinion in the House of Commons and efficient and lawful relationships with the millions who are under its democratic power."⁴⁸ What has been called the "Half-hour" adjournment debate takes place at the end of each day's regular business. A Member may raise a matter of which he has given informal notice, but which does not involve new legislation. A short reply from the Government follows. This enables a grievance to be ventilated without a formal motion and without a vote. Immediately before Parliament adjourns for recess there are a series of general debates similar in character to the regular "Half-hour adjournment debates." In addition to these, the most extreme form of Opposition attack on Government policy is the vote of censure which is tantamount to expressing lack of confidence in the Ministry. Such a motion is really a crucial occasion in the life of a Government, because it decides its fate. So long as a Government can command a comfortable majority, it is not possible for such a motion to get through. But still it creates embarrassments in the ranks of the Ministry and shakes its prestige.

The Commons, therefore, spearheaded by the Opposition, possess adequate and effective opportunities for controlling the Government. And such a control is more urgent today than before, for the functions of the Government are so extensive now that they touch the very bones of individual lives. "The Government departments", aptly remarks Finer, "are virtually forty great monopolies; they need a strong force outside them to shake them up,"⁴⁹ and this the Opposition does on so many counts. It is Her Majesty's Opposition, now statutorily recognised. It has its own leader, who is "the obverse of the leader of the House,"⁵⁰ with its own 'shadow Cabinet'. Her Majesty's Opposition is prospective government. According to Tierney, the duty of Her Majesty's Opposition is "to propose nothing, to oppose everything and to turn out the Government."

DECLINE OF PARLIAMENT

Work of Parliament Evaluated. According to Ramsay Muir the growth of Cabinet dictatorship "has, to a remarkable extent, diminished the power and prestige of Parliament, robbed its proceedings of significance, made it appear that Parliament exists mainly for the purpose of maintaining or of somewhat ineffectually criticising an all good but omnipotent Cabinet and transferred the main discussion of political issues from Parliament to platform and the members." Parliament, in brief, its critics maintain, has merely become an instrument in the hands of the Government and it simply endorses its decisions so long as it can command its majority. It has no will or initiative of its own. Members are lost in oblivion. Many reasons are advanced for a decline in the power and prestige of Parliament.

48. Governments of the Greater European Powers, p. 162.

49. Ibid., p. 132.

50. Jennings, I., Parliament, p. 74.

For the last fifty years or so, the critics maintain, there had been an inconceivable growth of the power of the Party Whips and the Party machines over the individual Members of Parliament. The result is that there is neither freedom nor spontaneity in speech and vote to the Back-Benchers who belong to a party. Take, for example, the Labour Party. The Parliamentary Labour Party works under a set of rules which regulate the conduct of its members. A Labour Party candidate is required to pledge in writing that he would scrupulously observe the rules of the Party and one of which lays down that a Labour Member of Parliament may not vote in a sense different from that determined by the Party. This is not objectionable, it is contended, if the whole Party were to meet to determine the course of voting. But the Party meets only once a week for an hour or so, "and plainly cannot deal with more than a fraction of the business which will come before Parliament in the following week."⁵¹ It, therefore, in practice means that a Labour Member of Parliament must vote according to the behest of the Party Leaders who decide the issues and whose orders the Party Whips obey. There is all the difference in the world between voluntary general co-operation in pursuit of agreed political ends and a dull mechanical discipline which reduces Members of Parliament to the level of robots. This is, in fact, "robotizing" of politics.

A hundred years or so ago, the number of electors in any constituency was very small. It did not require a highly organised political machine to establish contact between the candidate and his electors. The candidate could keep and, in fact, he did keep personal contacts. But a typical constituency today possesses sixty or seventy thousand electors, and it is, for all practical purposes, impossible for a candidate to keep the old bonds of personal contact. He must, accordingly, if he is to fight with any prospect of success, need the support of a powerful local and national political machine. And the machine gives its support on its own terms. The terms are that the member should, if elected, do as he is told and he is told to religiously follow the Party Whip. Almost every vote taken in both the Houses of Parliament is governed by a strict system of Party discipline. Any one recalcitrant in duty towards the Party to which he belongs is to pay a heavy price of expulsion and that is the end of his political career. This is not, the critics say, the way of democracy and more so Parliamentary democracy.

The Party discipline has certain obvious advantages. But its results are too obvious. It helps to determine the Party policy in the "back room of the party caucuses, imposed by this disciplinary set-up on the House of Commons, and by the House on the country. In principle, policy should spring from popular need, be freely ventilated in Parliament, and then express itself in Government action." Secondly, it makes for irresponsibility in Government; "if a government knows that sane or silly, right or wrong, drunk or sober, it can force its proposal through the House by virtue of this disciplinary set-up, it is under a lessened necessity to exercise its powers with the maximum of care and responsibility. This makes for slack, careless, and bad government." Finally, rigid Party discipline makes Members of Parliament cowards and subservients as they lose honesty, courage and independence. It is practically unheard for a Member to vote against his Party. On a small number of questions of no political significance, when government "takes off the whips" that the Members vote according to their personal convictions.

51. Brown, W.J., Guide to Parliament, p. 162.

Next, the reforms in the procedure of the House of Commons, too, have considerably diminished the importance of the Private Member and the authority of the Government has correspondingly increased. The timetable for Bills, the guillotine, the selection of amendments and other devices which aim to cut short debate are, undoubtedly, a requirement of efficient legislative procedure. But they reduce to the minimum the influence of Members. The legislative initiative has gone from the Private Member and it belongs to the Departments under the direction of the Cabinet "which together have become in practice the first Chamber in our law-making mechanism."⁵² This is partly due to the technicality of modern legislation which ordinary Members of Parliament are quite incompetent to understand. It is reported that only two Members understood the Local Government Bill of 1928, and one of them was the Minister who presented the Bill and who had been very minutely instructed by the civil servants who drew it up.⁵³ The result is that the Parliamentary process becomes a dull, meaningless and routine affair. The actual work is done by the permanent civil servants and legislation, the general feeling is, becomes their concern.

Another result of the technicality of modern legislation is that legislative powers are freely delegated by Parliament without the Members of the two Houses fully realizing what is being done. Orders made in pursuance of these powers have, it is true, generally to be submitted to Parliamentary scrutiny, but "their quantity and complexity are such that it is no longer possible to rely for such scrutiny on the vigilance of private members acting as individuals." It was argued before the Donoughmore Committee, and the critics of delegated legislation still argue, that the real danger lies in the volume and character of delegated legislation; that the delegation of legislative power has passed all reasonable limits and assumed the character of a serious invasion on the sphere of Parliament by the Executive; and that no standardization of practice or use of procedural devices can alter the fact that delegated legislation essentially threatens the Sovereignty of Parliament and the Rule of Law.

The control of public finance, the critics further maintain, is the prerogative of the House of Commons. But of all the functions of the 52. Greaves, H.R.G., The British Constitution, p. 31.

53. One was Neville Chamberlain, the Minister of Health, and the other was Sidney Web, who had made a detailed academic study of grants-in-aid. Refer to W.I. Jennings, Parliament Must be Reformed, p. 43.

House of Commons this is the least efficiently performed. "When it deals with legislation, if it does not initiate, it does at least substantially after the Bill submitted to it, and often makes a mess of them. When it deals with the general policy of the Cabinet... its debates even if not leading up to any definite resolution or decision, exercise a very important influence. But when it deals with the all-important subject its own special subject, or finance, it seems to be almost impotent.⁵⁴ The initiative in financial matters, as in other fields of policy, is taken by the Cabinet, and Parliament may only criticise and attempt to alter what is proposed by the Government. The Ministerial majority in the House of Commons ensures to sustain the Cabinet's financial programme and to vote down threat of any kind from the Opposition. Then, Parliament has little time to delve deep into the Government's financial proposals. The twenty-six days of debate allotted to the estimates allow only a superficial examination of most of them. The result is that the debate is centred on policy issues rather than on financial aspect involved in the Budget.

The Select Committee on Estimates was set up in order to have a more searching examination of the estimates, and to suggest, if any, economies consistent with the policy implied in those Estimates. But the Committee has so far only had a limited success. Although the Committee is even working through Sub-Committees, yet it cannot consider all the Departmental Estimates every year; it therefore chooses for examination those Estimates which, for one reason or another, have aroused some special interest or concern. The work of the Public Accounts Committee is restricted. All that the nation can be sure of is that money which has been voted for a particular item has been spent on that item. But it cannot be sure that it has been spent properly on that item. There is another direction in which the finance of the country has escaped almost entirely from the control of Parliament and that is with regard to the National Debt. A very large part of the revenues of the State goes to pay interest on the National Debt and it is paid directly out of the Consolidated Fund under permanent legislation and needs no annual sanction from Parliament. It is true that since it is paid under legislation, and Parliament being the legislature, it must have determined that it should be so. "But it must be remembered that huge loans raised in time of national emergency and coming eventually to swell the National Debt to fantastic figures are rushed through Parliament on the strength of that national emergency, which results in a general mitigation of scrutiny; and also that the cumulative effect of several Acts of Parliament, and of many transactions performed under Acts of Parliament, may be very different from what a Parliament would be justified in sanctioning if it had to vote the money annually."⁵⁵ Inevitably, as expenditure increases and borrowing too increases, the opportunities for real financial scrutiny diminish and the control of the House of Commons becomes less effective.

Criticism Met. But the "Years during which procedure was being worked out," says Lord Kennet, "were the years of struggle between the legislature on one hand and the Crown on the other. The chief care of the Commons was at first to prevent the Crown from getting money except through Parliament, and in later years to prevent it from spending money on purposes other than those for which Parliament had provided it. Their procedure was planned to act as a check on the Crown in the interests of themselves, the economizers. But times have changed. The rule of Parliament is established, and the power of the Crown is gone. A check upon the Executive's power over the purse is still needed by the Commons as much as ever, but the Executive upon whose power the check has to be exercised is now not the Crown but its Ministers responsible to Parliament. Procedure planned to check the Crown is out of date.⁵⁶ For that purpose it is certainly out of date. And yet it is essentially desirable if the financial procedure could be made an effective control of national finance. The procedure, as it stands, is still extremely useful. "It provides the cue on the soundest constitutional basis—that redress of grievances should precede supply of money—for debates which must take place, and which need a motion of sufficient gravity to register the feeling of the House, without tying the hands of the Executive."⁵⁷ Instead of trying to pit its judgment against the experts responsible for working out the details of estimates and expenditure, the House of Commons very wisely concentrates on the political aspects of the government proposals, which are singled out by the Opposition. The functions of the Commons are, in fact, one aspect of their control over the general policy of the Government. The Government cannot behave in a completely arbitrary fashion. It must take account of the political situation and public opinion.

54. Muir, R., How Britain is Governed, p. 221.

55. Taylor, E., The House of Commons at Work, pp 222-23.

There are various devices which help Parliament to keep proper scrutiny of expenditure. There is the Treasury to control expenditure and it derives its power from the responsibility to Parliament of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the financial policy of the Government. Control over issues of money to Departments and the audit of accounts is exercised by the Comptroller and Auditor-General, who holds a permanent appointment with the status of an officer of the House of Commons. As Comptroller of the Exchequer, he controls receipts and issues of public money to and from the Exchequer Account, and as Auditor-General he audits Departmental accounts and submits his report on the Appropriation Accounts and other accounts, as required by law, to Parliament. His statutory function is to ensure that all expenditure is properly incurred. In addition, he has been encouraged by successive Committees of Public Accounts to examine Departmental expenditure with a view to drawing attention to any cases of apparent waste or extravagance.

The accounts of each Department and the reports on the accounts made by the Comptroller and Auditor-General are considered by a Select Committee called the Public Accounts Committee. The business of the Committee is to ensure that expenditure is properly incurred in accordance with the purpose for which it was voted and within relevant Act of Parliament. It is a powerful instrument for the exposure of waste and inefficiency. The Estimates Committee is another Select Committee and its functions are to examine the Estimates, to report, how if at all, the policy applied in the Estimates can be carried out more economically and to consider the principal variations between the Estimates of the current year and those of the previous year and the form in which estimates should be presented.

56. Young, E.H., The Finance of Government (1936), p. 42.

57. Taylor, E., The House of Commons at Work, p. 225.

It is true that the Public Accounts Committee and the Estimates Committee can only partially remedy the present incomplete supervision of national finance, but it must be conceded that the Government Departments are really nervous of these Committees. Lord Morrison illustrates it from a personal experience. He had an argument with his Permanent Secretary of the Home Office, Sir Alexander Maxwell, when he was keen on spending a little money for a public purpose. Sir Alexander Maxwell told Lord Morrison that it would be ultra vires of law as he had no power to spend money on that particular subject. Morrison argued that he had the power and did not agree with his Permanent Secretary. Therefore, Sir Alexander Maxwell replied, "Secretary of State, the matter could become serious. I may be called before the Public Accounts Committee", and the Committee might ask me why did I allow it when it was ultra vires? Am I then to say that I advised the Secretary of State that he could not, but he insisted on spending it. Whereupon Home Secretary you will be in an awful trouble in the House." Morrison had to yield. Summing up, Morrison says, "This is one of those devices whereby a Minister who is trying to do something that in strict law he is not entitled to, even the Civil Service can pull him up, which is a good thing."⁵⁸

"It is fashionable now-a-days," writes Prof. Laski, "for critics of the present position to lament almost with tears over the decline of his (Private Member) status." But, "the lament," he says, "is wholly misconceived. It mistakes the functions the modern House of Commons has to perform; it mistakes the purposes of parties in the modern State; it is an anachronistic legacy of a dead period in our history when politics was a gentleman's amusement, and the sphere of governmental activity was so small that an atomistic House of Commons was possible. The only way to restore to the Private Member the kind of position he occupied eighty or even fifty years ago, is to go back to the historic conditions which made that position possible. History does not permit us to indulge in such luxuries."⁵⁹ The old days of laissez-faire do not exist any longer. Every Government introduces proposals for legislation which Gladstone and Disraeli alike would have described as "socialistic" and which would have shocked Cobden or Peel.⁶⁰ The immensely greater area of functions with which the modern Government has to deal, and the growing centralization of economic power necessitate that the legislation, if it can be real, co-ordinated and integrated legislation, must become Government legislation. It cannot be left to the uncoordinated action and vagaries of Private Members. This is not all. The problem of modern Government is a problem of time and this is, according to Laski, the basic reason why the initiative in legislation has passed from the Private Member.

58. Morrison, Lord, British Parliamentary Democracy, pp. 88-89.

59. Laski, H.J., Parliamentary Government in England, pp. 165-66.

60. Jennings, I., Parliament Must be Reformed, p. 40.

Saving of time, as it is generally demanded, to consider the increased volume of legislation is much more difficult to effect. The frequent attempts made by the Select Committee on Procedure, consisting of experienced Parliamentarians, to find a solution suggest that there is likelihood now of anything except slight changes. The Select Committee on Procedure of 1958 approved in general only those suggestions which involved fuller use of Committees, reduction in the volume of oral questions, and greater opportunities for Backbenchers to speak in debates. These suggestions were debated in the House of Commons in July 1959, and February 1960, but for variety of reasons few changes were made. "The House of Commons generally speaking shows a strong determination to keep most stages of its business in the hands of the House as a whole", and it is due to the innate conservatism of the parties over parliamentary procedure.⁶¹

But the Private Member, in spite of his loss in the legislative function, has still many important functions to perform. The ventilation of grievances, the extraction of information, the criticism of administration, and initiation of debate still remain with him and he can make a great contribution in representing the direction of public opinion. He can also serve on Committees of enquiry. If Parliament needs to be reformed⁶² and Private Member to get a due place, then, as Laski suggests, let it be done "without treading upon the essential right of Government to initiate legislation." The function of legislation is not the only function of Parliament. Its real function is to watch the process of administration to safeguard the liberties of private citizens. "In the proper scrutiny of delegated legislation, in the improvement by analysis, by criticism, by suggestion, of departmental work, in the enlargement of the place of the Select Committee of enquiry, in our system, there is a wide range of service awaiting the private member of which we do not, in the present organisation of the House, take anything like full advantage."⁶³

It does not, however, mean that such an enlargement of Private Member's functions should in any way interfere with the Cabinet's control of Parliamentary activity. If it is to amount to an interference of the Cabinet's control, "coherence of policy would at once be lost and with it the ability to place responsibility." The real success of the British system of Government, in the opinion of Prof. Laski "lies precisely in the exact allocation of responsibility that it makes possible."⁶⁴

Nor does it amount to the dictatorship of the Cabinet or domination by the permanent Civil Servants. The chief task of the House of Commons is to maintain a Government. For this there must be a coherent majority in agreement with the general policy of the Cabinet, "willing to entrust it with vital decisions, looking to it for leadership, and broadly having confidence in the persons who compose it."⁶⁵ It is 61. Brasher, N.H., Studies in British Government, pp. 81-82.

62. Jennings, I., Parliament Must be Reformed, p. 40.

63. Laski, H.J., Parliamentary Government in England, p. 167.

64. Ibid.

65. Greaves, H.R.G., The British Constitution, p. 44.

now admitted on all sides that administration is at the centre of the modern State. A vast sphere of the activities of government are beyond the control of Parliament. Administrative discretion must, accordingly, exist and decisions rest with the Minister. At the same time, the Cabinet is a Government by consent. It has to conduct its operations in full publicity. It is subject to constant criticism, both within and without Parliament, and sometimes the criticism is devastating. Its main problem, therefore, is to maintain the loyalty of its supporters despite the impact of this criticism upon them. It means that the Cabinet must diligently follow the flow of public opinion and always remember the next General Elections.

The Government is, accordingly, at all times alive to the fact that in the making of every policy there are limits beyond which it must not go. "Maintaining a majority is never a simple and straightforward matter; the discipline of followers is not the obedience of private soldiers to their commanders. There enter into its making a host of subtle psychological considerations the accurate measurement of which is vital to the Cabinet's life." MacDonald had to give way on the Unemployment Assistance Regulations in 1934. Baldwin had a thumping majority, but he had to sacrifice Sir Samuel Hoare in the Abyssinian crisis of 1935. Similarly, Chamberlain had to yield on his National Defence Contribution of 1937. An unpopular policy always creates the fear that it may lead to defeat at the next General Elections, and Members are unwilling to serve under a Government which does not recognise that it is leading them to a defeat. Had Baldwin refused to withdraw the Cabinet's proposals on Abyssinia, it is evident that a large majority of his followers in Parliament would have voted against him with the obvious result that either he would have resigned or would have asked the King for dissolution. Let us, then, conclude with Laski that it is "dangerous to run the House on too tight a reign. Excessive secrecy, grave discourtesy, continuous threat of resignation or dissolution, inability to quell an angry public opinion outside, always breed revolt. A Cabinet maintains control in the degree that it is successful in not going too far beyond what the House approves. It must know when to yield; and it is important to yield gracefully. A Cabinet that tries to carry off its policy with too high a hand is almost always riding for a fall."⁶⁶

There is, as Lord Morrison says, "balance of power" between the Government and the House and that is the essence of British Parliamentary democracy. The Government in introducing its legislation or administering its policy always tries to be reasonable, rational, polite and considerate. If it conducts itself as if it is the master of the House, which really it is so long as it has a majority, it is asking for trouble. "Ministers must take into account the forces that are against them; the possible criticism—public opinion, the press, and above all, the House of Commons; at times the House of Lords. Therefore, the Cabinet tries not to ride for a fall. It tries to develop a sense of what it can get the House to accept and what it cannot get the House to accept."⁶⁷ If the Government is defeated, it means some of its own supporters have gone against it. It also leads to a General Election and the party goes to the country divided and the people know all about it. It damages the prestige of the Party and injures the prospects of the Government at the election. "So the Cabinet has to be careful. Ministers have to look ahead.... They may get to know that the House won't stand for it", and will make a concession.⁶⁸

66. Laski, H.J., Parliamentary Government in England, p. 172.

67. Morrison, Lord, British Parliamentary Democracy, pp. 72-74.

Parliament, thus, stands unique and by no means deprived of its political significance. Parliament now works harder than it did before, and there has been no formal decree depriving it of its ancient rights. If the governmental control has widened, Parliamentary control too has been lightened by new Committees, such as those on Statutory Instruments and Nationalised Industries. Wherever are loopholes, as it has already been indicated, efforts are made to plug them, as far as possible. But one thing is certain that in a Parliamentary democracy as in Britain, there is no question of Cabinet dictatorship. Jennings has very aptly said that dictators who have to appeal to the country at frequent intervals are the servants of the people and not their masters. There is the periodic and daily assessment of their actions. The House of Commons compels the Government to be responsive to the public opinion at all times. The Opposition is there to remind it of the vulnerability of its position and the weakness of its policies. There are, therefore, very strong and exceedingly democratic forces within Parliament to restrain the Government from acting arbitrarily. That is its responsiveness and responsibility as the constitutional system, according to L.S. Amery, "is one of democracy by consent and not by delegation."⁶⁹ There is, therefore, not much justification⁷⁰ in Richard Crossman's statement that Parliament "has declined, is declining and should not decline any further."⁷¹

SUGGESTED READINGS

- | | |
|---------------------------------|---|
| Bernard Crick | : The Reform of Parliament. |
| Birch, A.H. | : Representative and Responsible Government, An Essay on British Constitution. |
| Broadman, H. | : The Glory of Parliament. |
| Campbell, George | : Parliament. |
| Campion and others | : Parliament, A Survey , Chaps. I, IV, VI, XI, XIII. |
| Campion, Lord | : Introduction to the Procedure of the House of Commons. |
| Chester, D.N. and Bowring, Nona | : Questions in Parliament. |
| Coombes, David | : The Members of Parliament and Administration. |
| Finer, H. | : Governments of Greater European Powers , Chaps. V, VIII. |

68. Ibid.

69. Amery, L.S., Thoughts on the Constitution, p. 12

70. Refer to Ronald Butt's The Power of Parliament, p. 412.

71. Extract from Parliamentary Speeches of Reform as given in Bernard Crick's The Reform of Parliament, Appendix D, p. 307.

- | | |
|------------------------------------|---|
| Finer, H. | : The Theory and Practice of Modern Government , Chaps. XX, XXI. |
| Foot, M. | : Parliament in Danger . |
| Greaves, H.R.G. | : The British Constitution , Chap. II. |
| Gordon, S. | : Our Parliament . |
| Hanson, A.H., and
Wiseman, H.V. | : Parliament at Work . |
| Hill, A., and
Whichelow, A. | : What is Wrong with Parliament? |
| Ilbert, Sir C. | : Parliament . |
| Jennings, W.I. | : Parliament , Chaps. VI—X, XIII. |
| Jennings, W.I. | : Parliament Must be Reformed . |
| Laski, H.J. | : Parliamentary Government in England , Chap. IV. |
| Laski, H.J. | : Reflections on the Constitution , Chaps. I—VII. |
| Laundy, Philip | : The Office of Speaker . |
| Maekenzie, K.R. | : The English Parliament , Chaps. V, VIII—XI. |
| Morrison, H. | : Government and Parliament , Chaps. VI, IX—XI. |
| Morrison, Lord | : British Parliamentary Democracy . |
| Muir, R. | : How Britain is Governed , Chaps. V, VI. |
| Munro, W.B., and
Ayearst, M. | : Governments of Europe , Chaps. IX—XIV. |
| Ogg, F.A., and
Zink, H. | : Modern Foreign Governments , Chaps. XII—XIII. |
| | Papers on Parliament, A Symposium . The Hansard Society Publication, pp. 1-73, 96-109. |
| Pollard, A.F. | : The Evolution of Parliament . |
| Richard, Peter | : Honourable Members . |
| Ronald Butt | : The Power of Parliament . |
| Taylor, E. | : The House of Commons at Work , Chaps. IV—VII. |
| Wade, E.C.S., and
Philips, G.G. | : Constitutional Law , pp. 71-121, 325-35. |
| Wheare, K.C. | : Government by Committee . |

CHAPTER IX

LAW AND THE COURTS

The previous part ended with the process of democratization of the British system of government and the working of the political institutions which emerged therefrom. But the maintenance of democracy must depend in a large measure on the just and efficient working of the courts of law. Judiciary, indeed, is the never-failing custodian of the liberties of the people in Britain and British justice—honest, impartial, intelligent, and available alike to rich and poor—has been the pride of Englishmen for centuries together.

KINDS OF LAW

Common Law. There are in Britain three kinds of law, Common Law, Equity, and Statute Law. Common Law, arising from ancient customs, finds its origin in about eight hundred years back. Before the Norman Conquest there was no uniform legal system. The courts were local bodies and the laws had varied a great deal in different places. The Norman and the Angevin Kings were determined to unite the nation and to make the strength of Monarchy felt, or, in the legal phrase, "to make the King's writ run," throughout the length and breadth of the land. They found that their judicial power was the most effective instrument for this purpose, and their practice was to send their judges to tour the country and to see that it was being properly governed. In the beginning, the travelling judges listened to cases in the local courts and applied the customs which they found in different places. Gradually, they began to iron out the differences and applied the same principles everywhere without much regard for particular local customs. By the process of unification the judges, thus, built a system of rules which was the same or "common" for the whole of the realm. This was the origin of what we still call the Common Law. It was the origin, too, of the "Assizes," the courts which the judges still hold under the King's commission when they tour the country "on circuit."

This early unification of the law in Britain has been an event of abiding importance. It gave the country a strong law, and perhaps it is partly the strength of law that has made Englishmen one of the most law abiding nations in the world. Another result of the unification of the law or at least the method by which it came about was to give to the office of the judge a prestige and influence far above that which it holds in any other system. The Common Law was in origin a judge-made law. The decision of one judge was followed by others, because that was the easiest thing to do. In this way precedents and the doctrine of stare decisis ("let the rule stand") were evolved. The doctrine embraces even the Statute Law and it is an invariable rule of British jurisprudence that a decision given by a judge as to what the Common Law is or what the statutes mean, shall be accepted as a rule to be applied in all similar cases, until it is set aside by a judge of a higher court or until a new Act of Parliament settles the matter beyond doubt.

The Common Law is, therefore, a body of rules which had never been ordained by any Monarch, or enacted by any legislative body. It grew by decision and record. It is still the most fundamental element in the British system. In particular, it covers the general principles of the law of contracts and the civil wrongs. The criminal law, too, was the Common Law, though most of it has now been put into statutory form.

Equity. With the lapse of time, however, the Common Law became sufficiently inflexible as to give rise to serious complaints. Judges ceased to adapt it to the changing needs of British society. There were many cases in which the Common Law provided no remedy and sometimes there were manifest injustices because of rigid adherence to precedence. Feudalism was disappearing and money economy was taking its place about the fifteenth century. The country at that time was passing through a period of social, economic and political instability in which justice often required a procedure less technical and dilatory and method of enforcement more summary, than those that the Common Law was providing. The development of Equity, the second strand in English Law, provided remedies for deficiencies in the Common Law and saved the situation.

The law had always regarded the King as the 'fountain of justice', and the courts were his courts. If his courts failed to give justice an aggrieved subject was entitled to appeal to the King and to pray him to grant a remedy out of his grace. In the beginning, the King tried to deal with each petition on its merits, giving the matter his personal attention and sometimes discussing it with his Council. But he soon found that if he kept on dealing with all the petitions himself, he would have time for nothing else. The King, therefore, passed on such petitions for consideration by his Chancellor, who was not then a judge as he is today. The Chancellor was the legal member of the King's Council and "Keeper", as it was said, of the King's conscience. Thus arose the Court of Chancery, which at first was not so much of a court as an administrative department of the State, charged with reconciling law and justice. In effect, an aggrieved subject who could not get justice from the law in a civil suit, appealed to the Chancellor for the redress of his grievance in accordance with the accepted ideas and common sense.

Equity was rooted not in custom but in conscience. "It was based on the belief that law should correspond to the moral standard of the community." Since Equity provided remedies where the Common Law could only impose penalties, and as it recognised the existence of new problems to which the law had not been adapted, much business came to the Chancery. From the decisions of the successive Lord Chancellors was framed a body of rules known as Equity, not in opposition to the law, but as an addition to it. Equity included such principles as the following:

"Equity will not suffer a wrong to be without a remedy.

He who seeks equity must do equity.

Delay defeats equity.

Equality is equity.

Equity looks to the intent, rather than to the form."

It was not until the beginning of the eighteenth century that the principles of Equity became well settled and the method of their development from case to case had been the same. It meant that the Chancellor had become a judge and his Chancery had become a court of justice. It also meant that there emerged two independent systems of courts applying two separate kinds of law. This extraordinary state of things actually lasted until 1873. The Judicature Act established for the first time a single system of courts and the rules of both Law and Equity were administered both in the King's Bench and Chancery. It must, however, be noted that the Judicature Act of 1873 did not amalgamate Common Law and Equity, but it settled the relation between them by enacting that where they conflicted, Equity was to prevail.

To sum up, Equity consists of a miscellaneous collection of principles, "not systematically related to one another, but each tending to make this or that rule of the Common Law more equitable than it would otherwise be." It has many things in common with the Common Law. Both the Common Law and Equity were shaped by judges to fit the needs of the period in which they were formed, though the needs were different in each case. Common Law provided a basic system of law based upon ancient customs, but moulding them in conformity to the centralized royal authority. Equity simply added to the rules of the Common Law in order to make it more equitable and thereby to remove the rigidity or inadequacy of law. Equity was, thus, complementary to the Common Law. But gradually, like the Common Law, it, too, became a system bound by precedents and in the eighteenth century, a Chancellor declared that the doctrines of Equity "ought to be as well settled and made as uniform almost as those of the Common Law."

Statute Law. The Statute Law is composed of Acts passed by Parliament and this is by far the largest source of law in modern times. Until the nineteenth century almost all civil and criminal law was Common Law or Equity. Even when the civil and criminal law had been embodied in the Acts of Parliament their basis still remained Common Law. It must, however, be noted that Statute Law overrides the Common Law. This is unlike Equity, because it does not contradict Common Law. It simply mitigates Common Law or meets its deficiencies. In case of a conflict between Statute and Common Law, the former is always upheld, for the Statute Law has the final voice; whatever the Common Law, or past statutes, or decisions based on them may have prescribed, that can be altered by a new Statute. In fact, the need for Statutory law was felt to remove the anomalies by the precedents which did not fulfil the changing needs of society and were in conflict with the new standards.

Civil and Criminal Law. When we turn from the sources to the contents of law, the most important distinction is the one between civil and criminal law. The object of civil proceedings, which is called "actions," is to give redress, usually in the form of pecuniary damages, to some private party whose rights another has infringed. On the other hand, in criminal proceedings or "prosecutions" the law does not regard the wrong act as directed to a particular person only. It considers that there is a public interest at stake and its aim is to protect society against such acts punishing the offender.

THE COURTS

The Civil Courts. The Courts that apply the law in the United Kingdom are broadly speaking divided into civil and criminal courts, although no rigid line can be drawn since the distinction is a comparatively modern one. Quite a number of civil cases are, in fact, heard in criminal courts while occasionally a criminal case may be heard in what is primarily a civil court. For civil cases the lowest courts are the county courts, which decide cases in which the amount involved does not exceed £500, or where, in actions for the recovery of land, the rateable value of the land is not more than £100 a year. The growth of social and economic legislation has added to the jurisdiction of the County Courts. Workmen who consider they have not received due compensation for injury suffered in their employment, and tenants and landlords disputing about their rights under the Rent Restriction Act, bring their cases to the County Courts.

County Courts (of which there are nearly 400) are so located that no part of a county is more than a reasonable distance from one of them. They are presided over by a paid judge, who almost always sits alone, although he may sit with a jury consisting of eight persons if either party wishes it and the court makes an order to that effect. There are 92 County Court Judges now in office, each having a circuit, which is either one court, or a group of courts, depending upon the amount of work to be done.

In addition to the County Courts there are still a few local courts with somewhat similar jurisdiction. Most of these are survivals from the medieval borough courts and have little or no work to do at the present time, but the Liverpool Court of Passage, the Salford Hundred Court and the Mayor's and City of London Court are still well used.

Above the County Courts, there is one Supreme Court of Judicature consisting of two parts: the Court of Appeal, in which sit the Master of Rolls and Eight Lord Justices of Appeal, and the High Court of Justice, in which the judges are the Lord Chief Justice and about thirty Justices.

The High Court is organised into three divisions: the Chancery to which most of the cases which formerly belonging to Courts of Equity are assigned; the Queen's Bench for the Common Law cases; and Probate, Divorce and Admiralty. The Court of Appeal and the High Court sit in London, but the Judges of the Queen's Bench Division also hear criminal cases in the country at the Assizes. Petitions for divorce are also now heard at the Assizes. Appeals from the County Courts rest with the High Court. On its original side it has jurisdiction in cases in which the amount involved is sufficiently large. Then, there is the Court of Appeal which receives appeals both from the County Courts and the High Court of Justice. The Court of Appeal sits on two or three divisions or occasionally all Lord Justices sit together in cases of great importance. Above the Court of Appeal stands the House of Lords, the highest Court of Appeal in the realm both in civil and criminal cases. The whole House of Lords never sits as a court. In 1876 seven Peers for life were created to hear appeals and they are known as Lords of Appeal in Ordinary or more popularly as Law Lords. The Appellate Jurisdiction Act 1947, changed the number to nine. All appeals are now heard by ten Law Lords namely, the Lord Chancellor and nine Lords of Appeal in Ordinary. The Lord Chancellor is the presiding officer and is a member of the Cabinet. The nine Law Lords are invariably men of high judicial distinction, eminent judges or lawyers who are made life Peers.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is an exalted appeal body which, strictly speaking, does not belong to the English judicial hierarchy. Technically, it is not a court which renders decisions, but a body which gives advice to the King or Queen on cases referred to it, although its recommendations are always accepted.

When the Long Parliament abolished the Star Chamber in 1641, it took away the right of the Privy Council to hear appeals from the English Courts, but it does not touch the right of appealing to the Council from the overseas possessions of the Crown. The Privy Council is, therefore, still the highest Court of Appeal from courts overseas, except in so far as its jurisdiction has been curtailed by legislation, as it has been in some of the Dominions.² It acts now in virtue of an Act of 1833 through the Judicial Committee, the members of which are Privy Councillors aided by their overseas colleagues on matters affecting their particular territories. The members of the Judicial Committee number about twenty jurists, but most of the work is done by the same judges as sit in the House of Lords, acting here, however, not as Peers, but as Privy Councillors. The Law Lords are salaried life peers and when this category of peers was created, it was decided that they could carry the bulk of work both in the House of Lords and in the Judicial Committee.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has one special jurisdiction which associates it with the English Courts. In time of war it is the highest court for the whole of the Empire in naval prize cases.

Criminal Courts. In England when a person stands charged with a crime he is brought before one or more Justices of the Peace (J.P.) or, in the larger towns, before a Stipendiary Magistrate. The former serves without pay, whereas the latter receives regular salaries or stipends from their respective boroughs or urban districts; hence their title. The stipendiary Magistrates are appointed by the Secretary of State for Home Affairs and are barristers of seven years' standing. Justices of the Peace are appointed by the Lord Chancellor³ on the recommendations of the Lord-Lieutenants of the counties. The Magistrates have jurisdiction over the same classes of cases as Justices of the Peace and also some additional powers.

2. All the Dominions except New Zealand have restricted the right to appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Acting singly, Justices of Peace and Magistrates have jurisdiction over petty cases which are punishable by a fine of not more than twenty shillings or by imprisonment for not more than fourteen days. More serious cases are tried by a Bench of two or more Justices or a Magistrate. When two Justices sit as a Bench, it is called a Court of Petty Session. The courts have summary jurisdiction and may impose maximum fines ranging from £50 to £100 or even £500 in certain specified cases, or, they may impose a sentence of imprisonment up to six months or in a very few cases, a year. If the offence is punishable by imprisonment for more than three months, the accused may be tried by a Jury.

Then, there is the Court of Quarter Sessions, composed of two or more of the Justices from the whole of a county. In the larger towns it is presided over by a single paid Magistrate, the Recorder, appointed by the Home Secretary. All indictable offences, save the most serious, can be tried here, and appeals from the Courts of Summary Jurisdiction are heard. In fact, it is the Court in which majority of grave crimes are tried.

Courts of Assizes are branches of the High Court of Justice. They are held in the county towns and in certain big cities three times a year. A Queen's Bench judge is the presiding officer of the court assisted by a jury. The Assizes Judges work on circuits covering England and Wales, and travel from one county to another in the course of their duties. They can try any indictable offence committed in the county. The judge at a criminal trial, according to English practice, is much in the position of an umpire. In English law it is not the function of a judge to discover the truth. He is there to see that the rules are observed and both sides to the case have fair play. The truth will be known when the jury give their verdict. If the jury returns the verdict of not guilty, the accused is forthwith discharged. If, on the other hand, it finds him guilty, the judge pronounces judgment. If the jury cannot agree, there may be a new trial with a different set of jurors.

From Quarter Sessions or the Assizes the accused may appeal to the Court of Criminal Appeal. The prosecution cannot appeal if once the accused is found not guilty as no one can be again tried on the same accusation. The Court of Criminal Appeal consists of Lord Chief Justice and not fewer than three Judges of the Queen's Bench. The Court sits in London and without a jury. Under the Administration of Justice Act, 1960, a further appeal from the Court of Criminal Appeal to the House of Lords can be brought, if the Court certifies that a point of law of general public importance is involved and it appears to the Court or the House of Lords that the point is one that ought to be considered by the House. The House of Lords is the highest Court, as stated previously, both in civil and criminal cases. But its criminal business is quite exceptional. Since 1948, the House of Lords has voted away the historic rights of its members to be tried for treason or felony by a jury of peers of their own or higher rank. The House no longer exercises any original jurisdiction.

3. Or by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

FEATURES OF THE JUDICIAL SYSTEM

1. There is no single form of judicial organization that prevails throughout the country. The system of courts described in the preceding pages is one obtainable in England and Wales. The law of Scotland differs both in principle and procedure and the organization of Courts there is, accordingly, different. Northern Ireland has still another system, although it is more like the English.

2. There is now integration of the Courts in England and Wales. Two generations before the country was "cluttered up with unrelated, over-lapping and sometimes useless tribunals." Cases multiplied and it was difficult to determine which Court had the jurisdiction and each type of court had its own peculiar forms of practices and procedure. As a result of the reforms brought about by the Judicature Acts extending between 1873-76 the judicial system has been thoroughly reorganised. Practically all the courts⁴ have been brought together in a single centralised system removing the old anomalies and conflicts of jurisdiction.

3. There are no separate administrative courts in Britain just as there are in France and other Continental countries. In France and other Continental courts there are two distinct types of law, ordinary and administrative, and two separate courts, ordinary and administrative. The officers of the Government are amenable to the administrative courts for certain acts done in their official capacity and the law applicable therein is the administrative law. The English Common Law recognises no distinction between the acts of Government officials and ordinary citizens. All are amenable to the same ordinary courts and to the same law, though the system of administrative adjudication is inevitably developing.

4. But the great virtue of the English system is the independence, promptness and impartiality with which justice is administered. The judges are not influenced by any consideration except that of justice and fair play. This is primarily due to their absolute position of independence. They are appointed by the Crown and hold office for life or during good behaviour. They can be removed only by joint address of both Houses of Parliament to the Crown and their salaries are fixed so that no pressure can be brought to bear upon them. When in 1931, a special law was passed to enable the salaries of all government servants, from the Prime Minister downwards, to be reduced as an economy measure, the judges protested against their inclusion as involving an encroachment upon their absolute independence.

5. There is no system of judicial review in Britain. Parliament is supreme and it is beyond the competence of the courts to declare a law ultra vires. The courts have to accept the law as it emerges out of Parliament no matter even if it is repugnant to the provisions of Magna Carta, the Petition of Rights, or any previous Act of Parliament itself such as the Habeas Corpus Act, the Parliament Act 1911, the Statute of Westminster, or "any other so-termed constitutional land-mark." Nor do the courts concern themselves with what Parliament meant to say; they simply look at the words of the statute.

4. Except those of the Justices of the Peace.

6. The Judges and Courts in England are the custodians of the liberties of the citizens. The Englishmen have no constitutional rights in the sense we have them in India. There is liberty in England because there is Rule of Law. Bluntly put, it means that it is the law of England that rules the country and not the arbitrary will of any individual. The judges are the jealous guardians of the Rule of Law. Prof. MacIlwain has said that England needs no written constitutional guarantees because her traditions of government are so old and so firm, and these are the traditions of the Rule of Law; the common heritage of the British.

7. English procedure, especially in Criminal Courts, is accusatorial rather than inquisitorial. The complainant must prove his case. Before trial and at trial, an accused person is stringently protected against any kind of inquisitorial procedure. It is not for the judge to probe into the matter. He acts with complete impartiality as an umpire between the contestants and decides according to the evidence as presented to him. And the evidence itself is strictly limited. Only the sworn testimony of witnesses, subject to cross-examination, can be heard. There must be no hearsay, no evidence on previous offences or bad character. The trial must take place in open court, in the full limelight of press publicity.

8. The jury system in England is the first expression of the Rule of Law. The verdict of a jury in favour of the accused cannot be reviewed at the instance of the prosecution. It means that juries are able to temper justice with mercy and to refuse to convict wherever the law is seriously out of touch with public opinion. The power of adjusting the law of the land to difficult cases, which is indispensable to every human and enlightened system of justice, is vested not in the officers appointed and under the control of government, but in "chance groups of citizens," who are selected at random on each occasion from the general mass of the people and retire after doing their duty into the obscurity from which they came. On several occasions the juries "have struck vigorous and effectual blows for the liberty of the subject when the law has, for the time at least, been illiberal."

9. The independence of judges came rather later than that of juries. Besides the statutory security of judges in their office, the method by which they are appointed has provided another safeguard for their independence. In most other countries judges start their judicial career at an early age in subordinate positions and gradually work their way up the ladder by promotion. Naturally, therefore, they must look to Government or possibly to popular election, and a weak man may sacrifice his judicial independence in a temptation to win over the favour of those who can help him to improve his prospects. In England, on the other hand, a judgeship is the crown and not the starting point of a career. Judges are appointed generally in later middle life from among the leading members of the Bar. Once appointed, a judge has no favours to look for either from government or from anyone else. A

County Judge has no chance of promotion to the High Court. A promotion from the High Court to the Court of Appeal or the House of Lords does not add much, although it does add something to the dignity or the income of the judge. The obvious result is that "judges on the whole, so far from being subservient to government, tend to be critical of it, and regard themselves as the watchdogs of the ordinary man against anything savouring of bureaucratic tyranny."

10. Finally, there is the acceleration of judicial business, and the cases move rapidly. This is due to two reasons. In the first place, English judges possess greater discretion in dealing with legal technicalities. Secondly, the judicial Rules of Procedure are made by a special "rule committee" consisting of the Lord Chancellor and ten other persons who are eminently familiar with law. They know the technicalities and frame rules so as to ensure speedy justice. This is not possible when Rules of Procedure are made by legislatures, as in the United States, composed of laymen. Courts in England, therefore, "do not tolerate the pettifogging, dilatory, hair-splitting tactics which lawyers are so freely permitted to use in American halls of justice. The Judge rules his courtroom, pushes the business along, and declines to permit appeals from his rulings unless he sees good reason for doing so."⁵ Moreover, the higher courts do not upset in appeal the judgments of lower courts for merely technical errors.

RULE OF LAW

What does it mean? One of the very important features of the British Constitution is the Rule of Law. It is based on the Common Law of the land and is the product of centuries of struggles of the people for the recognition of their inherent rights and privileges. It means three things. First, that what is supreme in Britain is law. There is no such thing as arbitrary power and every rule by which the Government governs must be authorised by law, either Statute Law, passed by Parliament or by the ancient principles of Common Law, which have been recognised for many hundreds of years now. In other words, the Latin tag Salus populi supreme lex—the welfare of the people is the supreme law—cannot be used by the Government as an excuse for pursuing its own idea of the public interest without regard for legality. Second, that everyone is subject to the law and no one can plead that he acted under orders. His business like everyone else is to obey the law. The Government and its officials derive such power as they possess from the ordinary law. Third, the Rule of Law makes the government subject to Parliament, and through Parliament to the people. To put it another way, Parliamentary supremacy is, in part, only tolerable because the Rule of Law is recognised.

The meaning of the term Rule of Law can best be understood by considering what Government can be like without it. In France before the Revolution the nobility enjoyed special privileges and immunities and they could disregard the ordinary law. They could imprison and punish their inferiors without putting them through any form of trial. In Britain the law gives no such privileges and everyone is subject to the same law. The Crown and Government, the Executive and its officials, are subject to exactly the same laws administered exactly in the same courts as the most humble citizen. This is the meaning of the phrase "equality before the law." In Germany, Hitler's expressed wishes were law and his Government had power to imprison people without trial, or even people who had been tried and acquitted by a duly constituted court by law. Where the Rule of Law prevails no one can suffer any penalty or loss of liberty unless he has been tried and sentenced by a court. At one time it was the practice in periods of emergency in Britain to pass Acts of Parliament suspending the issue of the writ of Habeas Corpus. In the two World Wars, it was thought desirable not to take this course. The Government was, however, empowered to intern suspected persons without trial though special committees were appointed by the Home Secretary to consider cases of persons so detained and advised him whether or not he ought to release them. But these emergency provisions were among the first to be abolished as soon as the emergency had ceased.

5. Munro and Aycarst, The Governments of Europe, p. 260.

The other side to the Rule of Law is the possibility which it affords the ordinary citizen of reaching against interferences with his rights by any other person even though he is a government servant. The law in this respect was formerly imperfect. But it has now been considerably improved by the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, which makes the Crown liable to action like any other ordinary person, and reduces to a minimum its privileges in litigation.

Dicey's exposition of the Rule of Law. The conception of the Rule of Law was given classical formulation by A.V. Dicey. Dicey gave to the Rule of Law three meanings.⁶ It means in the first place, "that no man is punishable or can be lawfully made to suffer in body or goods except for a distinct breach of law established in the ordinary courts of the land. In this sense the rule of law is contrasted with every system of government based on the exercise by persons in authority, of wider arbitrary or discretionary powers of constraint." This principle implies that no person may be arbitrarily deprived of life, liberty or property; no one may be arrested and detained except for a definite breach of law which must be proved in a duly constituted court by law. Cases are not tried behind closed doors but in open courts to which public has free access. The accused has the right of being represented and defended by a counsel and in all serious criminal cases he must be tried by a jury. Judgment is rendered in open court and the accused has the right to appeal to higher courts. All this reduces to the minimum the possibility of executive arbitrariness and, thus, oppression.

The Rule of Law, in the second place, means: "Not only with us is no man above the law, but (what is a different thing) here every man, whatever be his rank or condition, is subject to the ordinary law of the realm and amenable to the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals." It implies, in the first place, the equality of every citizen, irrespective of his official or social status, before law. Secondly, there is only one kind of law in Britain to which all Englishmen are amenable. All public officials, high or low, are under the same responsibility for every act done by them. If public officials do any wrong to an individual or exceed the power vested in them by law, they can be sued in the ordinary courts and tried in the ordinary manner subject to the provisions of the ordinary law. The equality of all in the eyes of law minimises tyranny and irresponsibility of the executive. Dicey in elaborating the principle of equality before law says: "With us every official, from the Prime Minister to constable or a collector of taxes, is under the same responsibility for every act done without legal justification as any other citizen."

6. Law of the Constitution, 8th ed. (1930), p. 179 ff. Also refer to Jennings, The Law and the Constitution, 3rd ed., Chap. II.

Finally, the Rule of Law means that with Englishmen "the general principles of the Constitution are...the result of judicial decisions determining the rights of private persons in particular cases brought before the Courts." In Britain rights of the citizens do not flow from the Constitution, but from judicial decisions in particular cases, as in the famous Wilkes' case, and not from statements of general constitutional principles.

How for Dicey's exposition is true? Dicey was a great admirer of the Rule of Law. He maintained that there was liberty in Britain because there was the Rule of Law. But in reality there are some significant departures from the meanings given by Dicey to the concept of the Rule of Law. Dicey himself admitted these exceptions, although his admission "did little to modify the widespread influence of the mistaken views which he had propagated so effectively."

In considering Dicey's first meaning of the Rule of Law, a distinction must be made between arbitrary power and discretionary authority. It is still an essential principle of the constitutional government in Britain that there should be no exercise of arbitrary authority. When Dicey referred to "ordinary law", he had in his mind the Common Law or the Statute Law. Today, criminal law includes innumerable offences which are created by statutory regulations.⁸ The power to create offences by regulations made by government Departments or subordinate bodies has become an inevitable task of the modern State. The growth of delegated legislation touches upon the principle of the Rule of Law.

Wherever there is delegated legislation there is discretionary authority. If discretionary authority is contrary to the Rule of Law, then, the Rule of Law is inapplicable to any modern Constitution. When Dicey in 1885, wrote the first edition of the Law of the Constitution, the primary functions of the State were preservation of law and order, defence and foreign relations. Today, the functions of the State are more positive and they regulate the national life in multifarious ways. Discretionary authority in every sphere is, thus, inevitable and administrative authorities have to be left a reasonable amount of discretion to meet the exigencies of time and peculiarities of a situation or a problem. Discretion does not mean absolute or arbitrary power and it must not be exercised unreasonably, wantonly and maliciously. It is "a science of understanding to discern between falsity and truth, between right and wrong... (and) not to do according to will and private affections." According to Lord Halsbury discretion should be exercised according to "the rules of reason and justice, not according to private opinion, according to law, and not humour." Robson has aptly said that "Discretion in public affairs is seldom absolute; it is usually qualified. It must be used judiciously...."⁹ Arbitrary power, on the other hand, is the power exercised by an agent responsible to none and subject to no control.

7. Campion and Others, British Government Since 1918; Administrative Law in England by W.A. Robson, p. 86.

8. See ante Chap. VIII.

Dicey's second meaning of the Rule of Law is also subject to certain qualifications. In the first place, there remain, even after the operation of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, certain privileges and immunities which are open to public authorities and their officers. The Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, as amended by Section 21 of the Limitation Act, 1939, makes it necessary that all proceedings against public officials for the excess, neglect, or default of the public authority must be started within six months of the act. If it is not done, the proceedings lapse. Heavy penalty by way of costs is to be paid, if a citizen's law suit against a public authority fails. Judges are not liable for anything done or said in the exercise of their judicial functions, even if they exceed their jurisdiction,¹⁰ unless the judge ought to have known the facts ousting his jurisdiction.

Secondly, common with all civilised States, Britain too affords immunities to the persons and property of other States, their rulers and diplomatic agents, in the forms of process in courts, though not from legal liability as such.¹¹ The significance of these immunities has been widely applied in favour of recognised international agencies and their officers particularly after 1944. In the third place, there are one or two instances where internal political expediency has required the conferment of special immunities. The Trade Disputes Act, 1906, prohibits the bringing of any action against a trade union in respect of a tort. Similarly, it is impossible to bring an action against an unincorporated body, e.g., social clubs and many other charitable institutions, though individual members or officers are liable for wrongful acts in which they take part.

It is true that the officials are amenable to the jurisdiction of ordinary courts, and the law of England knows nothing of exceptional offences punished by extraordinary tribunals. But during the last fifty years Government Departments, which are not courts in Dicey's sense, have been made final courts of judgment in regard to many matters which fall within the scope of their work. For example, the Home Secretary has the discretion to grant or refuse the certificates of natura-

9. Justice and Administrative Law, p. 401.

10. Immunity does not attach to a ministerial, as opposed to a judicial, act. Thus an action lies for a wrongful refusal to hear a case, but not for a wrongful decision. Refer to Wade and Phillips, op. cit., p. 236.

11. Dickinson v. Delsolar (1930), I.K.B. 376.

lisation to aliens. He has also the full power of deporting an alien and his actions cannot be challenged in any court of law. The Crown alone has the power to issue passports and the exercise of this power cannot be questioned in a court of law. Similarly, the Minister of Health, the National Health Insurance Commissioner, the Ministry of Education, the Board of Trade, the Minister of Transport, the Railway Rates Tribunal, and other authorities, not being ordinary courts of the country or constituted as such, finally decide questions affecting the person and property of the citizens. There is, thus a considerable distribution of administrative power and, therefore, Dicey's Rule of Law is, in practice, considerably modified.

Finally, in his third meaning to the Rule of Law, Dicey only refers to the fundamental political rights and maintains that the citizen whose fundamental rights are infringed may seek remedy in the courts and he will rely, not upon a constitutional guarantee, but on the ordinary law of the land. He does not refer to the mass of rights derived from Statutes, e.g., pensions, insurance or free education. Even the rights at Common Law, like the right to personal freedom, the right of self-defence, the right to bring an action for wrongful arrest, assault or false imprisonment, the right to speech, etc., really find their effectiveness from various Statutes. The writ of Habeas Corpus existed at the Common Law, but was made effective by the Habeas Corpus Acts of 1679 and 1816. The right to arrest is governed partly by Common Law and partly by Statutes, e.g., the Criminal Justice Act 1925. The Law of Libel is primarily Common Law, but various Statutes, as the Law of Libel (Amendment) Act, 1888, give special privileges to the Press. The Public Order Act of 1936 is an important part of the Law of public meetings.

Conclusion. The conception of the Rule of Law as explained by Dicey, therefore, needs modifications in the context of the modern conditions. The Rule of Law still remains a principle of the British Constitution, but it needs restating in the light of present conditions. According to a recent statement, the Rule of Law "involves the absence of arbitrary power, effective control of and proper publicity for delegated legislation, particularly when it imposes penalties; that when discretionary power is granted the manner in which it is to be exercised should as far as practicable be defined; that every man should be responsible to the ordinary law whether he be private citizen or public officer, that private rights should be determined by impartial and independent tribunals; and that fundamental private rights are safeguarded by the ordinary law of the land."¹² Such a statement takes account of developments with respect to administrative law and justice which have important bearings on the rights of citizens. Since the principle of the Rule of Law is connected with the supremacy of Parliament, in ultimate resort the principle must guide the conduct of a political party which is in majority in Parliament and, thus, is in a position to influence the course of legislation.

Administrative Law and Justice. A feature of the Continental jurisprudence is the existence and use of a body of law known as administrative law. It regulates the conduct of official business and pertains to the relations of private citizens and the governmental authorities. In France and other countries, which have modelled their judicial system upon those of Continental Europe, Administrative Law is dispensed in a separate system of courts called Administrative Courts. A French citizen, for example, who is involved in a dispute with a Department of the Government would seek redress in an Administrative rather than ordinary Court of law, and if some injury or loss is sustained by a citizen by the action of an officer of the government and the court holds it to be an abuse or excess or wrongful exercise of authority, he would collect damages or compensation from the Government.

12. Wade and Philips, Constitutional Law, op. cit., p. 58.

Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence has never favoured the establishment of a separate body of law and separate courts for this kind of justice. Dicey had held that there was no system of administrative law in Britain,¹³ and it was antithetic to the Rule of Law as it conferred a privileged status on officials and, thus, protected them from acting arbitrarily and irresponsibly.¹⁴ He accordingly, argued to keep officials, in both their private and public capacities, answerable to the same law as are private citizens, and to maintain the ordinary courts as the usual places for hearing and deciding cases arising out of the performance of administrative functions. Administrative Law, according to Dicey, is nothing more than the generalisation from the judgments rendered in the special courts, the tribunaux administratifs, for officials in their relations with the public.

But Dicey's is not a correct appreciation of the Administrative Law. Nor are his conclusions acceptable. Herman Finer states the truth that "wherever there is administration and law, there is administrative law."¹⁵ In Britain, there is such a body of law and its sources, as Professor Robson writes, "include not only the law controlling public administration (i.e., statutes, Common Law and equity), but also the law emanating from the executive organs in the exercise of their duly authorised powers. Thus, Statutory Instruments, administrative orders, and the determinations of administrative tribunals can be as authentic sources of administrative law as legislation and decisions of courts. Moreover, just as the usages and conventions of the Constitution form an important part of constitutional law, so the uses and conventions form an essential part of administrative law."¹⁶

Moreover, there are many administrative 'Courts' functioning in Britain. They have developed on an ad hoc basis, though they form no system of judicial organisation as in France and other Continental countries. The modern tendency towards conferring judicial functions on departments of the government or on tribunals controlled, directly or indirectly, and appointed by the Ministers of the Crown, began about eight years ago, and during the lifetime of Prof. Dicey. It originated

13. Refer to W.A. Robson's Administrative Law in England, 1919-1948; and British Government since 1918, op. cit., p. 86.

14. Dicey, A.V., Law of the Constitution, p. 329.

15. Finer, H., Theory and Practice of Modern Government, p. 924.

16. Robson, W.A., Administrative Law in England 1919-1948, op. cit., p. 89.

mainly in social legislation, such as the Public Health Act of 1875, but "one powerful stream of tendency," Robson writes, "flowed through the successive Railway and Canal Commissions which were set up to regulate the railways in 1873 and 1888."¹⁷ With the beginning of the present century the activities of the Government widely expanded embracing various phases of the social and economic life of the people. Parliament could not legislate for everything in a detailed manner. The result was a vast volume of delegated legislation that was passed and that continued to be passed by Parliament. And the factors that made it desirable to delegate legislative authority from Parliament (the need for speed, and the technical nature of the issue) also made it necessary to create administrative adjudication machinery to consider aspects of the administration or maladministration of the matter concerned. By 1920, judicial functions had been conferred on a wide variety of administrative tribunals such as the Minister of Health, the Board of Trade, the Ministry (then the Board) of Education, the District Auditor, the Home Secretary, the Electricity Commission, the London Building Tribunal, the pension appeal bodies and several others. Their jurisdiction covered an extensive range of subjects, including public health, housing, education, unemployment insurance, health insurance, pensions of all kinds, trade unions, public utilities and other matters. The most conspicuous development of the following years is the adoption of the three-man tribunal as the typical type. This type was adopted for the discharge of judicial functions in connection with the new national insurance scheme, the postponement of call up for military service, reinstatement of ex-servicemen in civil employment, unemployment assistance, the control of rents for furnished buildings, the regulation of road and rail transport. But, at the same time, there is still a tendency of conferring judicial powers specifically on a Minister and this has occurred in town and county planning, education, the national medical service, police appeals and the superannuation of local government officers.

The continuing expansion of governmental activity and responsibility for the general well-being of the community has, thus, greatly multiplied the occasions on which the individual may find himself at issue with the administration or with another body of persons or an individual. Consequently there has been a substantial growth in the number of tribunals—there are over 2,000 in existence now—and in the range of their activities during the past twenty years. Their constitution follows a fairly general pattern; all consist of an even number of persons so that a majority decision can be reached.

Administrative tribunals may be broadly classified as follows:

(i) those which have permanent members appointed for their special knowledge and a Chairman who may be a lawyer of experience as the Transport Tribunal, and the Lands Tribunal;

(ii) those which are purely administrative, for instance, the special Commissioners of Income Tax, who hear appeals on matters relating to Income Tax from the rulings of the Inland Revenue officials;

(iii) those which deal exclusively with matters of interest to one Government Department or public authority, for instance, the Pensions Appeal Tribunals, which hear appeals against the rejection by Minister of Social Security of war service pension claims; and

17. Ibid., p. 125.

(iv) those which consist of ordinary people appointed by a Minister to arbitrate between individuals, for instance, the Rent Tribunals, which have jurisdiction in the determination of rents of certain properties.

Although there is not general provision respecting appeals from statutory tribunals, the Tribunals and Inquiries Act, 1958, and other Acts provide for an appeal, at least on a point of law, from all the more important tribunals to the High Court or, in Scotland, to the Court of Session. An appeal may also lie to a specially constituted appeal tribunal, to a Minister of the Crown or to an independent referee. An Advisory body known as the Council on Tribunals exercises general supervision over the tribunals and reports on particular matters, those peculiar to Scotland being dealt with by the Scottish Committee of the Council.

Britain has, therefore, a large body of Administrative Law and most of this law originates in Statutes and Statutory Instruments. The great majority of Acts of Parliament passed and Ministerial regulations made in recent years relate to matters of public administration. And, we have said, that wherever there is administration and law, there is administrative law. There are also many administrative 'Courts'—Ministers, other administrative officials and special tribunals hearing and deciding cases.

Reform of Administrative Justice. It is now generally believed in Britain that it is unrealistic under modern conditions to try to give to the Rule of Law the strict interpretation placed upon it in the nineteenth century. Delegated legislation and administrative jurisdiction are both inescapable. One justification of administrative tribunals is that in their absence the Law Courts would be extremely overworked. But it may be added that tribunals have advantages over the courts for citizens and the State alike. Tribunals are cheap, speedy, less legal formalities to be observed, easily accessible to the public, and are composed of experts in the matter to be dealt with. There is, therefore, greater possibility of a right judgment and expert decision. The objections in principle to the system of administrative tribunals, however, are based partly on opposition to the increase in the executive authority and the extent of executive influence, and partly on the argument that justice cannot be expected in administrative tribunals because the administration is both the offender and the Judge of the offence. It offends against the principle that no party should judge a case in which it is itself involved.

Whatever be the reasons and merits of administrative adjudication there is need in the reform of administrative justice. In hearing and deciding cases administrative officers and administrative tribunals do not follow a judicial-like procedure, the Rules of Procedure followed by regular courts. The decisions rendered are not published and the authorities deciding cases are not required to give the reasons—or at least the grounds—for their decisions. And then the right of appeal from the decisions of administrative tribunals is often limited or even non-existent. This may mean miscarriage of justice. These are some of the defects which require to be eliminated.

Lord Hewart's¹⁸ The New Despotism, published in 1929, reflected the attitude of a considerable body of alarmed jurists and he called to the attention of the public the dangers that he believed to be attendant on this new development—delegated legislation and administrative adjudication. Two other books, F.J. Port's Administrative Law and Dr. C.K. Allen's Bureaucracy Triumphant pertinently brought the issue before the public eye. This was followed by the appointment of the Committee on Ministers' Powers in 1929 to deal with these two hotly debated questions. Its terms of reference were to consider the powers exercised by or under the direction of Ministers of the Crown by way of (a) delegated legislation, and (b) judicial or quasi-judicial decision, and to report what safeguards were desirable or necessary to secure the constitutional principles of the sovereignty of Parliament and the supremacy of the law.

The Committee's findings about administrative adjudication were the same as with regard to delegated legislation that both are essential and desirable under the modern conditions, but subject to certain safeguards. Purely judicial functions, the Committee recommended, should not be entrusted, as a rule, to the Ministers, but quasi-judicial functions may and even must. The safeguards suggested were: that the High Court should have a right to prevent a Minister or Ministerial tribunal from exceeding their statutory power; that the aggrieved party should have a right to appeal to the High Court on a question of law; that the adjudicatory procedure should conform to the principles of natural justice which require that a man may not be a judge in his own case; that no party should be condemned, that the parties affected must know in good time the case they have to meet; that the parties are entitled to know the reasons of the decision; and that the inspector's enquiry report should be published along with the decision given on its basis. The Committee rejected Professor Robson's proposal, who was also a member of the Committee, for establishing Administrative Courts. It made no recommendations about the reform of the constitution of the existing tribunals or for co-ordinating them into a systematic pattern.

Since the Committee submitted its report in 1932 there has been a substantial further development of administrative justice and the three-man tribunal as the typical body for dispensing it. In 1955, a Committee under the Chairmanship of Sir Oliver Franks was appointed to report on the functioning of the administrative tribunals and it submitted its report early in August 1957.

The Report of the Franks Committee is a document of great importance. It rejected the Treasury view put before the Committee that the administrative tribunals were part and parcel of the machinery of Government and consequently were not judicial institutions. The conclusion of the Committee was that administrative tribunals were independent organisations of adjudication for the impartial assessment of the individual's claim. The three points on which the Report was based were: (1) all decisions of administrative tribunal should be subject to review by the ordinary courts in points of law; (2) the decision should be entrusted to a court rather than to a tribunal in the absence of special considerations that make a tribunal more suitable and if possible to a tribunal rather than to a Minister; and (3) the determination that the citizen should not suffer in the protection of his legal rights from the substitution of a tribunal or a Ministerial inquiry or hearing for a court of law. "We regard both tribunals and administrative procedures," the Report maintained, "as essential powers to society. But the administration should not use these methods of adjudication as convenient alternatives to the courts of law." The emphasis of the Report is that whoever be the arbiter of the rights of the individual, he must be an independent arbiter and the scope for decision must be confined to points of law; neither to policy, nor to administrative expediency or efficiency. The procedure that has been recommended by the Committee is: openness in inquiry or hearings, fairness and impartiality. "The intention of Parliament," adds the Report, "to provide for independence is clear and unmistakable."

18. Lord Hewart was the Lord Chief Justice.

As regards the composition of the administrative tribunals, the Committee recommended that the Chairman should be appointed by the Lord Chancellor and not by the Minister. The proceedings of the tribunal should be open and the citizen who is a party has a right to be told in good time the case he is to meet. The reason for the proposals and the background of Minister's policy must also be stated. There must be a full statement of the case together with relevant evidence and the parties concerned should know the reasons for the decision. The Minister's final orders must contain his reasons in full.

Conclusion. It seems unlikely that Britain will ever acquire a separate and unified system of administrative Courts as it exists in France. The British are more apt to proceed by way of gradual change and adaptation. What it is necessary to emphasize is the improvement in the quality of administrative justice. This can be brought about if "throughout the executive establishment there can be developed procedures for hearing cases that are fair and that accord the citizen his elementary rights, and if judicial-mindedness can be instilled into officials exercising judicial duties, then the dangers in the present situation will be removed to a large extent." The recommendations of the Franks Committee, acceptable to the Government, were embodied in the Tribunals and Inquiries Act of 1958, and the Town and Country Planning Act of 1959. By the former Act a Council for Tribunals in England, Wales and Scotland was set up, Chairman appointed jointly by the Lord Chancellor and by the Secretary of State for Scotland and other members by the Department concerned. Its purpose is to exercise general oversight over the composition and procedure of tribunals. The detailed application of openness, fairness and impartiality could obviously not be defined by statute alone. But Ministers have brought these principles specifically to the notice of officials concerned in tribunal work. The Act also effected an improvement in that members of public concerned now receive much fuller information than before.

The Parliamentary Commissioner. But the dissatisfaction with the system of administrative tribunals continued: It was argued that the existing tribunal system was an inadequate means of dealing with public grievances, and there were many complaints that were not covered by the Tribunal system. Since redress through Parliament was becoming increasingly difficult as Government activities continued to expand, it was suggested that there was a need for some supplementary means of dealing with grievances and a similar official as the Ombudsman, which had worked satisfactorily in Scandinavia, New Zealand and other countries, could usefully be introduced in Britain. Accordingly, a Parliamentary Commissioner was created in 1967, to examine complaints of mal-administration.

The Parliamentary Commissioner is an officer of the House of Commons, independent of the Executive. His function, under the Parliamentary Commissioner Act, 1967, is to investigate complaints of maladministration brought to his notice by Members of Parliament on behalf of their constituents. His powers of investigation extend to any action by a government Department in the exercise of its administrative function, but not to policy decisions (which are the concern of the Government) nor to matters affecting relations with other countries or the activities of British officials outside the United Kingdom. Certain other matters are also excluded from the scope of his investigations, but may be brought within the scope by Order in Council. The Commissioner does not normally intervene in cases where a complainant has an alternative remedy, whether to an administrative tribunal or to a Court of Law, but he has discretion in such cases whether or not to investigate. Decisions taken by a Government Department or other authority in the exercise of a discretion vested in that Department or authority are not reviewed by the Commissioner by way of appeal.

In the performance of his duties the Parliamentary Commissioner has access to all departmental papers and generally, speaking, reports his findings to the Members of Parliament who presented the case. A Select Committee has been appointed to which the Commissioner submits his annual report and any other report raising important general principles.

The creation of the post of the Parliamentary Commissioner was hailed no doubt, but the limitations imposed on his powers by the 1967 Act caused disappointment to many. The Parliamentary Commissioner is an officer of Parliament and he can act only on complaints he receives through a Member of Parliament. He has no executive authority of his own, and can only enquire into, and report to Parliament, on any complaint referred to him, while Ministers retain the right to veto the disclosure of any official document. Then, the investigations of the Commissioner are confined to the Departments of the Government alone and do not extend to Local Government or the nationalized industries. The innovation of an Ombudsman, therefore, left untouched many of the general criticisms of the existing machinery dealing with questions of alleged mal-administration.

SUGGESTED READINGS

- | | |
|--------------------|---|
| Allen, C.K. | : Bureaucracy Triumphant. |
| Allen, C.K. | : Administrative Jurisdiction. |
| Archer, Peter | : The Queen's Courts. |
| Campion and Others | : British Government since 1918, Chap. IV. |

- Campion and Others : Parliament, A Survey, Chap. X.
- Carter, G. M. and Others : The Government of Great Britain, Chap. VIII.
- Devlin, Lord : Trial by Jury.
- Dicey, A.V. : Law of the Constitution, Chaps. IV, VIII, introduction pp. lxvii to xciv, Appendix Section I.
- Finer, H. : Theory and Practice of Modern Government Chap. XXXVI.
- Gibs, F.T. : The Magistrates' Courts.
- Griffith, J.A.G. and Street, H. : Principles of Administrative Law.
- Hewart, Lord : The New Despotism.
- Jackson, R.M. : The Machinery of Justice in England.
- James Philips : Introduction to English Law.
- Jennings, W.I. : Law of the Constitution, Chap. II.
- Laski, H.J. : Parliamentary Government in England, Chap. VII.
- Munro, W.B., and Aycarst, M. : The Governments of Europe, Chap. XVII.
- Rhodes, G. : Administrators in Action.
- Robson W.A. : Justice and Administrative Law.
- Robson, W.A. : The Governors and the Governed.
- Robson, W.A. : Justice and Administrative Law.
- Wade, H.W.R. : Administrative Law.
- Wade, H.W.R. : Towards Administrative Justice.
- Wade, R.C.S., and Philips, G.G. : Constitutional Law, pp. 48-58, 215-37, 267-79.
- Whyatt, John : The Citizen and the Administration.
- Yardley, D.C.M. : Introduction to British Constitutional Law.

CHAPTER X

POLITICAL PARTIES

The reasons for a Party System. Today, political parties are accepted as a natural and inevitable piece of machinery of democracy. Democracy needs them for two reasons. First, political parties are the means by which the citizens get an opportunity to choose their rulers, and, secondly, they explain to them and educate them in the merits and dangers of alternative policies. MacIver defines a political party, "as an association organised in support of some principle or policy which by constitutional means it endeavours to make the determinant of government."¹ A party is, thus, a voluntary association, which in a system of parliamentary government, as obtainable in Britain, formulates a programme, presents to the electorate the candidates who represent that programme, and return to Parliament a majority of members who will carry the programme into effect through the agency of their leaders organised in a Cabinet. A party is, accordingly, a link, a bridge, between society and the State; it affects the electorate, Parliament, and the Cabinet.

Yet political parties in Britain are not organs or institutions of the State specifically regulated by its laws, as is the case in some countries. The law does not even mention them. Their only nearer approach to official recognition is in the rules for the formation of Committees of the House of Commons.² But without political parties the whole nature of the British Constitution would be changed, and many of its conventions would become unworkable. Her Majesty's Government is a party Government and the Prime Minister is the leader of the majority party in the House of Commons. The party in Opposition is Her Majesty's Opposition and it is recognised as a necessary and vital element in the working of the British Constitution. The functions of the Opposition are to criticise and vote against the policy of the Government, the party in office, with a view to overthrowing it and taking its place. Ivor Jennings has, therefore, aptly said that "a realistic survey of the British Constitution today must begin and end with parties and discuss them at length in the middle."³

The two party system. In 1882, W.S. Gilbert wrote:

"How nature always does contrive
That every boy and every gail
That's born into this world alive
Is either a little Liberal
Or else a little Conservative."

1. The Modern State, p. 396.

2. Stewart, M., The British Approach to Politics, p. 158.

3. Jennings, I., The British Constitution, p. 31.

Gilbert, of course, ignored the Irish Nationalist Party at that time and many other smaller parties and groups. During the last hundred years, Governments without a party majority have been in office for twenty-eight years and Coalition Governments for twenty-nine years.⁴ Yet in substance Gilbert was right and there is a "national" tendency for Britain to follow the two party system. Taking recent examples, in the general election of 1950 there were 1,868 candidates who contested the 625 seats and stood under as many as thirty-three different labels.⁵ It is true that every label did not indicate a separate organised party, but even then, by grouping together parties which supported each other's candidates and omitting those whose organisation was too rudimentary, there were eleven organised parties or groups of parties. In the elections held in October 1959, there were again eleven organised parties or groups of parties. In all there were 1,536 candidates standing for elections for 630 seats. "The list of eleven parties," observes Ivon Thomas, "...looks like the analysis of a cricket eleven's innings with a long string of 'ducks' following a big stand by the opening pair and a slight contribution by the first wicket down; one player has retired hurt and there is a little wag in the tail."⁶ Two main features of the election of 1950 were that there was a complete rout of all Independents and all the candidates of minor parties. Even the Liberal Party was not able to get more than nine seats, though it put 475 candidates and two of them were elected with Conservative support. The Communists put 100 candidates and got none elected. Labour secured 315 seats and the Conservatives 298. In 1951 elections, a closely fought general election, the Conservatives won 322 seats, Labour 294, Liberals and others 9. In 1955 elections the Conservatives won 345, Labour 277, Liberal 6 and Sein Finn 2. In the elections held in October, 1959, the representation was: Conservatives and supporters 365, Labour and Co-operatives 258, Liberals 6 and Independent one.⁷ In 1964 elections the Labour won 317, Conservatives 303, Liberals 9, others, which included Communists, Scotch and Welsh Nationalists, Republicans, Independents, and 23 members of individual parties, 0 seats. In the 1966 elections Labour secured 363 seats, Conservative and Associates 253, Liberal 12, Republican Labour 1, and The Speaker 1. Communists, Scottish and Welsh Nationalists, Independents and members of individual parties could secure no seat.

Elections of 1950, October 1951, May 1955, October 1959, 1964, and 1966 were between two gigantic machines and two-party system is the essence of governance in Britain. The British political parties started in the seventeenth century had two important and conflicting views on the constitutional questions, and consequently two parties.⁸ For many years

4. Ibid., p. 54.

5. Thomas, I., The Organisation of Different Parties. Parliament, A Survey, op. cit., p. 169.

6. Ibid.

7. The relative strength of parties as on July 31, 1962, was: Conservatives 365; Labour 249; Liberals 7; Independents 8; excluding Speaker, Chairman and Deputy Chairman, Ways and Means; Vacant 3.

8. The formation of two parties in Parliament dates back to the struggle over the Exclusion Bill in 1679. To check the passage of the Exclusion Bill, which was designed to prevent the succession of James, Charles II dissolved to follow there continued to be two parties. There is, indeed, a certain logic in the system. The policies which a Government can adopt are necessarily conditioned by the circumstances of the time and for the most part in Britain the real question has not been "what policy shall be followed, but the speed at which the nation shall move towards predestined end. Some wish to move rapidly and others more slowly."⁹ The cautious conservative found his place in the Conservative Party and the more adventurous in the Liberal or the Labour Party.

(Continued on next page)

Since 1846, the two main parties have tended to represent different class interests. If there has not been further split of an ostensible character, it is because of the striking homogeneity of the British economic life. And none of the class divisions have been so distinct as to entail sub-divisions. "As land decreased in importance, the "Country Party" claimed the support of other kinds of capital. As the workers gained the franchise, the employer and the salaried employee moved over with the rentiers. We have no peasants' party because we have no peasants. We have no agrarian party because the owners of land are also shareholders and company Directors. We have no farmers' party because, in the main, the interests of land owners and farmers have been the same and, indeed, it would be impossible to distinguish the two classes."¹⁰

Again, it is assumed that British Ministries must be homogeneous. "England does not love coalitions" is an old but still a widely accepted maxim, although in national emergencies Britain had always formed National Governments. In fact, party leaders had always strived for the two-party system whenever the possibility of the split had been in evidence. Disraeli, more than anyone, recognised that, "he must build his party and keep it under one roof." Lord Salisbury went to the extent of compromising with Randolph Churchill until he could be sure that if he went he would go alone. "Campbell Bennerman performed Herculean feats to keep the two wings of the Liberal Party together during the Boer War; and Balfour wrote strange economics and played even stranger politics to prevent Chamberlain from splitting another party." Even the Constitution itself was developed under the two-party system and "does its best to compel it." The single member system of election does not contemplate the existence of more than two parties. The electors, too, have become so accustomed to the two-party system that an election is really a choice of the government. The great majority of the people are not interested "in political principles, but they are concerned with what party obtains a majority."

(Continued from previous page)

Parliament. The supporters of the Bill began immediately to petition for a new Parliament, and came to be known as "Petitioners" while their opponents expressed their abhorrence of the attempt to force the King to summon Parliament and were consequently nicknamed "Abhorrrers." Soon afterwards the Petitioners became known as "Whig" and the Abhorrrers as "Tories." The two parties remained opposed in principle, though their views underwent a good deal of change in the course of time. The Whigs aimed at the restriction of the power of the Crown in favour of that of Parliament. The Tories, on the other hand, upheld Royal Power and opposed Dissent.

9. Jennings, I., The British Constitution, p. 57.

10. Ibid., p. 58.

In the House of Commons arrangements rest on an assumption that there shall be two parties and two only. There most of the benches are divided into two ranks, facing each other across an intervening space. On the front Government or Treasury bench sit Ministers, and on the front bench opposite sit the Leader of the Opposition and his associates. The procedure of the House of Commons provides for a definite part to be played by the Opposition and the Opposition is assumed to be united. The Opposition has its own "Shadow Cabinet," and its Leader is paid a salary from public funds.¹¹ "The third party is thus constantly butting into what it appears to be a private figure." It should either support the Government or vote with the Opposition, or keep aloof and abstain from voting. If it constantly supports one party and opposes the other, it loses its separate identity. If it supports sometimes the one and sometimes the other, the elector regards it inconsistent and without any conviction for a programme. The decline of the Liberal Party is primarily due to its support to the Labour Government in 1924. In the election of 1950, the Liberal Party contested 475 seats and secured only 9 seats, polling 9.11 per cent of the total votes. Now it is on the verge of total extinction. In 1955 elections they secured 6 seats polling 2.08 per cent of the total votes. In 1959 elections the six seats were retained polling 16,40,761 votes. But in 1964 elections they polled 3,093,316 or 11.2% of the votes and won 9 seats. In 1966 they polled 2,327,533 or 8.6 per cent of the votes and secured 12 seats.

These are some of the reasons which have helped the emergence and maintenance of the two-party system in Britain. It has, no doubt, some tangible defects. But it does not mean overthrowing it. "The British Constitution," aptly says Jennings, "is a nicely balanced instrument, and a change anywhere produces a change everywhere." Its greatest merit is that two-party system ensures permanent and stable government. The political homogeneity of the Government produces a well organised and a responsible team of workers who play the game of politics with singleness of purpose under the captaincy of their accredited leader, the Prime Minister. They rise and fall in unison and are individually and collectively responsible for the policy which the Cabinet initiates. Minority Governments are weak because they cannot govern. Coalition Government is uncertain of its existence from day to day because it is the result of compromise. They continue to work together so long as they can be made to agree. "In a world where strong and rapid government is necessary," concludes Jennings, "only the two-party system works well."

THE PARTIES

Origin of Parties. In the beginning when Parliament was an advisory body of the Crown, the question of parties did not arise. Parliament was asked for advice and it gave it. When given, the Crown might, or might not, take any notice of it. Two conditions were necessary for the emergence of the party system. The first was that Parliament should become a legislative body in all its essentials and its rights fully established. This stage was not reached until the late seventeenth century. And the second was that there should be political issues of a broad and deep-character about which and on which men could combine in parties. This stage was also reached in the latter part of the seventeenth century. If any date as such can be chosen for the origin of political parties, it is, as said before, 1679.

¹¹ The Leader of the Opposition is paid an annual salary of £4,500 in addition to his parliamentary salary.

The original line of cleavage was between the Tories and the Whigs. The Tories represented the country interests, those interests surviving from feudalism and which were in danger of being eaten into by the rising mercantile interests of the towns. The Whigs represented the new interests which later transformed the economic and social structure of Britain. By the same token, the Tories were associated with the Church of England, while the Whigs were associated with the Dissenters. The aristocracy, for the most part, sided with the Tories, but elements of it favoured with the Whigs. By the nineteenth century these two parties had become the Conservative¹² and Liberal and in spite of many changes and contradictions something of the old differences between them survived. They competed with each other for power throughout the latter part of the nineteenth century and well into the twentieth century till Labour Party replaced the Liberal Party in the political arena.

Barker cites an old story which once upon a time was widely current in Britain. The story went that when Liberty, Equality and Fraternity had to be distributed between France, England, and the United States, the English came first and took away Liberty, the French came next and took Equality, and the Americans coming last, took the residuary gift of Fraternity.¹³ If these gifts, continues Barker, were to be distributed among the three political parties in Britain, it would be just to say that the Liberals took Liberty, the Conservatives took the gift of Fraternity and the Labour Party adopted the residuary gift of Equality.¹⁴ The Liberals were the party of progress, reform, improvement and liberty. The Conservatives were the party of authority, tradition, conservatism and fraternity. The Labour Party views man as a man on the equal basis and stands for removing the hindrances and obstacles which divide men into conflicting classes because of the uneven distribution of wealth.

The Conservative Party. The Conservative Party, as stated above, has passed through many names. The name Conservative, which has now been for more than a century its general name, hardly denotes its essential nature. It values, according to Herbert Morrison, traditions and precedents.¹⁵ "The essence of conservatism," says Dr. Finer, "is to be discovered in the social institutions of which it approves and its attitude to the idea of progress. The social institutions favoured by Conservatives are Crown and national unity, church, a powerful governing class, and the freedom of private property from State interference."¹⁶ It would,

12. The Conservative Party is sometimes referred to as the Tory Party and the Labour Party as the Socialist Party. But the official titles are Conservative Party and Labour Party.

13. Barker, E., Britain and the British People, p. 43.

14. Ibid.

15. Government and Parliament, p. 131.

16. Theory and Practice of Modern Government, p. 312.

thus, appear that Conservatives steadfastly adhere to old traditional forms and solemn ceremonies. They dislike criticism to old institutions, such as Monarchy, and emphasise the duty of loyalty to the King and the State which he personifies. The Conservative sense of nationality is intense, "and its most frequent judgment is that such and such a foreign country or sect is untrustworthy."¹⁷ It has faith in the superiority of the race to all other races. It believes in the mission of the race, popularly called the white man's burden, to civilise other peoples, even against their will, and "even with violence to the point of brutality." Its attitude, as revealed in her history for a century or more, was neither conservative nor cautious. It has been rather a fanatical clinging to the notion of fraternity or unity. Empire is its very breath and Churchill's famous remark, that he had not become His Majesty's first Minister to preside over the dissolution of the British Empire, was no accident. The Conservative Party clung down to 1922 to the unity of the United Kingdom in face of the pressing demand, which eventually took a revolutionary form, for Irish Home Rule. It again clung, under the inspiration of Disraeli and later of Joseph Chamberlain, to the unity of the British Empire by economic ties. Today, it clings, in the face of the idea of the class division, to the idea of the social unity and homogeneity of the nation.

Since one of the chief things to be conserved today is the structure of capitalism, the Conservative Party is accordingly allied to the cause of private property and private enterprise. The great industrialists are, thus, joined to the old aristocracy in the conservative ranks. This union, encouraged by Peel in the second quarter of the nineteenth century, was, indeed, the making of the Conservative Party as distinct from the old Tory Party of the landed classes. The Tory element still remains, forming the Right wing of the party; a few of these called "Diehards" are inclined to regard all change with disfavour. Majority of the Conservatives, however, urge that capitalism must be justified not only to the rich but to all classes; democracy should be preserved and social services extended. Nor, in their view, must support of capitalism mean complete abandonment of industry to private enterprise; the Government should keep watch and, where necessary, give assistance in such forms as tariffs, subsidies and marketing organisations. Nationalist feelings and the interests of industrialists combine to make the party favour the protection of home industries as a remedy against unemployment. In the twentieth century it took the form of Imperial preference and extension of inter-Imperial trade.

Among the younger members of the party a sharp swing towards a vigorous and progressive programme competing with the Labour Party has recently been in prominent evidence. The publication in 1947 of the Industrial Charter, which accepted the need for central planning, and the emphatic endorsement of this Charter by the Conservative Conference of 1947 is not only indicative of the victory of this group, but also a vital change in the attitudes of the Conservatives. The Right Road for Britain, the Conservative statement of policy in 1949, pledged the "maintenance of full employment" and endorsed the importance and utility of social services. The Conservative Party manifesto of 1951 emphasised the need for housing and pledged to it a priority second only to national defence. In 1955 elections, the Conservatives pledged to "prosperity through free enterprise." In October 1959, the election manifesto read, "the main issues at this election are simple: (1) Do you want to go ahead on the lines which have brought prosperity at home? (2) Do you want your present leaders to represent you abroad?" In a personal preface, Harold Macmillan observed, "I do not remember any period in my lifetime when the economy has been so sound and the prosperity of our people at home so widely spread." In 1964 elections the Conservative slogan was "Prosperity with a Purpose." Labour appealed on "New Britain" programme. The only difference between the two programmes is on emphasis, otherwise distinction between the two is none.

17. Ibid., p. 313.

The Party derives its support from the possessing and patriotic and traditional governing class, of the wealthy, the aristocratic and the sub-aristocratic, the gentry, the upper and middle class, as well as working-class patriots, disgruntled workers, and high-skilled workers whose pride aligns them with the party that preaches the rewards and opportunities of free enterprise.

The Conservative Party is built around the party leader. The leader is not appointed on a sessional basis; once elected he remains leader until he dies or resigns, as it happened in the case of Churchill. When he retires his successor is usually designated by him. Even if the leader dies without having made a clear choice his successor is usually obvious. A Conservative Prime Minister is always party leader even if he is not very palatable to other important luminaries of the party. When Churchill was appointed Prime Minister in succession to Neville Chamberlain, his leadership to party came as a matter of course despite his unpopularity with the diehards.

The leader of the Conservative Party possesses powers much beyond those of the leader of the Labour Party. He appoints the Chairman of the party organisation at central office and is responsible for the elaboration of and statements of party policy. While in Opposition he selects the members of the House of Commons and Lords to act with him in the 'Shadow Cabinet.' The authority of the party's leader was succinctly stated by the party's Chairman in 1947. He said, "His authority is based on free election, and the confidence of his supporters. Resolutions passed by the National Union are sent to him for his information and guidance, but no resolution, however emphatic, binds him on questions of policy. This method suits us, and has suited the succession of great men we have been proud to have as our leaders." Thus, in 1945 the Party's manifesto was entitled "Mr. Churchill's Declaration of Policy to the Electors." In 1950, the manifesto was prefaced with an introduction by Mr. Churchill and that of 1951 began with "I" and was signed personally by him.

The Conservative Party has now broken with a hoary tradition regarding the election of its leader. They have decided that their next leader should be chosen by free ballot among the Party's members of the House of Commons.

The Liberal Party. The Liberal Party is now not a major party, though for many generations it had been one of the two large parties, "and even today the Liberals are not a minor party in their intellectual capacity or the quality of their leadership." It has become an army of generals without any adequate body of troops. So long as its principle lives, a Liberal Party will continue to live. In 1945, it secured about two and a quarter million votes and of 306 candidates it put only twelve were elected, and seven out of this total represented districts in Wales. In 1950, the number of votes cast in favour of the Liberal Party was over two and a half million, but only 9 candidates were elected, and 319 lost their deposits. In 1951 there was a sharp decrease in the number of votes and it could get in only six Liberal members. In 1955 and again in 1959 elections they retained the old number, though as a result of by-elections the number increased to 7 by July 31, 1962. In 1964 general elections the number of votes cast in favour of Liberals was 3,093,316 and they won 9 seats. In 1966, their number rose to 12, although the percentage of votes cast fell from 11.2 to 8.6.

The party has stood, at all times, for liberty in all its aspects. It has championed the cause of religious liberty and particularly the right of the Nonconformists to worship freely and to gain emancipation from the civic disabilities under which they suffered. It has championed the cause of political liberty, the right of every citizen to an equal share of the suffrage, and the right of the House of Commons, elected popularly, to a final and sovereign voice. The Parliament Act of 1911 was the triumph of the Liberals and a vindication of their creed of liberty.

The Liberals were opponents of government restraint and championed Laissez-faire. In the mid-nineteenth century they represented the trading and manufacturing classes as against the landed class. The popular element in Liberalism, however, caused the party to advocate social reforms which conflicted with the individualism of the nineteenth century. Today, the Liberals have recognised that there is a liberty of the worker which has also to be secured. The Capitalist-Socialist issue for them is not as important as it is often supposed. The Conservatives' fondness for aristocracy and for tariff and Labour's plan for collectivist control all appear to Liberals as dangerous to the liberty of the individual. While rejecting Socialism, they advocate considerable reforms in Capitalism. They are prepared to socialise some industries if it can be proved that this would increase efficiency, but do not regard nationalisation as essential for the proper arrangement of society. They go still further and advocate the diffusion of property, i.e., the workers in each enterprise are gradually to become partners by receiving a share of its profits in the form of share in its capital. They also advocate the democratization of enterprise and would have each industry governed by an industrial council representing both workers and employers. In the same way, they would have each work or factory provided with a works council representing both sides. The Liberal Party, in brief, proposes a kind of partnership of management and labour in industrial affairs. Private ownership and management would remain, but through representative councils and profit-sharing schemes the workers would achieve a stake in the business.

The Liberals are not Socialists but they approach Socialism in two directions. First, by advocating the socialisation of all enterprises which can be best conducted by the State, and secondly, by seeking to introduce the principle of social co-operation in the manner just described. "They believe neither in a regime of private enterprise, nor in one of pure socialism, but in a mixed regime which combines features and elements of both, according to the needs of the nation, and progressively changes the proportion of the elements with the movement of national needs." The aim of the Liberal Party is to build a liberal Commonwealth, in which every citizen will possess liberty, property and security, and none shall be enslaved by poverty, ignorance or unemployment. The Liberals, accordingly, claim that they represent not a single class but the whole nation and are not tied to a theory; they consider every proposal on its merits. They oppose the tariff policy of the Conservatives and on immediate problems in the Imperial and foreign field and take a view very similar to that of Labour.

The party is supported by those of moderate incomes and by a lesser proportion of both the rich and the poor. In some districts there is a strong liberal tradition, often associated with Non-conformity. But many of the Liberals feel that they can now make them of more effect by supporting the Conservative and Labour parties and thereby bringing a liberalising influence on their policies. In fact, in a country with a political system which groups citizens into two sides—the side of the government and the side of the Opposition—the position of the third party, with numbers inferior to the other two, is inevitably shaken. Moreover, today it is an almost irresistible temptation to "make one's vote to count" by supporting a party which has a chance to win and the party to win is either the Conservative or the Labour. "The result has been a downward spiral Liberal power." It will be interesting to note that whereas in 1950 the Liberals "bitterly rejected the overtures of the Conservatives, in 1951 seven Liberal candidates received Conservative support."¹⁸ Yet, it is claimed in many Liberal circles that Proportional Representation would allow the strength of Liberal feeling in the country to be fairly expressed. The possibility of such a reform is, indeed, remote in England and it would not be surprising if the Liberal Party is completely jostled out of the political field in the very near future.

The Labour Party. The Labour Party which is a political expression of a working class movement, belongs to the present century, though traces of the movement can be found from the Industrial Revolution which created large masses of urban workers divorced from the occupation of land or ownership of means of production. This movement manifested itself in Trade Unions, and in co-operative societies and in the Chartist agitation which demanded universal male suffrage. But it was not until the franchise was extended in the late nineteenth century that an effective political party could arise. The Labour Party was formed in 1906 and from that date it has grown rapidly and emerged from the General Election of 1922 as the second largest party.

Labour presents itself as the party of democratic socialism and the socialist objectives of the party embrace the public ownership of the key industries and those economic enterprises that are natural monopolies. In all, the Labour Party considers that roughly 20 per cent of the economic life of the country should be owned and managed by the State and the remaining 80 per cent should continue under private ownership, but strictly regulated by government in conformity with the economic planning of the State.

18. Carter, G.M., and Others, The Government of Great Britain, p. 81.

According to Labour Party policy, economic planning and control should be directed by a democratically chosen government. The Party believes that through persuasion a majority of the population can be won to the Labour programme. The regulation and control which a socialist economy requires should not according to the Labour Party, impinge upon the basic civil liberties of the citizen. Freedom of discussion and criticism, they believe, should be adequately safeguarded, and the socialist way must win its victory in free competition with the programmes of other political parties. Here, the Labour Party is sharply opposed to Communist philosophy, however much their economic and social objectives may be alike.

The driving force of the Labour Party is less a passion for socialism than a passion for social equality. It strives to achieve political, social and economic emancipation of all the people, and more particularly of those who directly depend upon their own exertions by hand or brain for the means of life. It is, in fact, as has been suggested, a "party of levellers" in a country which needs levelling, and protect the wage-earning class from the various disabilities which retard their progress and amelioration. In brief, the Labour Party aims to safeguard the individual citizen from the cradle to the grave by providing remedial measures against all social ills and devising means to constantly improving standard of living for all citizens of the country. This programme is the content of a welfare State. The Labour Party, thus, "seeks to light Britain forward into a new era of equality with less of a zest, perhaps, for the technique of social change, and less of concern for the question whether or not that technique involves a policy of socialism, and more far more of a passion for the reality of social change and the actual coming of equality."¹⁹ It carried through substantial nationalisation of industry in its period of office, 1945 to 1951 and fiscal reforms of an equalitarian nature. The Party is sincerely, genuinely, and deeply liberal and democratic and is "inspired by the Bible," as Dr. Finer says, "rather than Das Kapital."²⁰

Labour's view of the Empire is that self-government should as soon as possible be extended to those territories which do not yet enjoy it. For, the realization of that end, they would encourage the development of colonial resources, the extension of social services and the encouragement of native trade union and co-operative activity. In international affairs, while its ultimate aim is a world Socialist Commonwealth, but its immediate aim is to strive and strengthen the bonds between the United Nations and the establishment of that collective security which the League of Nations failed to secure. The student of party programmes will, however, observe that the avowed differences between different parties are mostly with regard to the ownership and control of means of production. In "social, imperial and international affairs the professed immediate policies of all parties are very similar: the elector has to judge whether Capitalism or Socialism is more likely to produce the desired results, and, perhaps which party is by its nature, personnel and record the more capable of progress."²¹

19. Barker, E., Britain and the British People, p. 48.

20. Governments of Greater European Powers, op. cit., p. 61.

Labour Party finds its support among wage-earners in the town, and to much less degree, in the country-side. A number of middle class people, who are hostile to capitalistic structure of society and consider it a menace for the future, also support Labour. And, in fact, from all walks of life come persons who have adopted the socialist view of life.

In organisation, the Labour Party presents a Federation embracing Trade Unions, Socialist Societies like the Fabian Society, and individual members. Its structure is more elaborate than that of other parties and the resolutions passed at its annual conference determine its policy. There is no "leader" in the same sense as the Conservatives have. The leader is elected by the Parliamentary Labour Party, which is composed of all members of the party who have seat in the House of Commons. As long as the party is in Opposition, its day-to-day policy is decided upon in caucus, but when the party is in power, direction rests in the hands of the leaders who are, of course, in the Cabinet. Even then constant liaison exists between leaders and back-benchers and periodic conferences are held in which the Government's policy is discussed. These conferences become quite stormy when a "rebellion" brews, but discipline usually prevails in the end and the party leaders have their way. Such rebellion usually comes from the left wing of the party and the most recent example is that of Aneurin Bevin, who was disowned by the Parliamentary Labour Party and recommended that the whip be withdrawn, though Bevin was given another opportunity by the Party Executive to "mend" himself.

The basic organisation of the party is the party conference. It is composed of delegates from all member organisations. One vote is cast for each 1,000 members of affiliated organisations. The trade unions with their 4½ million members have by far the majority. The party conference elects the National Executive Committee. It manages party affairs and directs the central office. In theory, the Executive Committee is subordinate to the conference, but in actuality it is its leader. The leader of the Parliamentary party is its ex-officio member. The executive is usually the author of the party programme and directs, through the central office, all the vast activities of the party. What makes the executive really powerful is the rule that no one may carry the party label in an election without its approval. Moreover, it has the power to expel individual members or to disaffiliate organisations from the party, though such actions are subject to review before the party conference.

21. Steward, M., The British Approaches to Politics, p. 164.

The Labour Party secured a precarious majority of 5 votes to form the Government in the elections of 1964. The total number of votes cast in favour of the Party were 12,205,507 (44.1 per cent) and won 317 seats as compared with Conservatives' votes of 12,002,407 (43.4 per cent) and 303 seats. In 1966 elections it won 363 seats, thus ensuring a majority of 97 votes and polled 47.9 per cent votes.

SUGGESTED READINGS

- | | |
|----------------------------|---|
| Bailey, S. | : Political Parties and the Party System of Britain. |
| Barker, E. | : Britain and the British People (1943), Chap. II. |
| Blondel, J. | : Parties and Leaders. |
| Briers, P.M. and Others | : Papers on Parliament, A Symposium (1949), "The Party System and National Interests." |
| Bulmer-Thomas, Ivor | : The Party System in Great Britain. |
| Campion, and Others | : Parliament: A Survey , Chap. VIII. |
| Finer, H. | : The Theory and Practice of Modern Government , Chap. XVI. |
| Gollan, J. | : The British Political System. |
| Gooch, R.K. | : The Government of England , Chap. V. |
| Greaves, H.R.G. | : The British Constitution , Chap. VI. |
| Jennings, W.I. | : The British Constitution , Chap. I. |
| Laski, H.J. | : Parliamentary Government in England , Chap. II. |
| Lowell, A. L. | : The Government of England , Vol I, Chaps. XXIV-XXX, Vol. II, Chaps. XXI-XXXVII. |
| McKenzie, R.T. | : British Political Parties. |
| Morrison, H. | : Government and Parliament , pp. 78-82, 114-15 and Chap. VII. |
| Neumann, R.G. | : European and Comparative Governments , Chap. VIII. |
| Rose, R. (Ed.) | : Studies in British Politics. |
| Stewart, M. | : The British Approach to Politics , Chap. XIII. |

CHAPTER XI

LOCAL GOVERNMENT

Importance of Local Government. "The local assemblies of citizens," wrote De Tocqueville more than a century ago, "constitute the strength of free nations. Town meetings are to liberty what primary schools are to science; they bring it within the people's reach, they teach men how to use and how to enjoy it. A nation may establish system of free government, but without the spirit of municipal institutions it cannot have the spirit of liberty." The educative value of representative government, largely depends on the development of local institutions. Local government is a school for democracy. It cultivates a sense of civic duties and inculcates among citizens a corporate spirit of common administration of common interests. All problems of administration are not central problems. It should, accordingly, be the responsibility of the inhabitants of the area concerned to solve their local problems which are peculiar to that area. Neighbourhood makes us automatically aware of interests which impinge upon us more directly than upon others. And what is done by common counsel in the solution of the common problems gives us a degree of satisfaction which is unobtainable when it is done for us by others from outside. Local government may, accordingly, be defined as government by popular elected bodies charged with administrative and executive duties in matters concerning the inhabitants of a particular district or place and vested with powers to make by-laws¹ for their guidance.

Some fundamental aspects of the English system. The history of local government in Britain is one of gradual development. Blackstone has correctly maintained that "the liberties of England may be ascribed above all things to her free local institutions. Since the days of their Saxon ancestors, her sons have learned at their own gates the duties and responsibilities." The marked genius of the British for self-government may, accordingly, be traced to the root of local self-government. Parliament became strong, and a system of parliamentary democracy was eventually established, because the counties and boroughs from which the members of Parliament were drawn "had a sap of native vigour and an instinct for self-government." The old methods of local government have, indeed, been greatly altered by the legislation during the past century or so, but "the whole of the change," as Barker puts it, "has only strengthened an old and vigorous system of national liberty—so old that it is anterior to the system of national liberty; so vigorous that it has supplied the sap and the stimulus to that system." The general mainspring and the fountain of initiative is locally elected bodies. These elected bodies determine local policies and are organs of local government. As organs of government, they make their own local rules or by-laws, raise and spend their own local rates, and appoint and control their own administrative staffs for carrying out their functions of local services. But as organs of government in local areas, they are parts of the general system of government in the country and, as such, subject to the control of Parliament and the Central Government. Parliament determines and can always modify their activities and their powers. The Central Government and its administrative staff audits, inspects and supervises their activities and such a supervision and direction becomes all the more necessary because Parliament subsidizes the local rates by 'grants-in-aid' from the central taxes. In spite of this control local government in Britain is infinitely more self-reliant than is customary on the Continent of Europe. There is no all-powerful Minister of the Interior, as in France, whose hand weighs heavily on the shoulders of local authorities. "Under such circumstances, free men may assemble in their councils, pretty much as of yore, and impress the mark of their personalities on their environment." Many leading statesmen of the country, in the past and during our own times, began their careers in the councils of local government. Taking recent examples, Joseph and Neville Chamberlain were both Lords Mayors of Birmingham, Herbert Morrison first became prominent, as President of the London County Council.

1. Laws of local application which must be approved by the appropriate Minister.

Development. The history of local government in Britain is one of gradual development. Until modern times its machinery was not organised in accordance with any particular plan, but grew up haphazard to satisfy particular needs. Since there was no co-ordination, the overlapping of functions, disorder, and a loss of efficiency were inevitable.

The present counties and parishes find their origin in the shires and hundreds, vills or townships of pre-Norman days. The Central Government of England was largely super-imposed upon existing local organization. In the Middle Ages each county or shire had its court or governmental assembly, presided over by the Sheriff as the royal representative and composed of the freemen of the county. The county court performed general governmental as well as judicial functions. Within the county were hundred courts similarly composed and under the supervision of the Sheriffs. The manorial courts of the feudal system were the courts of the smaller units, the vill and the township. Boroughs which obtained Charters from the Crown, possessed varying degree of autonomy. From the time of Henry II royal justice began to cover the whole country through the circuits of justices. The local and manorial courts were superseded and with them the office of the Sheriff lost much of its former importance. In the fourteenth century the newly created justices of the peace acquired judicial, administrative and police powers. The parish which was hitherto an ecclesiastical unit, also became the unit of local administration. It was the parish which was responsible for the repair of roads and later for the administration of Elizabethan poor law.

No attempt was made after the Revolution Settlement in 1689 to reimpose central administrative control. Apart from the boroughs, which were largely autonomous acting under their charter powers, general local administration was in the hands of the county justices sitting in the Quarter Sessions. This was all altered by the century of reform between 1835 and 1935. The results were mainly three. One was the reform and democratization of the organs of local government. The second was a reform and clarification of the powers and functions of local government. The third was a reform and elucidation of the connection between local and Central Government. The reform of the organs of local government was a long and complicated process, because from 1835 to 1888 Britain pursued the curious policy of creating a new ad hoc authority to deal with each new local need that emerged. Not only that, each new authority was given a different area of operation from that of the old authorities. The Local Government Act of 1888 drastically altered all this. It instituted democratic county councils, with a general competence, in place of the old system of Justices of the Peace, mixed with the ad hoc bodies which had recently been added to it. The light has progressively grown. The existing system of Local Government is based mainly on six distinct types of authority—the Administrative County, the County Borough, the Non-County Borough, the Urban District, the Rural District and the Parish. Of the authorities responsible for the government of these six, the first and the second date from 1888; the third from 1835, subject to modifications made in 1882; the fourth and fifth and sixth from 1894. The London County Council was set up in 1889, as successor to the indirectly elected Metropolitan Board of Works.

With regard to the power and functions of local government, and their progressive reform and clarification since 1835, there now exists a system of what may be called integral local government, under which each major authority generally conducts the whole of local government in its area. The system of integral local government gives local authority a large initiative in such matters as roads and transport, police, public health, public education, public assistance and the supply of public services such as housing, gas, water, and electricity. Here is a large field for the determination and conduct of local policy. It will thus be obvious that a progressive authority can take action which will vitally affect the health, the growth of the mind, and the general well-being of all its area. It may, however, be noted that since 1945, local authorities have lost their responsibility for hospitals, and for gas and electricity services, and at present there is much pressure for the nationalization of other services, especially education, police and water distribution.

Connection between Local and Central Government. It is here that the connection of local government with the central government begins to show its importance. It becomes, accordingly, necessary to know the development and the present method of that connection. The central government has obviously a duty of stimulating local initiative where it is backward and checking it where it abuses its authority or does things beyond its powers. This necessitates a system of contact, of co-operation, and of interaction between the local elected bodies, with their local administrative staffs, and the departments of the central government with their administrative officers. The system of "grants-in-aid" paid from the public funds in subvention of local finances is a significant step directed to control and supervise the activities of local bodies. In fact, grants-in-aid are paid only on condition that central government and its officials inspect and supervise their spending and the operation of the services on which such grants are spent. The power of the purse of the central government may, therefore, be said to have bought a measure of control over local government and it has cost heavily to the autonomy of the local bodies. Another way of financing by the central government is the system of block grants.

Like all other institutions, local government, too, is subject to the supreme authority of Parliament and such laws as it may enact. Beyond that the various government departments supervise the work of local government and see that the statutory authority is fulfilled. The Home Office inspects and to a certain extent supervises the police forces, except in the Metropolitan District of London, where the police is directly administered by the Home Office. The latter is also in charge of local civil defence work, especially the Home Guard. In addition, Ministerial consent is required for certain actions by local authorities, including the making of by-laws, and the appointment of some officials. Building plans require Ministerial approval, and the administration of some services, particularly the police, fire brigade, and education is subject to examination by Ministry Inspectors. Some legislation that gives powers to local authorities, particularly with regard to planning and land development, allows for appeals to the appropriate Minister. The Treasury must give its consent to borrowing by local government. Generally speaking, the appropriate central government departments supervise the work of local authorities, keep them in line, and establish rules with regard to procedure, organization, qualifications of officials, equipment, and general objectives.

Since local powers and duties originate from Acts of Parliament and are enforced by courts, the central government may obtain from the High Court a writ requiring any neglect of legal duty to be repaired. Any private person who has suffered loss as a result of negligence of local authority can bring a civil action. In like manner the courts are used to check action which is ultra vires. Central government may also invalidate local ordinances which may go beyond powers granted to the local authorities. In health, housing or other services where neglect can have the gravest results, a Justice of Peace, or simply four ratepayers in the area, can invoke the aid of the Ministry of Health to enquire into local inefficiency and, perhaps, take over the duties itself.

Changing social conditions and broadening conceptions of the functions of government have broken new ground for central government control, and the end is not in sight. New central agencies, notably of the kind we call public corporations, are established to undertake new services or to replace the agencies of local government. Considerable transfer of functions takes place from smaller to larger geographical units in the existing local government structure and even the word "local" takes on a new significance.² The policy of co-ordination and standardization, which is so prominent a feature of our times, has deeply penetrated the realm of local government. The statutory provisions concerning meetings, committees and the form of audit of accounts ensure that in each area there shall be similar machinery whatever the extent to which it is used. Meanwhile the central government brings a constant influence to bear through its inspectors. Not only are satisfactory reports from them the condition of grants-in-aid, but the resulting accumulation of knowledge shows to the central government what changes in the law have become necessary. Circulars acquaint local authorities with the policy which the central government wishes them to pursue and if the latter finds its legal powers insufficient, it can always propose new laws and bring them on the statute. Occasionally, if the local authority uses its power in a way of which the government strongly disapproves, a special Act will be passed handing over the powers to Commissioners appointed by the Minister of Health.

2. Campion and Others, British Government Since 1918, p. 198.

It will, thus be seen that the methods of central control are numerous. Local government though still admired and ardently cherished in Britain, has now become a hazy sphere of local action distinct from central government. Certain services once accepted as purely local have assumed national significance. The local school is part of a national educational system; public assistance is no longer a community task but a national responsibility, even gas and electricity, once characteristically municipal services, have now been nationalized. Much premium has, during recent years, been placed on administrative considerations in demarcating the sphere of central and local government. J.H. Warren while reviewing the changes which have taken place in the scope and system of English Local Government, writes: "The particular sphere to be assigned to local government is not a question which is, or wholly can be determined by considerations of democratic freedom and responsibility, viewed as capable of development by ties of neighbourhood and the activity of local communities; or even by the consideration that local self-government is an educative process and invaluable to democracy on that account. The assignment of local government functions must have some regard to administrative consideration."³ The assignment of local government functions, particularly after the First World War, is significant of this fact.

Nonetheless local administration and to a limited extent the framing of policy remain functions of local authorities. The central government secures the co-operation of local authorities and the relationship is one of friendly partnership. Local authorities are not branches of Departments in Whitehall, though they operate some of the central services on an agency basis. Their members are elected by the districts they serve. Their services are administered by their own officers. The over-all record of the councils and their committees is splendid. In any system of political governance, the central government must control the local, however autonomous the local government may be. But there is one important difference between the control of local government in Britain and in other countries, such as France. In France the control of the central government over the local is a control of an executive character, which goes so far that it practically eliminates local government, in any exact sense of the word, and remits the control of local policy to local administrative officials acting for the central executive. The British system of local government, on the other hand, is a half-way House which combines both legislative and executive control. "The value of this system," according to Barker, "is that it is kinder to local government than pure executive control and more elastic in its application to the differences of local governing bodies than purely legislative control. Parliament offers grants to local authorities as an equal might offer to equals: the executive, watching the actual operation of spending of these grants, can use an elastic discretion to suit each particular case—seeking indeed to standardise, but seeking to do so by stimulating the laggard and holding back the impatient, according to the needs and demands of each particular case." The preoccupation of the local councils and committees with administrative matters guarantees that democratic procedures are maintained on all levels.

3. Ibid., p. 195.

PRINCIPAL TYPES OF LOCAL AUTHORITY

For purposes of local government, England and Wales and Northern Ireland are divided into county boroughs and administrative counties. Administrative counties (outside London) are further divided into three types of county district: non-county borough; urban districts; and rural districts. Rural districts are themselves sub-divided into parishes (except in Northern Ireland). Scotland is divided into counties (including four counties of cities) which are independently administered; large and small burghs; and districts. Each local authority division is administered by a different council. The London Government Act, 1963, which came into force on April 1, 1965, has reduced the number of county, borough and urban district councils in England.

The Parish. Although England is divided into Parishes for church purposes, the Parish, as a local authority, exists only in the countryside. Where the population is less than three hundred there is usually no council and the affairs of the Parish are managed by a Parish meeting which all ratepayers may attend. In the larger Parishes a council of from five to fifteen members is elected at a Parish meeting and they hold office for three years. The duties of the Parish Council or Meeting are slight. It acts as a minor education authority and may provide public works, recreation grounds, and protect local rights of way. Sometimes an Act may enable them to see to the lighting of the village, and higher authorities may hand over to them the care of the water supply and the repairing of footpaths. A Parish may have a paid clerk, but there is no other paid official.

The District. A group of Parishes forms a Rural District and if the development of industry turns a Parish into a small town, it may request the County Council to make it into an Urban District. The Councils of both types of Districts are elected for a period of three years, one-third retiring after every one year. The Chairman may be one of the Councillors, or chosen from outside, but in either case he has the powers of a Justice of Peace during his term of office.

The Districts enjoy greater dignity and power than the Parish. They are used by central government as housing authorities, and, thus, have the power to acquire land and to build, and the duty of dealing with slums and overcrowding. As sanitary authorities, District Councils may provide for water supply and other sanitary measures. Trunk roads are maintained directly by the Ministry of Transport and other major roads by counties, whereas the unclassified roads, for which no grant is made by the Ministry, must be maintained by the Urban District Councils. In the countryside, although the county is the responsible authority, it frequently delegates the work to the Rural Districts.

District Councils have often owned or shared in the management of public utilities. With the nationalisation of gas and electricity, however, this field of activity has been greatly reduced. District Councils keep a number of paid officials, e.g., a Clerk, Treasurer, Medical Officer of Health, Sanitary Inspector, and Surveyor of Highways. An Urban District Council has some additional powers, such as that to provide allotments, libraries and public baths. Where the population exceeds 25,000 a Stipendiary Magistrate can be appointed. There is, in fact, little to choose between the large Urban District and the smaller Borough.

The County. England still clings to the county system of the past that has come down through the centuries. The fifty-two historical counties are relics of former times and are shorn of all important functions. They have no elected councils and have only three principal officials, the Lord Lieutenant, the Sheriffs and the Justice of the Peace. The office of the Lord Lieutenant has great dignity and is usually held by a wealthy county gentleman. He has charge of the county records and recommends suitable persons to be Justices of the Peace. The Sheriff is responsible for making all the preparations necessary for the holding of Assizes.

There are now sixty-two Administrative Counties superimposed over the historical councils. Every Administrative County is divided into Electoral Divisions, each returning one Councillor at the elections, which are held once every three years. The Councillors, when elected, choose a number of Aldermen equal to a third of their own number. Frequently Councillors themselves are Aldermen, and this necessitates a by-election to provide a new Councillor. The term Aldermen goes back to the times of the Saxons when it meant men chosen for their maturity of age and experience to assist in government. Today, it has no reference to age. They are elected for six years, one-half retiring at the time of each Council election. Greater length of office, no doubt, equips them with experience of the Council work. It also enables talented persons, who do not wish to face the mud and mire of election campaigns, to get elected. The Chairman of the County Council is elected in the same manner as the Chairman of a District Council, and has the same right of acting as a Justice of the Peace. The Council can pay a salary to the Chairman and travelling expenses incurred by members when doing Council work.

The County Councils are responsible for the policy and the administration of the county and supervise the work of subordinate bodies. The Councils also act as agents for the central government, co-operating with it to administer Public Assistance and Pensions. They maintain the ordinary local services, building and asylums. They also administer the licensing laws except for liquor, and appoint the regular administrative personnel of the county.

New and very considerable powers and duties have been imposed on the Councils as a result of two important statutes, the Education Act of 1944, and the Town and County Planning Acts of 1944 and 1947. The Education Act of 1944 has made counties responsible for the education service at all stages. This task was previously shared between Counties, Boroughs, and Urban Districts. Legislation passed after the war of 1939-45 has made the County the responsible authority for the Health Service and for Town and County Planning, the latter had become necessary for the reconstruction of war devastated areas in line with a general plan. In addition to this general work, the County Council must give attention to agriculture, and its duties in this respect have been considerably increased.

The old and new forms of county government are brought together by the Standing Joint Committee, half of whose members are Justices, and half County Councillors. This Committee appoints the Chief Constable of the County, and organises a police force in accordance with the law and the Home Office regulations. The police are inspected annually by the Home Office, and if the result is satisfactory, half the expenses will be met by the central government. Subject to this control, the County police are responsible for all police duties within their area.

The Borough. A unit of local government of a special type is the Borough, which is simply a Town with a Charter. An Urban or Rural District which desires to become a Borough petitions to Her Majesty in Council for a Charter. If as few as five per cent of the local ratepayers object, an Act of Parliament will be necessary.

The Borough is governed by a Borough Council constituted similar to a County and District Council. The Borough is divided for election purposes into wards, each returning three, or a multiple of three, Councillors. One-third of the Councillors retire each year. The Councillors choose Aldermen to one-third of their number, as for County Councils. The Borough Council selects its own Mayor either from among the Councillors or from outside; and he holds office for a year and may be re-elected. Besides being the Chairman of the Council, he presides over the local bench of the Justices of Peace during his year of office, and continues to act as Justice of Peace for the following year. Generally, his functions are ceremonial.

The Borough status gives a town a much greater degree of dignity and civic pride. It also means larger expenses for pomp and ceremonial occasions. All Boroughs possess, as a minimum, the powers of a large Urban District Council, and those additional powers which the Charter confers. Any Borough may by ancient custom or Royal Order be called a city, but this is only a dignity and involves no legal powers. The Mayors of some of the most famous cities are called Lord Mayors. Just like the County Council, the Borough Council operates chiefly through Committees. The Council manages the corporate estate and the borough fund. It establishes the borough rates. It has its own budget and appropriates money. Subject to approval by the central government, it may borrow money. It also administers the municipal services which are often quite extensive.

The Government of London. London is the largest capital city and with the exception of New York, the greatest metropolitan area in the world. Today, there is still the old city keeping its boundaries, street names and forms of local administration which as they were centuries ago. Round this city have grown the dwellings of millions, rich and poor. Systematic government for this huge district dates back on to the last century.

The city of London properly speaking is an area of about one square mile located in the heart of London, primarily the business and financial centre, in which over a million people are active during the day but in which few people live at night. It is divided into twenty-six wards each of which returns, according to its size, a number of Councillors to the Court of Common Council, elected by those with residence or business qualification in the city. In addition to the 206 Councillors elected annually, the Court of Common Council contains 26 Aldermen, elected directly by citizens and holding their office for life. These together with the Lord Mayor, form a separate Court of Aldermen. Another, and the third body, is called the Court of Common Hall and it consists of the Court of Aldermen and the Liverymen of the city companies. These companies are the survivors of the ancient guilds. Today they have none of their old duties and in reality these are now private societies of wealthy men. The Court of Common Hall annually selects two Aldermen, one of whom will be elected Lord Mayor by the Court of Aldermen.

The Court of Common Council is the real governing body of the city. It relies on the county for its municipal services, although it has a small police force and courts. It also controls certain areas outside the city limits. The city of London is the scene of magnificent ceremonies especially on the annual Lord Mayor's Day held at the Guild Hall.

The London County Council. The Act of 1888 set up a County Council for London. Its structure and that of Metropolitan Boroughs are now consolidated in the London Government Act of 1939. The London County Council bears only a general resemblance to other County Councils, there being three important differences. It is organised differently, for the electoral divisions are those used in the return of members of Parliament for the Metropolis, the County Councillors being twice as numerous; the Aldermen are in the proportion of one to six, instead of one to three Councillors; and the Chairman of L.C.C. is a very dignified president with no control of policy. Secondly, an ordinary County Council receives authority once for all over the ancient county area, minus its County Boroughs. The L.C.C. received authority over the Administrative County of London. The third difference is that the L.C.C. inherited the functions of the old Board of Works as well as acquiring those of the County Council.

The hundred and twenty-nine Councillors choose twenty Aldermen who hold office for six years, half of them retiring at the end of a three-year period. The Chairman of the Council may be chosen from outside as was Lord Snell in 1934. The powers of the L.C.C. are extensive indeed. It is the sole authority with respect to main sewers and sewage disposal, fire protection, tunnels and ferries and bridges. It is responsible for street improvements which are metropolitan. Its power also extends to the construction and operation of tramways, and it has undertaken several rehousing schemes, involving the demolition of slum areas and the erection of workmen dwellings. It is, also, responsible for maintenance of the larger London parks and provision for public recreation. It has comprehensive functions in the matters of education, elementary, secondary, and technical.

The Metropolitan Boroughs. The County area, apart from the city, is divided into 28 Metropolitan Boroughs. The Councillors are elected for a three-year period and they choose Aldermen to one-sixth of their number for a period of six years, one-half retiring every three years. The Mayor is chosen as in a Municipal Borough and enjoys the same power and dignity except that he is an ex-officio J.P. for his year of office only, not the subsequent year as well. In their functions the Metropolitan Boroughs resemble closely the smaller Municipal Boroughs which have no separate police force, and are not education authorities. Health services are shared between L.C.C. and Boroughs. Some Boroughs have their own housing schemes.

From April 1, 1965, under the provision of the London Government Act, 1963, the London County Council and the Middlesex County Council have been abolished and the area hitherto administered by them, together with adjacent areas of Essex, Hertfordshire, Kent and Surrey, will form the Greater London area. This area will be administered by the Councils of 32 London boroughs and the City of London, which retains the independent status, and the Greater London Council.

SUGGESTED READINGS

- | | |
|--------------------|---|
| Campion and Others | : British Government Since 1918 , Chap. VI. |
| Clarke, J.J. | : Outlines of the Local Government of the United Kingdom . |
| Cole, G.D.H. | : Local and Regional Government . |
| Finer, H. | ☐ English Local Government . |
| Golding, L. | ☐ Local Government . |
| Hart, William O. | : Introduction to the Law of Local Government . |
| Jackson, R.M. | : The Machinery of Local Government . |
| Jackson, W.E. | : Local Government in England and Wales . |
| Jackson, W.E. | : The Machinery of Local Government . |
| Jackson, W.E. | : The Structure of Local Government . |
| Jennings, Sir Ivor | : Principles of Local Government . |
| Lofts, D. (Ed.) | : Local Government Today and Tomorrow . |
| Maud, J.P.R. | : Local Government in Modern England . |
| Robson, W.A. | : The Development of Local Government . |
| Warren, J.H. | ☐ The English Local Government System . |
| Warren, J.H. | : Municipal Administration . |

The Government of the United States of America

CHAPTER I

THE BIRTH OF A NATION

Towards America. Within the span of a hundred years in the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries, a tide of emigration set from Europe to America. The most impelling single force which induced emigrants to leave their European Homelands was the desire for economic opportunity and England was the first to seize it. Between 1620 and 1635 economic difficulties of an unprecedented character had swept England and there was no work for a multitude of people. Even the best artisans could earn just a bare living. Bad crops added to the distress. In addition, England's expanding woollen industry demanded an increasing supply of wool to keep the looms working and the sheep-raisers in their anxiety to make best of the opportunity began to encroach upon soil hitherto given over to tillage.

Simultaneously, religious upheavals played their part. A radical sect of Puritans, known as the Separatists, had migrated to Holland, during the reign of James I, in order to practise their religion as they wished. Some years later a part of this group decided to emigrate to the New World where in 1620, they found the "Pilgrim" colony of New Plymouth. In England, too, immediately after the accession of Charles I to the throne, Puritans, who had been subjected to increasing persecutions, followed the Pilgrims to America and established Massachusetts Bay Colony. But Puritans were not the only colonists driven by religious motives. Dissatisfaction with the lot of Quakers led William Penn to undertake the founding of Pennsylvania. English Catholics, also, under Cecil Calvert's inspiration found Maryland. The pace of emigration accelerated during the arbitrary and despotic rule of Charles I. After the triumph of Cromwell many Cavaliers—"King's men"—left England in sheer horror and colonized in Virginia.

In Germany the oppressive policies of various petty princes helped to mount high the number of the emigrants. On the whole, the settlers who came to America in the first three quarters of the seventeenth century, the overwhelming majority was the English. There was sprinkling of Dutch, Swedes, and Germans in the middle region, a few French Huguenots in South Carolina and elsewhere, and a scattering of Spaniards, Italians, and the Portuguese. But they were hardly ten per cent of the total population. After 1680, however, England did not provide any appreciable number of immigrants. A majority of them had come from Germany, Ireland, Scotland, Switzerland, and France for varied reasons. For a considerably long time immigration remained a steady stream and the population which numbered to about a quarter of a million in 1760 amounted to more than two and a half million in 1775.

Towards Independence. The immigrants from England not only brought with them English language, but also the Anglo-Saxon traditions of civil liberty and self-government reinforced as they were by Magna Carta, the Bill of Rights and the Habeas Corpus Act. They transplanted all these traditions, in fact the whole fabric of the Common Law in their new homelands. For the most part, the non-English Colonists adapted themselves to the traditions of the original settlers as they adopted the English language, law, customs and habits. This process of amalgamation had the obvious result of intermingling the different cultures and thereby producing a new culture—a blend of English and Continental characteristics conditioned by the environments of the New World.

Before Colonies could be established in America, it was necessary to have legal authorization to do so. This was granted by the King of England in Charters, granted in some instances to trading companies, in others to individuals, and in still others to the colonists. The basis of government in each Colony was the supremacy of the Crown, although there was the lack of controlling influence on the part of the Government in England. The Colonies were, during the formative period, free to a large degree to develop as their inclinations or force of circumstances dictated. This large degree of self-government exercised by the Colonists resulted "in their growing away with Britain" whenever in the years to come the Government in England attempted to regulate their conduct. The Colonists had, indeed, become, with the lapse of time, increasingly "Americans" rather than "English" and this tendency was strongly reinforced by the blending of other national groups and cultures which was simultaneously taking place. How it operated and the manner in which it laid the birth of a new nation was vividly described in 1782 by St. John Crevecoeur: "What then is the American, this new man? He is either an European, or the descendant of an European, hence that strange mixture of blood, which you find in no other country....I could point out to you to a family whose grandfather was an Englishman, whose wife was Dutch, whose son married a French woman, and whose present four sons have now four wives of different nations. He is an American, who leaving behind him all his ancient prejudices and manners, receives new ones from the new mode of life he has embraced, the new government he obeys and the new ranks he holds...."

In 1763, at the end of the Seven Years' War, the French were driven from the North American Continent. New territories came under British control, and money was needed to administer them. The British Government had incurred huge debt fighting the French and it was decided that the Colonies should bear a part of the expenses of administration and defence of the Colonies. At the same time, attempts were made to enforce the trade laws more rigorously, and to tighten the control over colonial affairs. It spread a wave of deep resentment amongst the Colonists. "Businessmen wanting to develop their own industries; merchants and shippers wishing to trade with nations other than England; planters believing they could get better prices from the Dutch and French than from the English; speculators wishing to buy western land—all these and others found reason to chafe under the heavier taxes and harsher restrictions.”

But those who resented and protested had hardly thought of independence. What they exactly wanted was the repeal of the onerous laws and to leave the Colonists as much alone as possible. Their protests, however, stirred up popular feelings and radical men like Sam and John Adams in Massachusetts and Patrick Henry and Thomas Jefferson in Virginia seized the opportunity and appealed to the emotions of the colonists in the name of natural rights of men, and of government resting on the consent of the governed. They quoted Locke on individual liberty and human rights.

The result was a deliberate disobedience of the “obnoxious” laws and orders. The Colonial Legislatures frequently withheld appropriations of salaries for officials and soldiers until their demands were conceded to or their grievances redressed. After the accession of George III to the throne in 1760, the British Government decided to deal firmly with the recalcitrant subjects. This caused resentment fanned to revolutionary fervour. All attempts at conciliation failed and by 1776, the Colonists were faced with the alternatives of submission or rebellion, and they chose the latter.

The Declaration of Independence. The Declaration of Independence adopted on July 4, 1776 announced the birth of a new nation. It declared the colonies States, each independent of the Crown and politically independent of others. At the same time, it set forth a democratic philosophy of man’s natural rights, popular consent as the only just basis for political obligations, a limited government, and the right of the people to revolt against tyrannical government.

The Revolutionary War dragged on for about six years with fighting in every Colony. With Cornwallis’ surrender on October 19, 1781 the military effort to halt the Revolution was, however, over. When the news of American victory reached Britain, the House of Commons voted to end the war. Soon after Lord North’s Government resigned and the new Government assumed office to conclude peace on the basis of the Declaration of Independence. The Treaty was finally signed in 1783. It acknowledged the independence, freedom and sovereignty to the thirteen Colonies which became the States.

The Continental Congress which managed the common affairs of the Colonies during the early stages of the Revolution met and functioned without any constitution or fundamental law. It was created to meet an emergency and was looked upon merely as a temporary expedient. But when war appeared imminent and the advantages of union became more manifest, it was resolved to place the common government on a firm and permanent basis with larger powers and definite authority. On June 12, 1776, the day after a committee was appointed to prepare a declaration of independence, Congress appointed another committee consisting of one member from each colony “to prepare and digest the form of a Confederation to be entered into between these colonies.” In

1. Burns and Peltason, Government by the People, 2nd ed., p. 92.

November 1777, an instrument called the Articles of Confederation was finally adopted by Congress, which was to go into effect when ratified by all the States. All States except Maryland ratified the Articles during the years 1778 and 1779. Maryland, too, ratified them on March 1, 1781 and on the same date the Articles went into effect. They constituted the first Constitution of the United States of America.

The Confederation, thus, formed was styled a "firm league of friendship," under the name of the United States, and its declared purpose was to provide for the common defence of the States, the securities for their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare. For "the more convenient management of the general interests of the United States" an annual Congress of delegates, to be chosen by the States, was established. No State was to send less than two and more than seven delegates, and each State was entitled to only one vote regardless of its size or other considerations. Unlike the Continental Congress, the Congress of the Confederation had definite and express powers to deal with certain subjects of common concern to declare war and make peace, to send and receive diplomatic representatives; to enter into treaties; to coin money; to regulate trade with the Indians; to borrow money; to build a navy; to establish a postal system; to appoint senior officers of the United States Army (composed of state militias); and a few other powers of a like character. Approval of nine of the thirteen States was required to make important decisions.

The Articles of Confederation, however, did not give two most important functions to Congress, i.e., those of taxation and regulation of commerce. All that the Congress could do was to ask the States for funds. The Central government, therefore, existed on the doles of the State Governments. Nor had the Articles made any provision for an executive department or for a national judiciary, with the single exception of a court of appeal in cases involving captures on the high seas in time of war.

During the revolutionary period it did not matter much. But the post-war complications created insoluble problems. The war had inflated the currency and it circulated at about one thousandth of its face value. The sky-high prices had dislocated the economy of the country and everybody groaned under the crushing burden of the excessive prices. In the absence of a uniform rate of exchange the international trade had come to a standstill. The Central treasury was nearly empty and the States had become defaulters in their payments. Creditors were reluctant to lend and public securities were sold at a fraction of their face value. The Congress was helpless and it had no means to remedy the chaos. The conditions were yet more demoralising in the dealings of the States with each other and the Central Government. The latter had, according to the Articles of Confederation, sole control of the international relations, but a number of States had begun their own negotiations with foreign nations. Nine States had organised their independent armies and several had little navies of their own. There was a curious diversity of coins minted by a dozen foreign nations, and a bewildering variety of State and national paper bills. Each State regulated its commerce and some States even discriminated against their neighbours. The result was continuous jealousies, dissensions, and sometimes reprisals and retaliation between themselves. For purposes of foreign and inter-State commerce each State was, in sum, a nation by itself, and the Confederation was simply a non-entity.

Movement for Revision. The climax was reached in 1786, when all attempts to improve the Articles of Confederation had failed and the States were on the verge of Civil War. Washington, Hamilton and many other political leaders, who had laboured to bring together the States in bonds of Union, were convinced that the Government of the Confederation must either be revised or superseded entirely by a new system. The Congress of the Confederation was a government of the States and not of the people. It was weak, because it lacked four things which every strong national government must possess: the power to tax, to borrow, to regulate commerce, and to maintain an army for the common defence. And to have a strong government possessing all these four powers, the Central government must really be a government of the people belonging to one single nation. Washington wrote, "I do not conceive that we can exist long as a nation without having lodged somewhere a power which will pervade the whole Union in as energetic a manner as the authority of the State governments extends over the several States."

Disputes between Maryland and Virginia over navigation in the Potomac River led to a conference of representatives of five at Annapolis in September 1786. Alexander Hamilton, one of the delegates, convinced his colleagues at the conference that the subject of trade regulation was bound up with other essential questions and it was, accordingly, necessary to call upon all the States to appoint representatives in order to "devise such further provisions as shall appear to them necessary to render the constitution of the Federal Government adequate to exigencies of the Union." The Annapolis convention adopted a resolution for a general convention of delegates from all the States to meet in Philadelphia in May 1787. The Continental Congress was at first indignant over this bold step, but finally it reluctantly endorsed the idea in February of that year. All the States except Rhode Island appointed delegates to participate in the convention.

Philadelphia Convention. The Philadelphia Convention was really a Constitutional Convention as it was charged with the purpose of revising the Articles of the Confederation. It assembled on the second Monday in May 1787, and was composed of fifty-five members. It was, in the words of Jefferson, "an assembly of demi-gods." A French Charge, writing to his government, said, "If all the delegates named for this Philadelphia Convention are present, one will never have seen, even in Europe, an assembly more respectable for talents, knowledge, disinterestedness and patriotism than those who will compose it." The men who actually twisted the destinies of the nation were George Washington, James Madison, Alexander Hamilton, Benjamin Franklin, Edmund Randolph, Gouverneur Morris, James Wilson, and many other distinguished gentlemen.

The Convention actually met on May 15, 1787, in the Independence Hall and unanimously selected George Washington as the Chairman of the Convention. It was then decided that voting should be by States, each State having one vote; that the deliberations of the Convention should be behind closed doors and kept secret; that a quorum should be seven States and that a majority vote would be competent to ratify all decisions.

Within five days of its meeting the Convention made a momentous decision when it adopted Edmund Randolph's resolution "that a national government ought to be established consisting of a supreme legislative, executive and judiciary." Thus, as Madison later wrote, the delegates "with a manly confidence in their country" simply threw the Articles aside and proceeded ahead with the consideration of a wholly new form of government. The delegates recognised that the predominant need was to reconcile two different powers—the power of the autonomous States and the power of the central government. "They adopted the principle that the functions and powers of the national government, being new, general, and inclusive, had to be carefully defined and stated, while all other functions and powers were to be understood as belonging to the States." They recognised, however, the necessity of giving the national government real power and, accordingly, accepted the fact that it be empowered, among other things, to coin money, to regulate commerce, to declare war, and make peace.

At the end of sixteen weeks of deliberations and after ironing out many vexing problems, on September 17, 1787, a brief document incorporating the organisation of the new government of the United States was signed "by unanimous consent of the States present." But a crucial part of the struggle for a more perfect union was still ahead. The Convention had decided that the Constitution would become operative when it had been approved by Conventions in nine out of the thirteen States. By the end of 1787, only three had ratified it. There was a widespread controversy. Many were alarmed at the powers which the constitution envisaged to give to the centre. These questions brought into existence two parties, the Federalists and the Anti-federalists; those favouring a strong central government and those who preferred a loose association of separate States. The controversy raged in the press, the legislatures, and the State conventions. Impassioned arguments poured forth on both sides. Patriots like Patrick Henry, Richard Henry Lee, and others opposed the proposed constitution on the plea that it contained no Bill of Rights and consequently it would prove dangerous to the liberties of the people.

The Federalists conceded to the demand of the inclusion of a Bill of Rights as soon as the new government was organised. This promise, which was carried out soon after the new government came into being by the adoption of the first ten amendments, enabled the wavering States to support the constitution. The Constitution was finally adopted on June 21, 1788.² The Congress of the Confederation enacted that the new government should go into effect on March 4, 1789. In the meantime Senators and Representatives were elected as the first members of the new Congress, and George Washington was chosen President. Thus, the old Confederation passed away and the new Republic entered upon its great career.

2. North Carolina ratified the Constitution in November 1789, and Rhode Island in May 1790 after Congress had threatened to deprive her of the privilege of trading with the Union, and secession had been threatened by several countries in which Federalist sentiment was strong.

Today, the United States of America consists of 50 States covering an area of 3,022,387 square miles. It is a varied land of mountains, plains and plateaus. About two-thirds of the people live in towns and cities, one-third in rural areas. A publication of the United States Information Service, thus, describes the land and the people: "The United States is a country of great diversity—vast cities and small villages; roaring factories and quiet fields, busy streets and small churches for meditation. Geographically, there is a variety, too—lakes and deserts; prairies and mountain ranges; rocky sea coasts and sunbaked plains. And at the core of this varied land are the people—the most varied of all, for they stem from countries and social levels throughout the world. But in spite of many differences, certain traditions—freedom, equality, individual rights—are common to all and are taught in the home, in the church, and in the schools."³

SUGGESTED READINGS

An Outline of the American History, Distributed by the United States Information Service (1952).

Burns, J.M., and Peltason, J.W.

Ferguson, J.H., and
McHenry, D.E.

Garner, J.W.

Munro, W.B.

Swisher, C.B.

: Government by the People, Chaps. III, IV.

: The American System of Government, Chaps. II, III.

: Government of the United States, Chap. IX.

: Government of the United States, Chaps. II, III.

: American Constitutional Development.

3. Facts About the United States (1956), p. 4.

CHAPTER II

ESSENTIALS OF THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL SYSTEM

The Constitution as a document. The Constitution that emerged from the Philadelphia Convention was a model of draftsmanship, of linguistic elegance, of brevity, and of apparent clarity. It could not be otherwise, for it was designed to bring unity into the diversity of the new nation. Its provisions were built around several fundamental principles enshrined in the Declaration of Independence and upon these principles the American governmental system has since operated. So enduring and inspiring are these principles that the Constitution has, for more than a century and a half, withstood the onslaughts of time and has served the country in war and peace, in calm and crisis, without fundamental change; 73 of the original 84 clauses of the Constitution stand exactly as they came from the fluent pen of Gouverneur Morris. The people of the United States have so much abiding faith in the sagacity, moderation, and "sense of the possible" shown by the makers of the Constitution that the original document is virtually worshipped. Until 1952, it was kept, along with the Declaration of Independence, in an illuminated shrine in the Library of Congress. Both these documents are now housed in the National Archives building in "a stronghold believed adequate to protect not only against the moth, the rust, the thieves but the atom bomb."¹ The words of Max Lerner are typical of the feelings of every American for their Constitution and its makers. He writes, "Here was the document into which the Founding Fathers had poured their wisdom as into a vessel; the Fathers themselves grew ever larger in stature as they receded from view; the era in which they lived and fought became a Golden Age; in that Age there had been a fresh dawn of the world, and its men were giants against the sky; what they had fought for was abstracted from its living context and became a set of 'principles' eternally true and universally applicable."²

The Constitution of the United States is the oldest written Constitution in existence and the shortest of the Constitution of any other nation. It contains only 4,000 words, occupying ten or twelve pages in print which can be read in half an hour. Never was it in the minds of the Fathers of the Constitution to work out in all details a complete and final scheme of government for the generations to come. They sought merely a starting point and provided a skeleton to be clothed with flesh by customs, exigencies, national emergencies, economic developments, and various other factors affecting the welfare of the nation. The Constitution is, thus, a living document growing, developing and expanding, and it will continue to grow while the nation endures.

1. Brogan, D.W., An Introduction to American Politics (1954), p. 2 f.a.

2. Ideas for the Ice Age pp. 241-42.

Gladstone called the Constitution of the United States "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man." But actually its roots go deep into the past. Some of its provisions are traceable to the Magna Carta and for others its authors drew ideas from the writings of John Locke, Montesquieu and Blackstone. Some basic concepts had an even more ancient origin, as the doctrine of consent. Following are the fundamental principles and distinctive features of the Constitution.

Popular Sovereignty. A prime feature of the Constitution is that it gives recognition to the principle of popular sovereignty. The right of the people to ordain, abolish and alter their own institutions of government was asserted in the Declaration of Independence. This inalienable right of the people received constitutional sanctity and the Preamble declares that "we the people of the United States...do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." The Constitution also provides the methods by which it may be altered or abolished and to institute new form and organs of government which are most likely to guarantee the safety and welfare of the people. It means that the voice of the people is supreme in all matters of political determination in the United States and they reign, said De Tocqueville, "as Deity does in the Universe."

The doctrine of popular sovereignty attributes ultimate sovereignty to the people and consequently substitutes constitutional system of government for arbitrary and despotic authority of any kind. When it is recognised that the people are the safest depository of supreme power and that the will of the people is a better guarantee of wise, efficient, and moderate government, it really means respect for human rights, and in the language of Abraham Lincoln, a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. "The American system," James Madison said, "is based on that honourable determination which animates every votary of freedom to rest our political experiments on the capacity of mankind for self-government." Since the incorporation of the doctrine of popular sovereignty in the American Constitution, "it has," as Bryce says, "become the basis and watchword of democracy."

On the concept of popular sovereignty is erected another pillar of democracy. The Preamble states the great objects which the Constitution and the Government established by it are expected to promote: national unity, justice, peace at home and abroad, liberty and the general welfare. The early State loyalties were strong and loyalties to the States are still strong, but there is the triumph of the nation and un-matching prosperity of the people built on the bastions of democratic ideals which disdain privileges of all kind. The Preamble, in fact, echoes the immortal saying of Thomas Jefferson:

The God who gave us life gave us liberty at the same time.

Error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left to combat it.

The earth belongs always to the living generation.

Nothing is unchangeable but the inherent and alienable rights of man.

A Limited Government. A natural corollary of the doctrine of popular sovereignty is the concept of a limited government, possessing only such powers as have been conferred upon it. The Constitution-makers had, indeed, a horror of unlimited power. While assuming that the people were sovereign, the organization and powers of their governments were set forth in written documents. After carefully stating what powers they wished the Federal Government to exercise, they left all residual powers to the States composing the Union. Next, they separated the three branches of government Executive, Legislative and Judiciary, and made them to operate with elaborate checks and balances. The Constitution also imposes certain positive restraints on all public authorities in the country, high and low, by setting limits and bounds to the actions they may take and the manner in which they may exercise their powers. These limitations are designed to protect the person, property and civil liberties of the individual against arbitrary encroachment by government officials. In some matters the individual is protected against the Central Government, in others against State and local governments, and in still others against all governments, Central, State and local. The Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments together forbid Congress and State Legislatures to deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. In a strict sense every line in the Constitution is a vindication of the sovereign rights of the people and a limitation on Government. "In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men," wrote Madison, "the great difficulty lies in this: You must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself." In this sense the Constitution serves a dual function. It is a positive instrument of government enabling the Governors to control the governed. It is also a restraint on a government, a device by which the governed check the Governors.³

A Federal System. The delegates at the Philadelphia Convention met to find means for establishing an effective national government. At the same time, there was no serious discussion in the Convention of proposals which might have lowered the dignity of the individual States. It is true that Hamilton pleaded for subjecting the State Governments to rather complete Central control but, "while many applauded his eloquence and admired his youthful brilliance, none followed his suggestions."⁴ They knew that the overwhelming majority of the people were too much deeply attached to their State governments and they would not permit a scheme of government aiming their complete subordination to a central government. The framers of the Constitution were, therefore, confronted with a difficult task: how to make the Central Government strong enough for its duties without impairing rights of States; how to preserve the integrity of the States without weakening

3. Burns and Peltason, Government by the People, p. 92

4. Gosnell, C.B., and Others, Fundamentals of American National Government, pp. 67-68.

the Central Government. By heroic efforts they devised a plan of government which now carries the nomenclature of a federation.

The Fathers of the Constitution, thus, established a dual system of government within the States of the United States of America. There is the National Government with a complete set of its own governmental agencies—Legislative, Executive, and Judicial—exercising powers delegated to it by the Constitution which are of common national interest. Paralleling this system in each State is another complete set of Legislative, Executive and Judicial organs acting upon the persons within that State and exercising the residuary powers, that is, the powers not delegated to the National Government or denied to the States by the Constitution. Under the Constitution, therefore, the National Government is one of enumerated powers only. Residuary powers go to the State Governments. Each of these two sets of government within its own sphere is autonomous and independent; neither encroaching on the other. If any change is desired to be made in the division of powers it can be done only by amending the Constitution and the method of amendment is provided in the Constitution.

Fears and doubts in the minds of the people existed at the time of the adoption of the Constitution about the practicability of the federal union. Before 1861, lively arguments were waged over whether a state composing the Union had a constitutional right to secede. But the Civil War settled once for all this controversial issue. As the Supreme Court declared in Texas v. White (1869), "The Constitution in all its provisions looks to an indestructible union, composed of indestructible states." No State, therefore, can break its constitutional bonds, for the Union is perpetual and indissoluble.

Federal Supremacy. Though the powers of the Federal Government are enumerated, yet federal law within its sphere is supreme over all State law. This was the imperative necessity which the Fathers of the Constitution had fully realised. A federal union establishes two sets of government, each independent within its own sphere of jurisdiction. With demarcated powers and authority, conflicts between the National and State Governments are bound to arise and that, too, frequently. Such disputes might threaten the union if the Constitution did not provide for their settlement. The Constitution of the United States, accordingly, provides that disputes arising between the National Government and the State Governments must be settled in the Federal Courts. To guide judges in their decisions, the Constitution says, "The Constitution, and the laws of the United States...and all treaties....shall be the supreme law of the land...." It means that the Federal Constitution is paramount over all forms of law, State or National. Federal law, therefore, if validly enacted under the Constitution, ranks above the State Law. State Laws which conflict with the National laws or treaties may be declared unconstitutional; and the Supreme Court at Washington is the tribunal of last resort for deciding all cases of conflict of jurisdiction between the Federal and State authorities. But treaties and Acts of Congress must be in accordance with and in conformity to the Constitution if they are to out-rank State Constitutions and laws. Compared with one another, Acts of Congress and treaties are on a plane of equality. If one conflicts with another, the measure passed most recently prevails.

Separation of Powers, Checked and Balanced. That the three functions of government—Legislative, Executive and Judicial—must each be vested in a separate organ or department seemed to most Americans as undebatable as the laws of nature. James Madison wrote, in the Federalist: “No political truth is certainly of greater intrinsic value or is stamped with the authority of more enlightened patrons of liberty, than that...the accumulation of all powers—legislative, executive and judiciary—in the same hands....may justly be pronounced the very definition of tyranny.” The theory of limited government, which formed the basis of political thought of that time presupposed separating the three branches of government in order to prevent tyranny and absolutism. The Framers of the Constitution had, accordingly, no hesitancy about invoking the principle that political direction of authority should not concentrate in any one of the branches of government. They had rebelled against the tyranny of the British government and wished to prevent such rulers from coming to power in the United States.

There is in the Constitution itself no direct statement of the doctrine of Separation of Powers. It is inferred from the opening sentence of each of the Constitution's three Articles. Article I begins by saying, “All legislative powers herein, granted be vested in a Congress.” Article II begins with the statement that “The executive shall be vested in a President of the United States.” And Article III states that “The judicial power shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.” The Constitution-makers, thus, provided that the operation of each of the three processes of government should be entrusted to a separate agency. The Legislative process be operated by an independent Congress, the Executive process by an independent President and the Judicial process by an independent Supreme Court and subordinate courts

On the basis of this arrangement the doctrine of Separation of Powers has from the first been clearly established as a principle of governmental organisation in the United States and it has been enforced by the Courts exactly as any other legal rule. One of the many statements of it is found in the judgment of the Supreme Court in Kalbourn v. Thompson. The Court declared, “It is believed to be one of the chief merits of the American system of written constitutional law that all powers entrusted to government, whether state or national, are divided into three grand departments, the Executive, the Legislative and the Judicial; that the functions appropriate to each of these branches of government shall be vested in a separate body of public servants; and that the perfection of the system requires that the lines which separate and divide these departments shall be broadly and clearly defined. It is also essential to the successful working of this system that the persons entrusted with power in any one of these branches shall not be permitted to encroach upon the powers confided to others, but that each shall by the law of its creation be limited to its own department and no other.”

But even the most convinced believers in the doctrine of the Separation of Powers acknowledged that an absolute separation of the three departments of government would make government itself impossible. Madison, the ardent advocate of the doctrine of Separation of Powers, wrote in the Federalist, that the principle "does not require that the legislative, executive and judiciary departments should be wholly unconnected with each other." He proceeded to prove that "unless these three departments be so far connected and blended as to give each constitutional control over the others, the degree of separation which the maxim requires as essential to a free government can never in practice be duly maintained." Unlimited power, it was further argued, was always dangerous and the very definition of tyranny unless power was made a check to power. It could also be possible that different officials exercising different kinds of powers might pool their authority together and act in a tyrannical way.

The Framers of the Constitution, accordingly, introduced modification to the doctrine of Separation of Powers when they came to details by setting up what are called "checks and balances"—the giving, especially to both the Executive and Legislative branches, shares of powers which might more logically seem to belong to the others. The object was to make exercise of power limited, controlled and diffused. The final constitutional arrangement, thus, gives to each Department of Government exclusive powers appropriate to that Department, but at the same time, these powers are shared by other Departments lest it should corrupt those who wield power. The Legislative branch is checked by the President through his veto power, but Congress, if it can muster a two-thirds vote, may enforce its views by overriding his veto. The Constitution also armed the President with another kind of veto, described as "pocket veto." The President is, thus, able to check Congress. The Legislative Department checks the Executive through its power to appropriate money and to impeach. The Senate confirms the appointments made by the President and approves treaties negotiated by the President. The Supreme Court depends upon Congress in several respects, for instance, appropriations and appellate jurisdiction as also for the number of justices who serve on that tribunal. Congress may impeach and remove federal judges from office. The President is empowered to appoint Judges of the Supreme Court, and grant pardons, reprieves, commutations and amnesties. And the Supreme Court, shortly after the Constitution became operative, developed the practice of ruling on the validity of Acts passed by Congress and approved by the President. Such a system of checks and balances has thus been described by Bryce: "The ultimate fountain of power, popular sovereignty, always flows full and strong, welling up from its deep source, but it is thereafter diverted into many channels, each of which is so confined by skilfully constructed embankments that it cannot overflow, the watchful hand of the judiciary being ready to mend the bank at any point where the stream threatens to break through."

No feature of American Government, national, State and often local, writes Frederic Ogg, "is more characteristic than the separation of powers, combined with precautionary checks and balances."⁵ He further adds, "Nothing quite like it can be found in any other leading country of the world."⁶ It was not the intention of Montesquieu, the author of the concept of Separation of Powers, to neatly divide the powers of government into three separate and distinct departments. What precisely he desired to establish was that power should be a check to power, Le pouvoir arrete le pouvoir, and in accordance with this dictum the Framers of the American Constitution divided government into three distinct departments and wove an intricate system of "checks and balances," in order to avoid tyranny emanating from any source. They were thinking not alone of the tyranny of a monarch, as Montesquieu had been thinking, but the possible tyranny of the people or even of a majority under a system of majority rule. "They knew, as we do, that no drug and no beverage is more intoxicating than power over men and that intoxicated men are not to be trusted as unrestrained rulers."⁷ The Framers had, thus, a deep horror of the tyranny of the majority rule and they were not disposed to make any exception for a government conducted in the name of the people themselves. If the proper checks and balances are maintained no group is permitted to dominate and the programme of government is refined by the consideration from varied points of view.

5. Essentials of American Government, p. 38.

The arrangement of government as established by the Constitution was designed to promote co-operation among the three branches of Government as well as checking and balancing them. Without it the machinery of Government, the Constitution-framers thought, would break down. But in actual practice, the system of checks and balances has prevented unity, frustrated leadership, divided responsibility and slowed up action. "Not all the objects which the fathers had in view," says Herman Finer, "have been realized, but their main intention, effectively to separate the powers, has been achieved; for they destroyed the concert of leadership in government, which is now so important in the present age of the ministrant politics."⁸ By establishing the Presidential system of government, the Fathers of the Constitution, adds Dr. Finer, "separated the executive sources of knowledge from the legislative centre of their application; severed the connection between those who ask for supplies and those who have the power to grant them; introduced the continuous possibility of contest between two legislative branches; created in each the necessity for separate leadership in their separate business; and made this leadership independent of the existence and functions of the executive." With powers divided between the Executive and Legislative Departments without any means of proper co-ordination, there is always inordinate delay to arrive at an agreement even on pressing matters which demand expeditious disposal. One branch of Government may be operating on one policy whereas the other two may follow quite a different one, particularly when the Executive belongs to one party and the Congressional majority to another. Some Presidents have, no doubt, succeeded to bridge the gap separating them from the Legislature, but "while an emergency may bring temporary co-ordination, and the use of patronage can usually be counted upon to pave the way to some action, the national government is still torn into parts by the provision which the framers made for separation of powers."

6. Ibid.

7. Swisher, Carl Brent, The Theory and Practice of American National Government, p. 62.

8. The Theory and Practice of Modern Government, op. cit., p. 101.

From the very beginning of the establishment of the Union, Congress has always emphasised its independent existence and its independent will. Whenever there had been unity of purpose and unity of will, as in an emergency like that of 1933, or during the two World Wars, Congress reasserted itself either by rejecting or by altering or modifying Presidential measures. And very often it does so "to draw attention to itself that he (the President) is not the unqualified master of the nation."¹⁰ When in 1940, the United States became more and more involved in the Second World War, Congress conferred immense powers on the President. Protests soon followed both in Congress and outside that the President was gathering legislative power into his own hands violating the doctrine that the powers of government are separated by the Constitution. It was partly in response to this criticism that the new Congress which commenced its life in January 1943, exhibited a revolt against the leadership of Roosevelt by rejecting many proposals which the President had recommended and accepting many Bills to which the President had objected including the two fundamental Acts which he had vetoed. The result is, as Dr. Finer remarks, "Legislative procedure had come to differ essentially from that in Britain and France, financial procedure is worlds apart; there is no co-ordination of political energy or responsibility; but each branch has its own derivation and its morsel of responsibility. All is designed to check the majority, and the end is achieved."¹¹ But, "At what cost?" Finer puts it. The cost, he replies, cannot be calculated unfortunately in dollars. And yet the principle of the Separation of Powers, as Professor Beard observes, "is indeed a primary feature of American government and is constantly made manifest in the practices of government and politics."¹² Somewhat ironically, even checks and balances "designed to promote over-all equilibrium, often operate rather to aggravate than to ameliorate the ill-effects of separation, as for example, in the case of the Presidential veto and senatorial assent to treaties."¹³

Corwin remarks that "latterly the importance of this doctrine (the Separation of Powers) as a working principle of government under the Constitution has been much diminished by the growth of Presidential leadership in legislation, by the increasing resort by Congress to the practice of delegating what amounts to legislative power to the President and other administrative agencies, and by the emergence in the latter of all the three powers of government, according to earlier definitions thereof."¹⁴ The rise of political parties, a fact which was unforeseen by the Framers of the Constitution, and their functions have tended to redistribute the authority divided by the Constitution and have established

9. Zink, Harold, Government and Politics in the United States, p. 12.

10. Tourtellot, A.B., An Anatomy of American Politics, p. 83.

11. Finer, Herman, The Theory and Practice of Modern Government, p. 101.

12. Beard, C.A., American Government and Politics, p. 16.

13. Ogg, F.A., and F.O. Ray, Essentials of American Government, p. 39.

14. Corwin, S.E., The Constitution and What it Means Today, p. 2.

the leadership of the Executive to a considerable extent indeed. Congress, too, has, as said before, not stood in the way of prompt and forceful action in times of emergencies. It has also on its own initiative delegated to the Executive the power of making rules and regulations in the pursuit of positive governmental programmes, and all such rules and regulations have the effect of statute law. Still there are limits beyond which the breaking down of the division cannot be permitted to go. Congress can delegate to the President a great deal of power, but it cannot abdicate its functions and delegate its legislative authority to him. Even if it does, as Congress did in 1933, the Supreme Court intervenes declaring such delegation of authority void. The Supreme Court held in Field v. Clark (1892), that "the Congress cannot delegate legislative power to the President is a principle universally recognised as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution." The Court in 1935, unanimously invalidated the National Industrial Recovery Act, partly on the ground that Congress had by that law delegated to the President its power to make what amounted to laws and consequently such a delegation of authority violated the principle of the Separation of Powers. However, the Court's subsequent policy has been to permit administrative rule-making provided the terms of the law are reasonably specific. And what is reasonably specific is, again, determined by the Court.

Both the principles of American government—Separation of Powers and checks and balances—have frequently been a cause of confusion and conflict. They have resulted in great variations in the relationship between the President and Congress, variations in terms of personalities as well as external events. It is also impossible to deny, as Woodrow Wilson remarks, that "this division of authority and concealment of responsibility are calculated to subject the government to a very distressing paralysis in moments of emergency." Certainly, the Separation of Powers had been used, at various periods of American History, to check and balance government so effectively that nothing could be accomplished even when the need for governmental action was most apparent. The more power is divided the more irresponsible it becomes. Power and accountability are the essential constituents of good government. And today, when the area of governmental activity has broadened so enormously, can the system of Separation of Powers and checks and balances be reconciled with the need for strong, effective and responsible government? This issue was brought into the forum of serious discussion by Woodrow Wilson's Congressional Government, and since then many proposals designed to bring about greater harmony in the Executive and Legislative Departments have been suggested. Woodrow Wilson had urged the superiority of a responsible Cabinet system of government and his doctrine has been championed by effective writers. A few have, on the contrary, wielded the cudgels in defence of the American system. Some suggest a compromise by establishing a joint executive-legislative Cabinet, that is, the Representatives and Senators should be included in the President's Cabinet. Still others suggest that Secretaries of the Government (Cabinet members) may be permitted to appear in the two Houses of Congress to explain Government's programme and policy, and answer questions. A few advocate changing the Constitution to prevent the Supreme Court from declaring law unconstitutional. Nothing tangible has come out so far although under the existing conditions the Separation of Powers on the whole is working better than the Framers could have foreseen. The system of checks and balances has been greatly modified by the political parties. Political parties join what the founding fathers had separated. The increasing important function of the President as legislative leader and other aspects of American political process owe their existence to adjustments necessitated by the Separation of Powers. Summing up the system of Separation of Powers and checks and balances, William Havard remarks, "The system as a whole is a going one despite a certain cumbersomeness in its general operation; to attempt to shift to some of parliamentary government, as a great many critics have urged, would seem to be as uncertain in practical effect as it is unlikely in terms of political feasibility."¹⁵

6. Presidential Type of Government. The system of government emerging from the principles of Separation of Powers and limited government is quite different from parliamentary democracies. Americans separated their institutions of government whereas there was fusion of governmental institutions in Britain. There was another important factor which influenced the deliberations of the Philadelphia Convention. Parliamentary democracy is unworkable without distinct political parties, each with its own programme and platform. The framers of the Constitution forthwith rejected such a system of government which weakened national solidarity and created sharp cleavages and narrow loyalties. They strived to establish an energetic yet dignified Executive capable of enforcing laws firmly and one that should lend a note of stability. That is the Presidential Government.

It is a single Executive. The President is alone, one combining the functions of the Head of the State and head of the government. He is responsible to the people who elected him and to the Constitution to which he swore allegiance when he took office. He has no seat in the Legislature and is not accountable to that body. Nor does he depend upon it for the retention of his office; it goes by calendar. The Secretaries he appoints and make his 'Cabinet' and over which he presides, is not what Bagehot called a "Committee of the House of Commons." They are the President's nominees, appointed by him and responsible to him. If any one is a member of the legislature at the time of his appointment, he must resign his seat therefrom before accepting such an appointment. The Executive Department is, therefore, independent of and co-ordinate with the Legislative Department and, as such, negation of the Parliamentary system.

A Rigid Constitution. A Constitution which is written and establishes two sets of government with defined powers and both are equal in status, must be rigid. The procedure for amending it is prescribed in the Constitution and is distinct from the procedure adopted in making an ordinary law. The amendment of the Constitution also necessitates participation of both sets of government. It is consequently unlike that of Britain. The Constitution provides for two definite methods for amending and we discuss these methods in the later part of this Chapter. The methods are extremely elaborate and rigid and account for only twenty-five amendments during the last 180 years.¹⁶ Yet, in spite of its rigidity, it is the remarkable adaptability of the Constitution that has enabled it to survive the rigours of democratic and industrial revolutions, the turmoils of the Civil War, the tensions of a major depression, and the dislocation of the two global Wars.

15. Havard, William C., The Government and Politics of the United States, p. 33.

Judicial Review. As a corollary of the twin doctrines of limited government and the Separation of Powers, there has developed the doctrine of judicial review by which courts exercise the power of annulling any Legislative or Executive act which in their opinion goes beyond the Constitution. The federal judiciary, in fact, acts as a guardian of the Constitution. It interprets the Constitution and decides the competency of Congress or State legislatures. If in the opinion of the Courts a particular act is beyond the authority given to Congress or State Legislatures or that it encroaches upon the domain of either of the two Legislatures or seeks to deny or abridge the civil liberties of the people, then, such an act is declared unconstitutional or ultra vires. Similarly, any act of the Executive, which is deemed in excess of or beyond its constitutional authority, may be held unconstitutional. When in 1933, Congress in a desperate effort armed the President with large discretionary powers to deal with the economic crisis, the Supreme Court intervened and in the Panama Refining Company v. Ryan it was held that this was an invalid delegation of legislative power to the Executive. Another part of the National Industrial Recovery Act authorised the representatives of each industry to make codes of fair practices applicable to all members of the industry under the supervision of the President and empowered him to promulgate the codes as law. This provision the Supreme Court also declared void.¹⁷ "We think," the Court observed, "that the code making authority thus conferred is an unconstitutional delegation of legislative authority."

The doctrine of judicial review has been subjected to scathing criticism during recent times. Its supporters defend it as necessary to preserve a free and limited government, and that it also helps to establish a stable government by guarding against legislative precipitancy. The critics, on the other hand, assert that the courts infringe upon the Legislative and Executive functions and retard the working of representative government. It is further maintained that the process of judicial review delays pressing social and economic policies so necessary to meet changing conditions. We shall revert to the details of this controversy at its appropriate place.¹⁸

The Bill of Rights. The Constitution as it emerged out of the Philadelphia Convention did not contain the Bill of Rights embodying the rights and liberties of the people. Repeated efforts were made towards the end of the deliberations of the Philadelphia Convention to secure a Bill of Rights to the draft constitution, but all failed. But

16. The Twenty-fifth Amendment setting out the way the office of President is filled in the event of his incapacity became law on February 10, 1967.

17. Schechter v. United States.

18. See below, Chap. VII.

omission became such a burning issue that it nearly defeated ratification of the Constitution by the States. The Federalists ultimately conceded to the demand of the inclusion of Bill of Rights as soon as the new government was organised and the First Ten Amendments were added to the Constitution in 1791, to constitute the Bill of Rights. In these provisions are enshrined the rights and liberties of the people of the United States. A zone of freedom is, thus, established wherein no government may legally operate. Although the boundaries so set by clauses are by no means self-defining, yet they do whatever can formally be done to safeguard those individual rights which history has found to be the hallmark of a just and free society—freedom of speech, of worship, the right of habeas corpus, from arbitrary deprivations except by due process of law, and no unreasonable searches and seizures.

The Right to Due Process of Law. Both the Federal and State governments are forbidden to deprive anyone of life, liberty and property "without due process of law." Due process of law means that anyone suspected of violating the law must be dealt with according to established rules and not arbitrarily. It also means that the government must be the product of law and "powers must be applied not erratically to some people or to others as governors see fit, but uniformly to all people similarly situated." Finally, due process of law means that acts of Legislatures and Executives, both at the Centre and in the States, must be reasonable. There has been a good deal of controversy over what is reasonable and what is not. Before 1880, the Courts had held that what was reasonable was a political decision and, therefore, reserved to Legislatures and Executives to determine it. Since that time, however, Courts have said that the "due process of law" clauses require the Courts to make the final determination as to whether actions or laws are reasonable or not. This has led judges to disagree sharply among themselves and has provoked widespread criticism, as we shall observe in the pages to follow. Nevertheless the Courts insist that "due process of law" guarantees both proper procedure and the reasonableness of the laws themselves.

GROWTH OF THE CONSTITUTION

The Constitution of the United States, as it emerged from the Philadelphia Convention, was a brief document consisting of a Preamble and seven Articles condensed into 89 sentences. Since then the Constitution has been steadily changing, developing, expanding and adapting itself to the new conditions. The framers knew that if the Constitution was to endure, it must be a living Constitution capable of flexibility and adaptability to cater to the expanding needs of the people and the country. They, therefore, did not try to reduce all details into writing but rather left room for the system to grow. Chief Justice Marshall observed in McCulloch v. Maryland, "A constitution intended to endure for ages to come, and consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs. To have prescribed the means to which government should, in all future time, execute its powers, would have been to change, entirely, the character of the instrument, and give it the properties of a legal code. It would have been an unwise attempt to provide, by immutable rules, for exigencies which, if foreseen at all, must have been seen dimly, and which can best be provided for as they occur." Therefore, the American Constitution, as Bryce says, "has necessarily changed as the nation has changed, has changed in the spirit with which men regard it, and therefore, in its own spirit." A written Constitution does not mean a set of clear-cut rules which inexorably control political authorities in the discharge of their public duties. "It is," according to Charles Beard, "a printed document explained by judicial decisions, precedents and practices and illuminated by understanding and aspiration. In short, the real Constitution is a living body of general prescriptions carried into effect by living persons."¹⁹

The American Constitution is, thus, not the written fundamental instrument of the Federal Government framed at Philadelphia together with its amendments. It also includes statutes enacted by Congress, particularly those dealing with the organisation of the government and the powers assigned to the agencies Congress has created; executive orders and actions which enable the government to function efficiently; the monumental decisions of the Supreme Court interpreting the Constitution and thereby affecting the powers and operations of the government; and the innumerable political habits and governmental usages which chisel the Constitution to achieve the dynamic political purposes. Considered in that manner, the difference between the Constitution of the United States and of Britain remains only of a degree. Judge Cooley defined a Constitution as "the body of rules and maxims in accordance with which the powers of sovereignty are habitually exercised." And Woodrow Wilson described the Constitution as a "vigorous taproot" from which has evolved "a vast constitutional system—a system branching and expanding in statutes and judicial decisions as well as in unwritten precedent."²⁰

Development by Statute. The Fathers of the Constitution, as said before, left many matters to be determined by the Acts of Congress in order to complete the framework of government. The judiciary Article (Article III), for example, states only that there shall be "one Supreme Court," and "such inferior Courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." The Judiciary Act of 1789 laid the foundation of the American judicial system, fixed the number of Judges of the Supreme Court and their salaries, provided for the Court's organisation, and set forth its jurisdiction. This Act has been amended from time to time. Several times Congress has passed laws changing the number of Judges of the Supreme Court. Similarly, Article II of the Constitution assumes administrative departments, but it says almost nothing about them. The elaborate organisation of the federal administration has been established by statute, with federal departments or independent agencies created, reorganised, or given new functions by Congress. Still more, nowhere does the Constitution prescribe the precise way in which minor officers of the government are to be selected. Congress enacted a civil service law providing for their appointment by competitive examinations.

19. Beard, C.A., American Government and Politics (1932), p. 15.

20. Wilson, Woodrow, Congressional Government, p. 9.

Some of the manifold laws of Congress are so basic that "they are more a part of the total constitution than many of the written sentences." The Presidential Succession Act, 1947 determines succession to the Presidency, and in the event of the death of Vice-President the officers who will follow him. It is the Act of Congress that specifies that members of the House of Representatives shall be chosen from single-member districts. The Act of 1887 fixes in detail the method of counting electoral votes. The Rules of Procedure and internal organisation and practices of Congress itself are the result of statutory authority.

After enumerating the various powers of Congress, the Constitution concludes with a sort of general grant empowering Congress to make all laws which it may deem necessary and proper for carrying into execution the jurisdiction assigned to it. This is sometimes called "the elastic clause" and many matters that Congress might not otherwise feel authorised to deal with have been covered under this provision. In the same way, by broadly interpreting the Constitution, Congress has established a huge defence establishment, created scores of administrative boards and bureaus, entered into the business of education, banking insurance, construction, transporting, generating electric power, and found authority to regulate the economic and social life of a highly industrialised nation. The policy of liberal interpretation was first adopted by Chief Justice Marshall and his associates, and with rare exceptions has been followed by the Court throughout its entire history. The Supreme Court has declared as a fixed principle that it will show great respect for the interpretations of Congress and will overrule them only when they are clearly and palpably wrong.

Development by Executive. Likewise the nation's chief executives have greatly helped to develop the Constitution by their decrees, orders and actions. It is, indeed, no exaggeration that Presidents Jackson, Lincoln, both Roosevelts "have had an impact" on the Constitution "at least equal to that of any of the original framers." By their vigorous use of the Presidential powers they made the Presidency an office of Legislative as well as Executive leadership. In fact, a considerable number of political techniques in the United States rest on precedents set by one or another President. The Constitution is silent about the existence of the "Cabinet" and the President's obligation to consult it. But Washington created one and began consulting it. This practice has been followed since then making the "Cabinet" an established organ of government that meets ordinarily once a week. The Constitution states that only Congress can declare war, but the Presidents have used their authority to send troops into action in such a way as virtually to assure the creation of a state of war. Woodrow Wilson did it and so did Franklin D. Roosevelt. Constitutionally, all treaties must be approved by a two-thirds majority of the Senate, but recent Presidents have often substituted 'executive agreements' or 'gentlemen agreements' for treaties, made and concluded by themselves not requiring Senate approval and yet considered by the Courts as binding. President Franklin D. Roosevelt assumed unprecedented powers manning the entire life of the nation during World War II, under his authority as Commander-in-Chief of the armed forces.

Then, by statutes passed under the authority of the constitutional provisions and regulations made thereunder it is determined how commerce is carried on, the process of naturalization, the procedure and the methods of taking census, obtaining of patents and copyrights. Congress has also delegated to various executive officials and administrative boards the power to supplement statutes by regulations and orders. These regulations are not laws but they have the force of law "They are, as it were, the twigs on the branches which have sprung from the main trunk, which is the Constitution."²¹

Development by interpretation. In the oft-quoted observation made by Chief Justice Hughes lies the truth how the American constitutional system has developed through the process of judicial interpretation. He said, "We are under the Constitution but the Constitution is what the judges say it is." The judges have to interpret the Constitution and the Constitution, like that of United States, written in concise, general words and phrases often admits of varying interpretations. And to give "a phrase a new interpretation is to give it a new meaning; and to give it a new meaning is to change it." Almost every clause of the Constitution has been before Courts and the interpretations of the judges have virtually remade parts of the Constitution. The doctrines of Implied powers, of inherent powers, of the sanctity of contracts and many other decisions of the Supreme Court stand conspicuous in determining the course of government. The Supreme Court vested the power of dismissal in the President excluding the Senate altogether. The Constitution entrusts the Federal Government for controlling the means of communications and transport. The decision of the Supreme Court interpreted means of communications to embrace telegraphic, telephonic, and radio communications. In the means of transport were included railroad and airways. A similar liberal interpretation was given to the "armed" forces broadening thereby the jurisdiction of the federal authority. The Constitution declares that "Congress shall have power...to regulate commerce." What is meant by the word commerce and what does it include, the Supreme Court has given it varied meanings to suit new situations and make it responsive to new problems. "It has been the work of the Supreme Court, through its power of judicial interpretation," says Dr. Munro, "to twist and torture the term 'Commerce' so that it will keep step with the procession."²²

Professor Edward S. Corwin stated in 1938, "the Supreme Court has handed down not far from 30,000 opinions...and of this total probably one-fourth at least comprises cases involving constitutional points."²³ That means that by 1938 some 7,500 decisions rendered by the Supreme Court involved interpretation of some part of the Constitution or appealed some fundamental doctrine of the American constitutional system. The court has the last word; its declaration of meaning is final, unless and until some subsequent decision gives yet a different interpretation.

21. Munro, W.B., The Government of the United States, p. 69.

22. Ibid., p. 70.

23. The Living Constitution, p. 38.

Thus, judicial interpretation has been the most important method of determining the meaning of the Constitution. "Whatever is enacted by Congress and approved by the Supreme Court," declared Howard Lee McBain, "is valid even though to the rest of us it is plain violation of an unmistakable fiat of the fundamental law. There is no limitation imposed upon the national government which Congress, the President, and the Supreme Court, acting in consecutive agreement, may not legally override. In this sense the government as a whole is clearly a government of unlimited powers; for by interpretation it stakes out its own boundaries."²⁴ It means that the Supreme Court is the final arbiter on questions of constitutional interpretation and it determines what the Constitution really means in the context of the new developments which emerge in the country. Woodrow Wilson maintained that the Supreme Court is "a kind of constitutional convention in continuous session," constantly adjusting constitutional provisions to new circumstances. It adapts the document of 1789 to a changed nation of 1970—and 2000. The Supreme Court has, thus, made the Constitution a living, growing thing; has modernized it in each successive decade. And the Court's power to do so has not been brought about by any formal provision or amendment, but by interpretation of the court itself in the case of Marbury v. Madison in 1803.

Development by usage. The Constitution has, also, considerably developed, expanded and modified by usages and customs. "What habit is to the individual, usage is to the State. Nations, like men, get into the habit of doing things in a given way. Habit then hardens into usage, which becomes difficult to change." These political customs and usages, which have their basis neither in laws nor in judicial decisions, are essential parts of the basic framework of the fundamental rules of the government. In fact, the Constitution has been greatly modernised, amended and democratised through the development of these unwritten rules. They make flexible the otherwise rigid Constitution.

The most notable example is the extra-constitutional development of the political parties. It is scarcely possible to conceive of the Federal or State Government in the absence of political organisations. Yet the Constitution makes no provision of the political parties. It is, again, the political parties which bring about co-ordination between the legislative and executive branches, and the presidential office has been made more responsible to the people.

Another example is that of the "Cabinet" which advises the President. There is no basis for this in the Constitution. The Congressional statutes have simply set up the departments from which the "Cabinet" members are drawn up. President Washington found it useful to have a small group of advisers to whom he could look for counsel and other Presidents have continued with it and, today, it is impossible to dispense entirely with such a body. Senatorial courtesy, presidential nominating conventions, and other party activities, the residence requirements in the case of the Representatives all these rest, not upon the Constitution, but upon usage. Legislative Committees are not authorised in the Constitution, but custom and usage have made them as permanent as if they were.

24. Corwin, Edward, S., Court Over Constitution, pp. 93-94.

The most notable example how can a custom change or supplement constitutional provisions is found in the procedure of electing the President. The Constitution makes a simple provision that he shall be elected by electors, chosen in their respective States. The Constitution-makers assumed that these electoral groups in the States would be actually deliberative bodies and that they would weigh the relative merits of each candidate before exercising their choice. But custom has rendered the Presidential election direct and nullified the intention of the Constitution-makers, if not the spirit of the document itself. To cite another equally important example, though the Constitution provides that Money Bills must originate in the House of Representatives, Senate's consideration of revenue measures by tradition is as much recognised as that of the House of Representatives.

President George Washington set precedent that the President should not seek election for more than two terms. This became a custom and was scrupulously followed till 1940 when Franklin D. Roosevelt sought election for the third time and was elected. He was elected for the fourth term as well. Under the stress of national emergencies and influenced by the dynamic personality of Roosevelt, the people succumbed to the violation of the custom. But the popular opinion in the United States was so much in favour of the two-term election that eventually a constitutional amendment was made in 1951, limiting the tenure of office of the President to two terms. The custom became a constitutional law and that shows sanctity of customs. The growth of the American Constitution has, therefore, it may be asserted, heavily depended upon custom and usage. Professor Beard makes a bold statement when he says that customs and usages in the American system of government form as large an element as it does in the British Constitution.²⁵ This is, however, not exactly correct, although customs have in some respects changed the basic characteristics of the Constitution.

Growth by Amendment. The framers of the Constitution prudently realized that future context of things and experience would need a change in the Constitution, and they, accordingly, provided for the process of formal amendment. Article V reads—

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of the three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions by three-fourths thereof as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress;...."

The process by which the Constitution is amended may be divided into two parts: proposing an amendment (initiation or proposal of the amendment), and ratifying an amendment. There are two ways in which an amendment may be proposed:

25. Beard, Charles A., American Government and Politics, p. 60.

- (1) by a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress, or
- (2) by a national constitutional convention called by Congress upon request of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the States.

It may be ratified:

- (i) by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, or
- (ii) by special conventions in three-fourths of the States.

To explain this fully: an amendment may be proposed by Congress, in which case it may be introduced in either House as a joint resolution and must pass in both the Houses separately by a majority of two-thirds vote. Or an amendment may be proposed by a national convention convened by Congress upon request of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the States. Such a request might indicate a general nature of the amendment that is desired or it might simply ask that a convention be called for the purpose of revising the Constitution. Congress would then prescribe the number of delegates, mode of their election and the time and place of their meeting. But the difficulties inherent in this procedure have ruled it out as a mode of initiating amendments to the Constitution. Therefore, all the amendments hitherto proposed have originated with Congress, that is the first method.

In whatever manner the proposal for amendment is initiated, Congress prescribes which of the two ratification procedures is to be followed; State Legislatures or State Conventions. State Legislatures have been used in all instances, except in the case of the Twenty-first amendment, when Congress provided that State Conventions were to be used. When State Conventions are used, the Legislature of each State decides on the size of the Convention, how the delegates are to be elected, and the time and place of meeting.

A few important observations with regard to the process of amendment may be noted. The relevant Article in the Constitution does not say anything on the following points:—

(i) What does "two-thirds of both Houses" mean; two-thirds of the total membership of each House or two-thirds of those present and voting? The Supreme Court has ruled that a two-thirds of those present and voting fulfils the constitutional provision. The latter interpretation has prevailed and it now means two-thirds of the members present.

(ii) It does not, also, say whether or not the action of Congress in voting to propose a constitutional amendment requires the assent of the President and Governors. The Supreme Court has held that amendment is solely a legislative function and the President need not sign proposed amendments before they are sent to the States. Nor do the State Governors need to sign instruments of ratification.

(iii) Can a State Legislature, which has ratified the constitutional amendment, later, before the necessary three-fourths has been obtained, rescind its previous decision? Congress by its resolution has declared that it cannot. But a State Legislature may, however, first refuse to ratify it and, then, at a later date may ratify it.

(iv) The Constitution does not fix any time limit within which the ratification must be completed. But Congress may do it on its own initiative as it was done in the case of the Eighteenth, Twentieth, and Twenty-first amendments and fixed seven years as the maximum time for ratification in each case. The Supreme Court has held that it is within the competency of Congress.

(v) Can a State Legislature, when a proposed amendment comes before it for ratification, refer it to the people for their approval? It has been held that it may be done provided the State Legislature itself takes formal action after the people have given their verdict. But a State Legislature may not submit an amendment to the people for final decision, thus, abdicating its own powers. The Supreme Court held that it was neither within the constitutional power of National nor that of the State Governments to alter the methods of ratification which the Constitution itself prescribes.

(vi) Are these limitations, express or implied, on the subject matters of amendment? The Constitution provides for only one limitation, that no State shall be deprived of its equal representation in the Senate without its consent. This limitation is designed to protect individual States or a small group of them from a discriminatory action by a dominant three-fourths of the States.

Criticism of the Amending process. The process of amending the Constitution is difficult and circuitous and consequently there have been only twenty-five amendments since the Constitution came into being in 1789. The first ten amendments were "the price of ratification" and were embodied by 1791. In fact, the Constitution was accepted by the States of Massachusetts, Virginia, and New York on the definite assurances that a series of amendments guaranteeing individual rights would be speedily added to the original document. The next fifteen amendments brought about various alterations, deleting many provisions and adding new ones to fit in the needs of time and consistent with political aspirations of the people.

Here are some of the important points of criticism of the amendment procedure:—

1. The inconsistency of majority rule requiring two-thirds votes of both Houses of Congress and ratification by three-fourths States is really inconceivable. Even two-thirds votes of Congress are difficult to secure. So far, out of thousands of resolutions introduced in Congress only twenty-nine have mustered the necessary two-thirds votes of both Houses. Out of these twenty-five have been ratified by the necessary number of States and have become effective. It has been suggested that only a majority vote in both Houses of Congress and ratification by two-thirds of States should be made necessary to effect constitutional amendments. But the proposal has not evoked sufficient enthusiasm.

2. For ratification, States rather population are required. It is asserted that this is too conservative a system, for thirteen small States may pool together and hold up the aspirations of an overwhelming majority of population. This is tantamount to a veto of an absolute nature. "In other words, about one-tenth of the people of the nation, distributed in the thirteen geographical districts, can prevent nine-tenths of the people from effecting innovations in their system of government."

3. The submission of amendments to Legislatures instead of to ratifying conventions has been criticised as undemocratic. It means that the ratification is to be effected by a relatively small number of persons who happen to be in the Legislature. And these legislators had been elected for other purposes than the issue involved in the constitutional amendment. This objection can be removed by providing for ratification through State conventions. When the Twenty-first amendment was submitted to the ratification of State conventions it was hoped that a new precedent had been set and that in future this democratic method would continue to be followed. But when Congress in 1947 proposed the Twenty-second amendment to limit the Presidential tenure, it reverted to the previous practice and submitted the amendment to State Legislatures for ratification.

4. Finally, there is no prescribed time limit for ratification unless specifically determined by a resolution of Congress as in the case of Eighteenth, Twentieth and Twenty-first amendments. Absence of such a prescription makes the issue a plaything of the States and indefinite delay takes away the purpose underlying the amendment. For example, the child labour amendment was proposed by Congress in 1924 without specifying the time limit for ratification. So far only twenty-eight States have ratified it, the last one being Kansas in 1937.²⁶ On one occasion Ohio ratified an amendment submitted 80 years earlier.²⁷ Connecticut, Georgia and Massachusetts voted in 1939 to ratify the first ten amendments—150 years after they had been submitted to them for their ratification, although these constituting the Bill Rights, have been operative in those as in other States since 1791. On the whole the time required for ratification has been short "varying between 3 years and 7 months for the Sixteenth amendment and only seven months for the Twelfth". The average for the twenty-five amendments is 21 months.²⁸

Amendment is, in brief, an integral part of the Constitution and the twenty-five amendments made to date have an equal influence on the American political life as any other factor that has contributed to the development of the Constitution. All the amendments except the Twenty-second seem to have had a direct or indirect democratising tendency. The expansion of suffrage, the direct election of Senators, the protection of individual rights, the social and economic implications of the graduated income-tax and even the adjustments in Presidential elections and the dates of assuming office "have all made some contribution to the concep-

26. Burns and Peltason, Government by the People, p. 108. But the prohibition of child labour under the Fair Labour Standards Act, 1938 has substantially eliminated interest in the pending amendment.

27. Ferguson, J.H. and McHenry, D.E., The American System of Government, p. 70.

28. Ibid.

tion of a government resting on as broad a basis of popular sovereignty as possible.^{29,30}

FEDERAL CENTRALIZATION

Growing needs of the State. Centralization is the shifting of governing authority from lower or member units to higher units, with a tendency for power to grow at the top. Federal centralization is, accordingly, the tendency for the national government to assume influence or control over functions which formerly were considered under State jurisdiction. The Constitution limited the authority of the Central Government by prescribing that Congress might exercise only those powers expressly enumerated while the residuary powers were given to the States. This was specifically stated in the Tenth Amendment. But it was inevitable in the state of things in which United States began its career as a federation that the process of centralization should grow rapidly and the development in the expansion in the power and authority of the Federal Government had been continuous. There were three principal factors which have significantly contributed in increasing federal authority. The first is the part played by the Federal judiciary. Secondly, the express powers of Congress have considerably expanded and in effect added to by legislative, judicial and administrative interpretation. Finally, certain express powers of Congress, particularly the commerce clause, have been chiefly responsible for centralizing tendencies.

"A chief actor in the entrenchment of a strong federal government was John Marshall of Virginia, staunch Federalist and Chief Justice of the United States from 1801 to 1835."³⁰ His decision in the famous case of Marbury v. Madison gave the power to the courts to interpret the Constitution and declare acts of Congress unconstitutional, although the Constitution itself contained no express provision to this effect. In 1819, Marshall, again, in the case of McCulloch v. Maryland established the doctrine of federal supremacy over the States and enunciated the principle of implied powers³¹ of Congress. Both these doctrines are landmarks which made federal centralization inevitable. But Marshall went even beyond the doctrine of implied powers by invoking the theory of resultant power. A resultant power is a power that is deducible from two or more express powers. "Thus where the doctrine of implied powers has a broadening effect, the concept of resultant powers has no limits at all except the judiciary itself exercises restraint."³²

Marshall also declared in McCulloch v. Maryland that the United States was a union of the people and that the Central Government was both in theory and in fact a national government resting directly on

29. Havard, William C. The Government and Politics of the United States, p. 41.

30. Dimock, Marshall Edward, and Dimock, Gladys Ogden, American Government in Action, p. 70.

31. An implied power is a power that is deducible from an express power.

32. Dimock, M.E., and Dimock, G.O., American Government in Action, p. 134.

the people. He aimed to emphasise that the federal government was held to have its powers direct from the people and not by way of the States. The Constitution only established a framework in which a national government could and should develop. This point was further stressed by Justice Holmes in Missouri v. Holland. The words of the Constitution, he observed, "called into life being the development of which could not have been foreseen completely by the most gifted of its begetters. It was enough for them to realize or to hope that they had created an organism; it has taken a century and has cost their successors much sweat and blood to prove that they created a nation." The nation has grown and expanded and so have its needs. Since 1787 United States has grown from a poor, sparsely populated agricultural country to a rich, densely populated, and highly integrated industrial nation. Until recently United States had no positive foreign policy. Her isolated geographic position, a favourable balance of power in Europe, and no embroilments in Asia, enabled her to keep aloof and repose in her security. Today, it has all changed and United States takes on herself the burden of maintaining world peace. The obvious result is that all these changes involve a powerful impact on government. The altered social, economic, political and international conditions require the re-allocation of responsibilities and the over-all general tendency has been strengthening the national government at the expense of the States. With all these changes there has been simultaneous change in people's attitude towards the national government, irrespective of the party in power. Determined to make America great and strong, the platforms of both the major parties reflect the wishes of the people and their programmes call for greater activity by the Central Government helping its domain to grow.

In fact, from the beginning the logic of events have helped the national government's sphere to expand. But the real swing in the Federal-State relations begins from 1860, when the Federal government began to exercise what had hitherto been regarded as exclusively the reserved powers of the States. Many factors and various devices have contributed to that end and the national government is today doing more things, spending more money and coming much closer to the people than was contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. It engages in such activities as public health, agriculture, poor relief, highway construction, labour relations and many others and yet the formal constitutional powers of the national government remain the same today as they were in 1789.

An important way to bring about the present Federal-State inter-relations is the system of grants-in-aid, that is, the amount of funds flowing from the national to State treasuries. The Committee of the Council of State Governments defines federal grants-in-aid as "payment made by the national government to State and local governments, subject to certain conditions for the support of activities administered by the States and their sub-division." This aid is given under the power granted in the taxation clause³³ which authorises the use of Federal funds to provide for the "general welfare." The practice is based on the assumption that some activities conducted by the State and local governments, like housing, agriculture, education and health are matters of "general welfare" and consequently justify support by the Federal government. Then, the revenue resources of the Federal government are enormous as compared with those of the States. Grants-in-aid are the means by which the Federal Government provides aid in financing State functions which otherwise would have been either insufficiently performed or tardily performed. Finally, the modern idea of the functions of the States does not compartmentalise its role within geographic jurisdictions of administrations. All functions are national in scope and though there is virtue in their local administration, yet, they must be standardised at a high level. The Central Government, therefore, gives to the States financial aid up to a certain proportion of the total amount of expenditures on the beneficent departments, on the condition that the States and their local units administer the programme in accordance with rules laid down by Central Government.

33. Article I, Sec. 8, Clause I.

The earliest grants made to States were in land or money without the imposition of conditions on their use. Today, the grants given are almost wholly conditional. This means that grants are made for specified purposes and subject to conditions stipulated by Congress or the administrative agency. It is a matter of common experience that one who gives money has a loud voice in calling the tune. Grants-in-aid are a prolific source of centralisation. They offer "a middle ground between direct federal assumption of certain State and local functions and their continuation under exclusive State and local financing, with haphazard coverage and diverse standards. It makes possible the achievement of national minimum standards, yet retains most of the benefits of administration close to the people."³⁴ Thus, by the grants-in-aid the federal government is able to promote programmes in schemes of social services which it could not have legally required short of a formal constitutional amendment.

One of the vexatious problems of the Confederation period was the trade barriers which the States had been erecting against one another. The Annapolis Conference of 1786, which led directly to the Constitutional Convention of the following year, was really summoned to relieve the embarrassing commercial situation so created. The Constitution, therefore, contains a clause conferring upon Congress the "power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States...."³⁵ In defending this power of Congress, Hamilton wrote in the *Federalist*³⁶ that "a unity of commercial as well as political interests, can only result from a unity of government." What Hamilton meant was that the political power "must be commensurate in its range with the matter which it is permitted to regulate."³⁷ Today, the problem of

34. Ferguson, J.H., and McHenry, D.E., The American System of Government, p. 111.

35. Article I, Sec. VIII, Clause 3.

36. No. 11.

37. Gonsell, C.B., and Others, Fundamentals of American System of Government, p. 73.

inter-State and foreign commerce is not the same as it existed in 1787. It is now a gigantic problem and includes all commercial activities covering production, buying, selling, and transporting of goods. The power of Congress to regulate commerce should, accordingly, grow at equal pace with the growth of that commerce. The Supreme Court has consistently accepted this argument. Laws have, therefore, been enacted, upheld by the Supreme Court, and subsequently administered in such fashion as to indicate that apparently no appreciable area of economic life lies outside the sphere of federal intervention.

The power to regulate is the power to prescribe rules by which commerce is governed, that is, the right to foster, promote, protect and defend all commerce that affects more States than one. Since today there are few aspects of the United States economy that do not affect commerce in States more than one, and as the term commerce now includes the whole complex mass of transactions covered by the word "business," most business transactions are subject to national regulation. As such, significant aspects of employment as collective bargaining, hours of work, wages, working conditions, and the conduct of strikes in large sectors of American industry have been largely withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the States. Summing up the astounding expansion of federal government's powers under this heading, Ferguson and McHenry remark, "In the decade of 1930 to 1940 alone, Congress has validly employed the commerce power to regulate labour relations, control radio broadcasting, provide retirement system for railroad employees, fix minimum wages and maximum hours, regulate inter-State bus and truck lines, control small streams even of doubtful navigability, regulate stock exchanges, forbid transportation of strike breakers, punish extorters, kidnappers and vehicle thieves."³⁸ All these are federal encroachments on the constitutional powers of the States.

The Central Government is constitutionally responsible for protecting the country from external aggression and, when necessary, for waging war. The problem of common defence today is entirely different from what it was in 1787. No country can afford to wait for defence until war is declared. It must always be prepared to ward off the probabilities of war and to win, if it actually comes. It means the ability to man the industrial resources of the country and to apply nation's scientific knowledge to the task of defence. Everything from the physics course taught in schools to the conservation of national resources and the maintenance of economy affects the war-making potential. When the country is in the midst of hostilities it must gear up the entire life of the nation in a bid to win war. It means to conscript men, control all the channels of production, transportation, distribution, and in fact nearly every aspect of economic and social life in the country.

And when the war ceases the government must tackle problems of demobilization and post-war reconstruction. The change-over from war-time conditions to peace-time conditions must be smooth and it needs proper planning and co-ordination. It must also give aid to war veterans and to remove the maladjustments in the economy caused or aggravated by war. "In brief, the national government has the power to wage war and wage it successfully. In total war this means total power. As long as we live in a world where war is an ever-present possibility, the defence activities of the government will be many and varied, and they will impinge on all aspects of our lives."³⁹

38. The American System of Government, p. 122.

The people of the country at all stages of its development had always looked to the national government for solving their problems. Their desire to make the country big and prosperous necessitated "big business, big agriculture, big labour", and, "all add up to big government." The World Economic Depression of 'thirties of the present century considerably enhanced the prestige of the Central Government. There were over twelve million unemployed out of a total labour force of fifty million, and many more million were destitute. The resources of the States were absolutely inadequate to give relief on such a mass scale and simultaneously devise means to steer the country out of economic and financial difficulties. The national government came to the rescue of the people and the bold policy of Roosevelt led the country to the path of recovery.

Simultaneously to the increased confidence of the people in the national government there has been a decreasing tendency to holding on to the traditional ties of loyalty to the States. This is due partly to the development in the means of communications and transport and consequently greater mobility of the population. Secondly, most of the States had no independent existence prior to their becoming members of the Union. There developed, accordingly, no strong feelings of local pride and the original settlers long looked to the Central Government for their betterment. The States themselves, too, are in a way responsible for it. Even within the limits of their jurisdictions and their resources most States have not kept abreast and, thus, failed to instil local loyalty. Washington D.C. is "almost a model of perfection when compared to some State capitals which are graft-ridden, inefficient, and unable to provide the services that the people expect."

All this process of centralization raises a question as to whether the United States is any longer properly classified as a federation. "Constitutionally speaking," observes Griffith, "it would appear as though the Supreme Court would no longer impose any substantial barriers to national legislation in the economic sphere as constituting an invasion of the States' rights. As for all other areas of constitutionally permissive governmental action, it would appear to be open to the National Government to dictate or at least to dominate policy through the use of conditional subsidies."⁴⁰ He concludes that exclusive jurisdiction, even in the most traditional State and local functions, the smaller units may no longer have. But autonomy they still have in large measure. "Their vitality is still very great. The same social conscience that was among the factors causing the Supreme Court to let down the barriers or increased governmental activity nationally has its counterpart in its wide extension of the sphere of permissible State activity." Congress, too, in practice has shown very considerably restraint in curtailing State discretion through conditional grants-in-aid. Internal-level co-operation has considerably increased and regional administrative units, often federal in nature, are created with problems (chiefly river basin conservation and development) on wider than State lines. Loyalties to the States are still strong among all the fifty States. "The traditional advantages of federalism—experiment, differentiation, political education, diffusion or power—still have great opportunities for expression in the United States, to a degree very largely lost in Britain."⁴¹ But in terms of governmental functions, it cannot be denied that federal government has assumed inconceivable powers, and federalism, as practised in the United States, is today no obstacle in assuming functions which in the interest of national strength it is important to handle at the national level. This has necessitated, as many assert, revision in the theory of federalism.

39. Government by the People, op. cit., p. 142.

40. Griffith, Ernest, S., The American System of Government.

SUGGESTED READINGS

- | | |
|--|--|
| Beard, C.A. | : American Government and Politics , Chaps. II, III. |
| Beard, C.A. | : The Supreme Court and the Constitution . |
| Benjamin Barker and Stanley H. Friedelbaum | : Government in the United States , Chaps. 1 to 3. |
| Bowie, R.R., and Friedrich, C.J., (Eds.) | : Studies in Federalism . |
| Benson, George, C.S. | : The New Centralization . |
| Brogan, D.W. | : The American Political System , Chaps. I, II. |
| Brogan, D.W. | : An Introduction to American Politics , Chap. I. |
| Burns and Peltason | : Government By the People , Chaps. IV, V. |
| Carr, R.K. | : The Supreme Court and Judicial Review . |
| Clark, J.P. | : The Rise of a New Federalism . |
| Corwin, E.S. | : The Constitution and What it Means Today . |
| Corwin, E.S. | : Understanding the Constitution . |
| Dimock, M.E. and Dimock, G.O. | : American Government in Action , Chaps. II, III. |
| Ferguson, J.H., and McHenry, D.E. | : The American System of Government , Chaps. IV, VI. |
| Finer, H. | : The Theory and Practice of Modern Government . |
| Griffith, Ernest | : The American System of Government . |
| Irish, Marian D., and Prothro, James W. | : The Politics of American Democracy , Chap. IV. |
| Lees, John D. | : The Political System of the United States , Chaps. 1-3. |
| McBain, H.L. | : The Living Constitution . |
| Munro, W.B. | : The Government of United States , Chaps. IV, V. |
| Swisher, Carl B. | : American Constitutional Development . |
| Swisher, Carl B. | : The Theory and Practice of American National Government , Chaps. 1, 2, 4. |
| Zink, H. | : A Survey of American Government , Chaps. III, V. |
| Wilson, Woodrow | : Congressional Government . |

CHAPTER III

THE PRESIDENCY

ORGANISATION, MODE OF ELECTION, AND POWERS

The need of a single executive. One of the grave weaknesses in the organisation of government under the Articles of Confederation was the absence of executive authority to carry into effect the determinations of Congress and the treaties of the United States. The imminent need with the framers of the Constitution at the Philadelphia Convention was to provide an executive department co-ordinate with the legislative department. It was, accordingly, declared that the executive power should be vested in an officer called the President of the United States.

Two basic considerations dominated the discussions relating to the Presidency. The first was, the need to have an "energetic yet dignified" executive capable to enforce national laws firmly, and one which should lend a note of stability to the new government. The other was, a fear that the people would be critical if the executive was made too strong. Many alternatives were suggested and discussed. Men, like James Wilson, wanted a strong executive independent of the legislature. It was argued, and Locke and Montesquieu were freely quoted in support of their advocacy, that if the Separation of Powers was desirable, it was logical to have three co-ordinate branches of government with no one predominant over the others. There were others who wished to have the "executive magistracy" appointed by Congress and subject to its mandate. Some delegates favoured one-man executive; others advocated for a plural executive composed of two or three men possessing equal power.

The final decision on the Presidency was a compromise. The President was to be single and independent of the legislature. Even after the single executive was agreed upon, many argued to associate with the President an executive council which should share with him the exercise of the executive power in certain important fields. The proposition was rejected and in its place the Senate was charged with acting as an executive Council to the President in negotiating treaties and the making of appointments. The Philadelphia Convention, in brief, finally decided to vest in the President considerable executive power, but he was hemmed in by the system of checks and balances. In this way, the framers of the Constitution accomplished both their objectives. By making him independent of the legislature and eligible for re-election, stability and continuity were assured. By sufficiently checking his powers the fears of the people of that time, who had a horror of unlimited power, were avoided. Sections 2 and 3 of Article II of the Constitution are devoted to enumeration of Presidential powers. But much of the President's authority has accrued to him by virtue of factors beyond the powers conferred upon him by the Constitution. "No important institution," as Prof. Laski observes, "is ever that the law makes it merely. It accumulates about itself traditions, conventions, ways of behaviour, which, without ever attaining the status of formal law, are not less formidable in their influence than law itself could require." And the growth in power and prestige of the Presidency of the United States is a prominent example of the unforeseen possibilities of a written Constitution. If with the Founding Fathers the problem was how strong should the executive be, the same problem confronts the Americans even today. The people ask also: Why has the President become so powerful? Is this a dangerous tendency? We shall deal with this aspect at a later stage in this Chapter. But one thing is clear. No longer could a James Bryce write on the subject, "Why Great Men are not chosen Presidents."

Qualifications and compensation. The Constitution requires that the President shall be a natural born citizen, that he must have attained the age of thirty-five years, and must have been for fourteen years a resident of the United States. The question of residence was raised in connection with Herbert Hoover, who had lived abroad for many years, "but interpretation of this clause or requiring residence of 14 years continuously and immediately preceding election appears unwarranted."

The salary and other emoluments of the President are fixed by Congress. They cannot, however, be increased or diminished during his term of office. From 1909 to 1940, the salary of President was $75,000 a year. In 1949, it was raised to $100,000 plus $50,000 tax-free expense allowance. In 1953, the tax-free features of the latter sum were eliminated and the salary became $150,000 for all practical purposes. According to the Presidential Increase Act, 1969, the salary has been increased to $200,000. This legislation was assented to by President Johnson on January 18, 1969; two days before he relinquished his office on January 20. President Richard M. Nixon is the recipient of the new increase in salary. Separate budgetary provisions are made for his travel, official entertaining, and White House, the official residence of the President. After relinquishing office, Ex-Presidents, under a Presidential Retirement Law of 1958, get a $25,000 yearly annuity, free office space and up to $65,000 a year for office staff. The President is immune from arrest for any offence and is not subject to the control of courts. No process can be issued against him or compel him to perform any act. He can be removed from office only by Impeachment but after removal he is liable to arrest and punishment according to law.

Succession. Article II, Section I, Clause 5, specifies that if the President vacates his office, the Vice-President succeeds^a and in case both

1. The American Presidency, pp. 13-14.

2. Ferguson and McHenry, The American System of Government, op. cit., p. 301.

3. So far nine Vice-Presidents have succeeded to the Presidency and all because of the deaths of the Presidents. Harrison died in April, 1841, one month after his inauguration, and was succeeded by Taylor. General Zachary Taylor died in 1850 and was followed by Fillmore. Lincoln was succeeded by Andrew Johnson. President Garfield who was assassinated in 1881 left the the offices of the President and Vice-President fall vacant, Congress determines by law "....what officer shall then act as President...." The Congressional Act of 1886 provided the following order of the heads of the Executive Departments in which they should succeed: State, Treasury, War, Justice, Post Office, Navy and Interior. The Twentieth Amendment⁴ provides that if no President is chosen by the beginning of the next term, or if the President-elect fails to qualify, the Vice-President-elect shall act as President until such time as President qualifies. If both the President-elect and the Vice-President-elect do not qualify, Congress may provide by law who shall act as President and such person acts accordingly, until a President or Vice-President shall have qualified.

(Continued on next page)

In 1947, Congress passed a new Act providing that should both the President and Vice-President become unable to discharge the powers and duties of the President, the succession should be: Speaker of the House of Representatives, President pro tempore (for the time being) of the Senate, and Heads of the Executive Departments as listed in the Act of 1886, except that the posts of Agriculture, Commerce and Labour were added to the end.

But what is to happen when there is no Vice-President, as there was none when Truman succeeded Roosevelt and Johnson succeeded Kennedy. The Twenty-fifth Amendment provides that whenever there is a vacancy in the office of the Vice-President, the President shall nominate a Vice-President who shall take office upon confirmation by a majority vote of both Houses of Congress.

The Twenty-fifth Amendment also sets out the way the office of the President is to be filled in the event of his incapacity. It is now provided that the Vice-President will take over the duties and responsibilities of the Presidency as Acting President:

1. Whenever the President transmits to the President pro-tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives his written declaration that he is unable to discharge the duties of his office,

2. Whenever the Vice-President and a majority of either the principal officers of the Executive Departments or such other body as Congress may by law provide, transmit to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives their written declaration that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office.

Thereafter, when the President transmits to the President pro-tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives his written declaration that no inability exists, he shall assume the powers and duties of his office. But if the Vice-President and a majority of either the principal officers of the Executive Departments or such other body as Congress may by law provide, transmit within four days to the vacancy for Chester A. Arthur. McKinley's assassination in 1901 made room for Theodore Roosevelt. Harding's death in 1923 and Franklin D. Roosevelt's in 1945 left the Presidency for Calvin Coolidge and Harry S. Truman respectively. Johnson succeeded Kennedy on his assassination on November 22, 1963.

(Continued from previous page)

4. Adopted in 1933.

President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives their written declaration that the President is unable to discharge the duties of his office, the Congress shall then decide the issue. If the Congress determines by two-thirds majority of both Houses that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, the Vice-President shall continue to discharge the same as Acting President; otherwise the President shall resume the powers and duties of his office.

The Presidential term. There was a pretty vexing discussion in the Philadelphia Convention regarding the term of office of the President. It was first agreed that the term should be seven years with provision against re-election. On reconsideration, however, it was ultimately fixed at four years and nothing was said with regard to re-eligibility. When the Constitution simply stipulates that "he shall hold his office during the term of four years,"⁵ the framers, no doubt, allowed the indefinite re-eligibility of the President. The first President, Washington, set a two-term custom and it was followed for a century and a half, although two unsuccessful bids were made for a third term by Grant and Theodore Roosevelt. Grant failed to secure the party nomination whereas Theodore Roosevelt was defeated at the polls. When the question of possible third term for Calvin Coolidge first arose, the Senate passed a resolution declaring that any departure from the two-term tradition "would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions."

Thus, the tradition seemed to have been fairly well established when in 1940, President Franklin D. Roosevelt decided to accept the Democratic nomination for the third successive term and his victory at the polls repealed the tradition. He was elected even for the fourth term in 1944, although he died soon after the inauguration.⁶ But the breaking of the tradition by Franklin Roosevelt was not to become a precedent for indefinite re-elections. The Twenty-second Amendment, adopted in 1951, bars any person from being elected President more than twice.⁷ Eisenhower was the first President barred from seeking a third term.

Mode of election. Perhaps no other question consumed so much time of the Philadelphia Convention as that relating to method of choosing the President. Various schemes were proposed. Some proposed a direct election by the people, and others urged election by Congress. The direct method of election by the people was ruled out of various considerations. The framers of the Constitution intended to establish a method which would, as Hamilton put it, "afford as little opportunity as possible to tumult and disorder," and would not "convulse the community with any extraordinary or violent movements." Against the method of election by Congress, it was urged that such a method was the negation of the unanimously accepted principle of the Separation of Powers and that it would make the President a mere creature or tool of that assembly.

5. Article II, Section 1.

6. Franklin Roosevelt died in April, 1945.

7. This was not applicable in the case of Harry Truman who was President when the Amendment was proposed. Truman, however, did not seek election for the third term. President Johnson was eligible for election again in 1968 as his elevation to the White House from the Vice-Presidency on the death of President Kennedy came more than half-way through the latter's own term of office, but he did not offer himself.

The finally adopted plan was the expedient of indirect election. The Constitution provided that the President shall be chosen by electors appointed in each State in such manner as the Legislature of that State may direct, and each State to have as many electors as it has Senators and Representatives in Congress. The method, thus, adopted enabled the electors to meet in due course, each group in its own State, and give their votes in writing for two persons, of whom at least one must not be an inhabitant of the same State as elector. The ballots were then sealed and transmitted to the presiding officer of the Senate who counted them in the presence of both Houses and announced the result. The person receiving the highest number of votes was to be the President and the one obtaining next to him was to be the Vice-President, provided both had obtained a clear majority of all the electoral votes. In case no one obtained a majority of the electoral votes, the House of Representatives was to choose, voting by States and each State having one vote, from among the five highest. In the event of a tie in the electoral vote, it was provided that the issue would be settled in the same way.

The Founding Fathers had expected that the electors of the different States would be talented and leading citizens presumably well acquainted with the qualifications and merits of the candidates for Presidency. They had also hoped that the electors would meet at their respective State capitals, discuss among themselves the qualifications and merits of each candidate, and, then exercising their best judgment, cast their votes for the fittest. In the first two elections the quiet and dignified procedure contemplated by the framers functioned exactly as they had expected. At the third election (1796), however, new shape of things began to emerge and long before the electors met, it was well known that most of the Presidential electors would vote for either John Adams or Thomas Jefferson, although in no case were any pledges exacted.

By this time two national parties, Republican and Federalists, had come into existence and when the Presidential election took place in 1800, the electors were party functionaries pledged to vote for the candidates of their own parties. The Republicans, who elected a majority of their electors, had their candidates Jefferson for President and Aaron Burr for Vice-President. It so happened that Jefferson and Burr each had polled exactly seventy-three votes. According to the Constitution the election was thrown to the House of Representatives which was still controlled by the Federalists. It was with the greatest difficulty that Jefferson was elected, because some of the Federalists had toyed with the idea of making Burr President. However, this incident disclosed that the mode of election was defective and must be amended. Immediately thereafter the Twelfth amendment was adopted⁸ to avoid the repetition of such an incident. Each voter now separately votes for the

8. It was adopted in 1804.

President and the Vice-President and one who secures the majority of votes in each case stands elected. If no candidate for Presidency secures a majority of electoral votes, the House of Representatives chooses from the three highest, and if no man receives a majority of the votes cast for Vice-President, the Senate chooses between the two men with the highest votes. A law of 1887 declares that each State shall determine the authenticity of its selection of electors.

Thus, the constitutional indirect method of President election has been upset by the growth of political parties and political practices. Although the language of the Constitution relating to Presidential election remains unchanged, but the business of nominating candidates for Presidency, carrying on campaigns, and casting ballots has become a popular operation of first rate national importance. "It is an operation of the first magnitude," graphically observes Charles Beard, "putting at stake the ambitions of individuals, the interests of classes, and the fortunes of the entire country. Nearly everybody in America takes part in it, from the President in White House, busy re-electing himself or helping in the selection of his successor,⁹ down to the bootblacks and garageboys, who discourse on the merits and demerits of candidates with as much assurance as on the outcome of latest prize fight. The performance involves endless discussions, public and private oratory, tumult and balloting, the election of thousands of delegates to grand national conventions, the concentration of opinion on a few ambitious leaders, a nation-wide propaganda as the sponsors for various aspirations exhibit the qualifications of their favourites to the multitude and the expenditure of millions of dollars on publications, meetings, "rounding up delegates" and "seeing that goods are delivered."¹⁰

What happens now is that within the constitutional framework described above, a standardized State procedure has developed under which electors are elected on a general ticket basis. The list of electors is made up by the official party organisation in each State and this honour goes to distinguished citizens or to partisans willing to make liberal contribution to campaign funds. On the election day the voter does not directly vote for President and Vice-President, but for all the Presidential electors put up by his party in his State. Normally, the party which secures a plurality of the popular votes in any State is entitled to all the electoral ballots of the State for President and Vice-President. Not too many hours after the polls close, it is usually known who will

9. Eisenhower not only picked up Nixon as his successor but also helped in his campaign for the Presidency.

10. Beard, Charles A., American Government and Politics, op. cit., p. 152.

The costs of Presidential electioneering are impossible to estimate exactly. But they are growing at an alarming rate. For what the figures are worth, the President's 1962 Commission estimated joint expenditure on Presidential and Vice-Presidential candidates by the national Committees of the two major parties as follows:

1952	$11.6 million
1956	$12.9 million
1960	$20.0 million

The Commission estimated the total expenditure on all candidates in 1960 at $165—$175 millions.

be the next President of the United States. However, the voters' verdict in the election of the electors is the last act in the Presidential drama. Technically, the voters have only elected the electors and it is the job of the latter to elect the President.

Each of the States possesses as many Presidential electors as it has Senators and Representatives in Congress. The total number of electors constituting the electoral college is 538 including the District of Columbia, although it is not entitled to have any member in the Senate or the House of Representatives. A simple majority of 538 electoral vote total (270) is needed to win the Presidency. The electors automatically vote for their party's nominee and since no elector dare break faith with the party which nominated him, the work of the electoral college is a final formality before the successful candidate becomes the constitutionally elected President. In this way, "the deliberative, judicial, non-partisan system designed by the framers of the Constitution has been overthrown by political custom."¹¹

If no candidate for the Presidency receives the necessary electoral majority on election day, the issue is thrown for decision into the House of Representatives. There each State, irrespective of its population and size, casts one vote for one of the three men who earlier had received the most electoral votes in the election. There had been only three occasions in the American history in 1800, 1824, and 1876 elections, when the State-wise voting in the House of Representatives had decided Presidential election.

The precise practice as it prevails today may, thus, be summed up: the first stage to the Presidency is the selection of delegates to the national convention of the political parties. In most states, delegates are selected by the parties at their State conventions. But in 15 States they are chosen by the voters at primary elections—usually in March, April and May of the year preceding the Presidential election. The second stage comprises of holding the conventions when the Party selects its candidates for President and Vice-President, and adopts a programme of objectives. In the first week of September starts the election campaign and the candidates for Presidency and Vice-Presidency selected by their parties crisscross the nation, explaining their positions on key issues, domestic and international. By train, plane, bus and car they travel to nearly every state. They make hundreds of public appearances, and scores of speeches from platforms, over radio stations, and before television cameras. As many as 20 speeches may be given in a day. Then, comes the polling day for the election of the electors early in November (on Tuesday following the first Monday in November). National election day is a legal holiday in most States. In other States, employees are given time off so that they may vote conveniently. The polling stations open as early as 6 a.m. for 12 hours or more. The ballot is direct and secret. Over 64 million Americans voted in the election of 1964. In 1968, the popular votes cast were over 71 million. Individual votes are counted State by State, and by custom the Presidential candidate receiving the most votes within a State is declared the winner of all the State's electoral votes. The result is known in a few hours after the election is over. 'Once the outcome is clear it is customary for the defeated candidate to make a concession speech thanking his supporters for their efforts and congratulating his opponent on the victory.

11. Ibid., p. 160.

The formal balloting for President takes place long after polling day through the machinery of the Electoral College. The practice now is for the Electors to vote for the candidate who carried their State in the November Presidential election. The Electoral College does not actually formally meet. The various State groups of electors assemble at their respective State capitals, as required by the national law of 1934, on the Monday following the second Wednesday in December after their November election to vote for President and Vice-President. The votes of the State electoral groups are sent to the President of the Senate, opened and counted before a joint session of Congress on January 6, and formal announcement of the result of the election made. The new President is inaugurated at noon on January 20 to run a four-year term of office.

Removal from office. Removal of a President is by Impeachment, and only for treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanours. No President has ever been so removed. President Johnson's Impeachment failed by one vote. The House of Representatives has the power to initiate Impeachment proceedings by a majority vote. The case is tried by the Senate, with the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court presiding. It requires two-thirds vote for conviction which makes the President liable to removal from office and disqualification. He is also liable to trial under ordinary judicial procedure.

THE VICE-PRESIDENCY

The Vice-President must meet all the qualifications of President since he may succeed to the Presidency in the event of the President's death, resignation or removal. The framers of the Constitution might have omitted the Vice-Presidency but when the method of electing the President through the medium of Electoral College was decided upon, it became necessary to provide for an office the incumbent of which should succeed to the Presidency without delay. It would have been politically undesirable to leave the office of the President vacant until new electors could be chosen and they had chosen the President. But even when the office of the Vice-President had been created, the framers were not too enthusiastic about it. Benjamin Franklin took the position so slightly that he proposed to have its holder addressed as "His Superfluous Highness." This is, in fact, an apt description. John Adams the first to hold the office of Vice-President, lamented to his wife: "My country has, in its wisdom, contrived for me the most insignificant office that ever the invention of man contrived or his imagination conceived." Thomas Jefferson, his successor, said something more apparent and meaningful than he realized when he described the "second office of government" as "honourable and easy," "the first" as "but a splendid misery." The rise of the political parties and the Jefferson-Burr episode, already referred to, and the consequent adoption of the Twelfth Amendment further contributed to the decline of the office,

It is an office of obscurity and glory and it is rarely occupied by a man for whom the majority of the people would have voted as a candidate for the Presidency. Even the potential importance of the Vice-President as 'heir-apparent to the President,' and nine had succeeded in 180 years, had not been sufficient to attract leading political figures to seek it as a matter of course. "Most men of ability and ambition," observes Clinton Rossiter, "would still rather be a leading Senator or Secretary of State than Vice-President, even after all the good and exciting times that Richard Nixon has had."¹² The Vice-Presidency is, therefore, an office unique in its functions or rather lack in its functions."¹³ Woodrow Wilson described the position of the Vice-President as "one of anomalous insignificance and curious uncertainty." Franklin Roosevelt said that he would rather be a Professor of History than Vice-President. John Nance Garner, who was Roosevelt's running-mate in 1932 and 1936, described the post as "not worth a pitcher of warm spit." Thomas R. Marshall, who was Vice-President under Woodrow Wilson, described himself as "a man in a cataleptic fit," who "is conscious of all that goes on but has no part in it." Such are the dimensions of impotence of the Vice-Presidency "and impotence is the mark of a second-class office."¹⁴

Election. The Vice-President is elected in the same way as the President, and, according to the original provisions of the Constitution, the man getting the highest number of votes next to the President-elect was declared the Vice-President of the United States. The Twelfth Amendment has changed the method of election. The electors have now to vote separately for the President and the Vice-President. There are two considerations which govern the choice of a candidate for this office. First that he would not be from the same geographical district as the Presidential candidate.¹⁵ For example, if the President is from the Middle West, the Vice-President will be from the East, and vice versa. Wilson was from New Jersey; Marshall from Indiana. Harding came from Ohio; Coolidge from Massachusetts. Franklin D. Roosevelt came from New York; Garner from Texas. Second, by no means so strictly applied, that the candidates for the offices of President and Vice-President shall represent different wings of the party. In 1940, Henry Wallace of Iowa was united with Franklin Roosevelt, and Charles McNary of Oregon with Wendell Wilkie of New York and Indiana.¹⁶

Functions and Duties of the Vice-President. The framers of the Constitution thought desirable to give to the Vice-President something to do besides waiting the death, resignation, incapacity, or removal of his chief. The Constitution, accordingly, ordains that he should preside over the sessions of the Senate. Even as a presiding officer of the Senate his responsibilities of office are not great. The Senate is a body with customs and

12. Rossiter, Clinton, The American Presidency, p. 102.

13. Corwin, E.S., The President: Office and Powers, p. 73.

14. Rossiter, Clinton, The American Presidency, p. 102.

15. Amendment XII provides, "The Electors will meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves...."

16. Beard, C.A., American Government and Politics (1947), p. 153.

traditions that the presiding officer must respect and accept. He votes only in case of a tie and in all other matters plays an impartial role. The Senate refused to accept, in fact, it refused to listen patiently, to the proposals of Vice-President Dawes who tried to modernize the House. The result is that a "vigorous man gets restive under such conditions; his frustration is noticed and the prestige of office degenerates accordingly."

During recent years, however, the potentialities of the office have been demonstrated. President Harding associated Vice-President Coolidge with Cabinet work. Franklin Roosevelt entrusted many responsibilities to Henry Wallace. Although less close to Roosevelt in outlook, Truman was able to help the President with Congressional problems. The Vice-President, as Rossiter says, "has experienced something of a renaissance" under Truman and Eisenhower. Alben Barkley was probably the most distinguished man nominated for the office since John C. Calhoun and he proved extremely useful to Truman as a link to Congress. In 1949, the Vice-President was made by law a member of the National Security Council. Richard Nixon was the busiest and most useful Vice-President within memory. Eisenhower believed that no President in the future can relegate the Vice-President to its former stand by status in the Government. He showed the path that the Vice-President must be a working member of the administration, fully informed in every detail. He deputed Nixon on an itinerary of Latin America, the Middle East countries, India and Pakistan, and the extent of the economic and military aid given by the United States to Pakistan was largely based upon his report. Nixon sat by invitation in the Cabinet and even presided over some Cabinet meetings in the absence of President Eisenhower. Vice-President Johnson in Kennedy administration continued in the Nixon pattern, with assignments overseas and Chairmanship of several inter-departmental Committees. Johnson was also Kennedy's Counsellor as a member in the "Ex Com" of the National Security Council, an ad hoc group of a dozen top administration officials who aided the President in working out his responses to the 1962 Cuban crisis.

The 'New look' which Eisenhower gave to the office was intended to give to the Vice-President training at least with the major national and international policies so that if he is compelled to take over the White House he may be able to steer through domestic problems and international complexities. Truman said, "It is a terrible handicap for a new President to step into office and be confronted with a whole series of critical decisions without adequate briefing." But the powers of the Vice-President are only potential; authority comes to him only with the demise or other incapacity of the President. So far as the office of the Vice-President itself is concerned, it is up to the each future President to make whatever can be made "of this, disappointing office." In all, the Vice-President has been chiefly useful to the President by relieving him of ceremonial duties and making goodwill journeys abroad.

Succession to the Presidency. Nine Vice-Presidents have so far succeeded to the Presidency and all in the event of death during their terms. The Constitution provides: "In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of his said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President....¹⁷ This provision, it will be noticed, does not give the Vice-President any constitutional right to assume the title of the President. It simply provides that the duties and powers of the Presidential office shall devolve upon the Vice-President. But John Tyler, the first Vice-President to fill a vacancy, took the title of the President for all practical purposes and did not differentiate himself in position and powers from the regularly elected holders of the office. His example has since been followed. According to the Twenty-second Amendment a man succeeding to the Presidency and serving more than two years may be elected President in his own right only once."¹⁸

No case of Impeachment has made a vacancy for a Vice-President. Nor has there been an occasion on which "the inability to discharge the powers and duties" on the part of the President may have resulted into the moving up of the Vice-President. President Garfield was physically unable for more than two months in 1881 to perform any important official work. President Woodrow Wilson was similarly incapacitated for a considerably long time during the latter part of his second term. Even absence from the United States for months together, as it happened during the terms of office of Woodrow Wilson, Franklin Roosevelt and Harry Truman, did not constitute "inability to discharge the duties" of Presidency. This is for two reasons. In the first place, neither the Constitution, till the Twenty-fifth Amendment became law on February 10, 1967, nor the laws provided who was competent to determine and under what circumstances a President might be considered unable to discharge his duties. Secondly, there had been extreme reluctance on the part of even ailing Presidents and their families to surrender authority. The result was that the question of succession to Presidency, except in case of death, remained obscure.

The Twenty-fifth Amendment provides that the Vice-President would take over the duties and responsibilities of the Presidency: (1) if the President states in writing that he is unable to carry out his duties, and (2) if the Vice-President and a majority of the Heads of Executive Departments believe that there is Presidential disability and send to Congress a declaration to that effect. But it is only in his acting capacity that the Vice-President takes over the office of the President. When the President resumes office after the incapacity does not exist, he reverts to his original office of Vice-President. If, however, the Vice-President and a majority of the principal officers of the Executive Departments inform in writing to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives that the President was unable to discharge the duties of his office, Congress then decides whether the President was unable or not to discharge his duties. If it decided that incapacity still existed the Vice-President continues to remain the Acting-President otherwise the President shall resume the duties of his office.

17. Article II, Section 1, Clause 5.

18. "No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice and no person who has held the office of President, or acted as President, for more than two years of a term to which some other person was elected President shall be elected to the office of President more than once...."

THE POWERS AND DUTIES OF THE PRESIDENT

The Sources of the President's Authority. The powers and duties of the President are partly determined by the Constitution, partly by Acts of Congress and treaties, partly as a result of usages and precedents, and partly by judicial interpretations. Article II of the Constitution, which deals with the office of the President, is primarily devoted to the methods of election, his term, qualifications, compensation, and oath of office. The clauses relative to his powers and duties are few and brief. Some of them are specific, but many of them are general in terms and hence open to interpretation. But a great deal of responsibility which now rests on the shoulders of the President may be traced to laws which Congress has, from time to time, enacted. Congressional statutes authorise the President to determine policies which may have far-reaching effects, make important appointments, and to issue orders which for all practical purposes have the force of law. Congress may also bestow upon him the exercise of wide discretionary powers within the framework of the laws passed by it. In 1933, for example, Congress vested the President with the discretionary power to reduce the gold contents of the dollar, to issue additional paper money, and to purchase silver as a partial currency. In 1941, the Lend-Lease Act gave to the President enormous discretionary powers in the matter of furnishing ships, munitions and supplies to the countries fighting against the Axis powers. Similarly, the programmes of economic and military aids in different parts of the world give to the President a wide range of discretion in the allocation of money and direction of aid.

The Supreme Court, too, has defined Presidential powers; for example, it has held that the President's power to remove from office can be exercised without consulting the Senate.¹⁹ Where the Constitution is silent, the judiciary has been called upon to articulate. The Constitution gives the President the power to pardon offenders, but it does not say whether he may pardon a man before he is convicted. The Supreme Court held that the President possesses such a power and may pardon the offender even before he is convicted.²⁰ In some cases the Supreme Court has refused to take jurisdiction on the ground that the matter involved political questions belonging to the sphere of the President or Congress as it was held in Luther v. Borden (1849). The Court affirmed that the constitutional guarantee to every State of a "republican form of government" presents a 'political question.' But more recently Justices "have appeared willing, even eager, to jump into what Mr. Justice Frankfurter aptly called 'the political thicket.'"²¹

Finally, some Presidential powers and duties have been acquired through custom and usage. For example, the President is accepted as the leader of his party and is conceded the right to be consulted on all matters affecting the interest of his party both inside and outside Congress. The custom of Senatorial courtesy has now developed into a well-recognised policy for purposes of political patronage. Washington assumed he was master of his own family (the Cabinet) and Congress eventually concurred. He also established himself as the sole vehicle of communication with foreign governments and in the "Whisky Rebellion" he established the responsibility of his office for suppression of domestic disorder. President Jackson is responsible for the exercise of veto power over legislation on policy grounds; previously it has been more or less assumed that the use of the veto was to be confined to questions of unconstitutionality.

19. Myers v. United States (1926).

20. Ex-parte Garland (1886).

21. Irish, Marian D., and Prothro, James W., The Politics of American Democracy, p. 136.

Extent of President's Power. But the real extent of the powers of the President depends upon his own personality, the influence he wields, and the state of affairs under which the office is administered. In times of national emergencies the powers of the President may be so expanded as to be limited in effect only by the necessities of the national existence. The powers wielded by President Lincoln during the Civil War were so enormous that he was frequently referred to as a dictator.²² Both Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt assumed vast and unprecedented powers.

Since many provisions of the Constitution relating to the powers of the President are general in terms, it all depends upon how the President takes a view of his responsibilities and duties as the chief executive. He may take a narrow view and may be satisfied with the bare duties of enforcing the Constitution and the law and conduct of routine administration. To put it bluntly one may, like President Coolidge, not strive to be "a great President." Some may take a broad view of his powers and responsibilities, as did Theodore Roosevelt, who asserted that it was the President's right "to do anything that the needs of the nation demand unless such action is forbidden by the Constitution or the laws." The famous Monroe doctrine laid down in 1823, the essentials of United States' foreign policy and it still continues to hold good.²³ In the early stages of the first World War President Woodrow Wilson so defined the American rights of commerce and travel that it dragged the country eventually into war. Immediately after his inauguration in 1933, President Franklin Roosevelt assumed leadership to steer the country out of the economic crisis through his policy of New Deal. Later, he so formulated his foreign policy towards the Axis powers that it involved the United States in actual hostilities. The role of the President is, therefore, affected by his personality and the times. The people and the times, the complicated and fast-moving stream of events of the twentieth century, need strong and decisive leaders to occupy the White House.

Classification of Presidential powers. The powers of the President may be divided broadly into: (1) those chiefly or exclusively executive in character; (2) those arising out of the legislative process; and (3) those which flow to him as a national leader. The executive powers of the President may further be divided under the following headings: (i) supervision over the administrative agencies of the federal government, (ii) enforcement of the laws, (iii) to make appointments and removals, (iv) granting of pardons, (v) to conduct diplomatic relations and negotiate treaties, (vi) to act as Commander-in-Chief of the armed forces of the United States, and (vii) to act in emergencies.

22. Justifying the use of his executive prerogative in the absence of expressly granted authority, Lincoln declared, "No organic law can ever be framed with a provision specifically applicable to every question which may arise. The whole of the laws are being resisted and all will be destroyed if not protected....I am to sacrifice one law in order to save the rest....The Constitution is silent on the emergency."

23. President James Monroe in a message to Congress in 1823 laid down his foreign policy commonly known as the Monroe Doctrine.

EXECUTIVE POWERS

The President as chief administrator. The President assumes high technical responsibilities as head of the national administration. It is the duty of the President, as chief executive, to see that the Constitution, laws and treaties of the United States, and decisions rendered by the federal courts are duly enforced throughout the country. He may, accordingly, direct the heads of the departments and their subordinates in the discharge of the functions vested in them by the Acts of Congress. It is true that Congress has assumed the power of deciding the structure and extent of authority of administrative departments, but it does not detract the right of the President to control administration. There are some departments which are placed by law under his direct control. Moreover, the Constitution entrusts him with the duty of the faithful execution of the laws.²⁴ The Constitution also permits him to "require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the executive departments, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices." This provision when supplemented by the decision of the Supreme Court that the President is bound to see that an officer faithfully carries out the duties assigned to him by law, makes the legal position of the President supreme. Finally, the President has the power to remove the head of the Department who refuses to obey his orders. His authority to determine and direct, within the framework of law, the steps to be taken by that officer is clear and definite. "He is not likely," observes Charles Beard, "to quarrel with a Cabinet officer over details but when there is a serious conflict over important public policies, the President, if firm in his views, will prevail, and the officer will yield, resign, or be dismissed. Such a conflict occurred in the administration of President Coolidge in 1924 between the President and his Attorney-General, Harry M. Daugherty; and the Attorney-General was forced to resign under protest."²⁵

Thus, upon the President rests the overwhelming responsibility for the administration of the national government. The simple provision of the Constitution which vests in him the duty of seeing that all the laws of the United States are properly executed carries "the awesome significance of this responsibility." The Report of the Hoover Commission on Organisation of the Executive Branch of the Government stated: "The critical state of world affairs requires the government of the United States to speak and act with unity of purpose, firmness, and restraint in dealing with other nations. It must act decisively to preserve its human and material resources. It must develop strong machinery for the national defence, while seeking to construct an enduring world peace. It cannot perform these tasks if its organisation for development and execution of policy is confused and disorderly, or if the Chief Executive is handicapped in providing firm direction to the departments and agencies.²⁶

24. Article II, Section 2, Clause 1.

25. American Government and Politics, op. cit., p. 170.

A century and a half ago, when Jefferson became President, the federal government employed 2,120 persons. Today, by latest count, the President heads a colossal establishment of over 2½ million federal civilian employees. These employees work in 2,117 component units of federal administration—in 2,117 departments, services, bureaus, commissions, boards, governmental corporations and other types of agencies. They are spread throughout the world and their wages alone amount to over $10 billion a year. It is impossible for any President, whatever be the extent of his drive and however dynamic personality he may possess, to keep proper supervision over all the administrative agencies. And despite the immensity of the job, the President is only a part-time administrator. His other tasks demand most of his time, attention, and energy. It, therefore, necessitates some integrated system of organization which should facilitate the President for leadership and control.

This is provided, in the first place, by the Presidential Secretariat consisting of the President's Secretaries and the staff that functions under them. They make a total of over 250 employees in the White House Office. The Secretaries are an able core of attaches to aid him in keeping abreast of administrative work. A recent development is the authorization of administrative assistants to the President in addition to the executive Secretaries. The President's Committee on Administrative Management urged that the lack of staff assistants to the President be remedied by the appointment of six administrative assistants who "should be possessed of high competence, great physical vigour, and a passion for anonymity." The Administrative Reorganization Act of 1939 provided for six Administrative Assistants to the President. Their duties are not precisely described by law but they include: collecting information for the President on all matters of interest to him as Chief administrator and head of his party, smoothing out troubles in politics and administration; scrutinizing and reporting on appointments to offices and work done by the civil servants, keeping the President in touch with Congress and keeping a liaison between the President and Congress, and keeping the President informed about the flow of the public opinion, grievances and needs of the citizens and of States and local government with respect to the work of the federal agencies.

In addition to the three Secretaries and six administrative assistants, the President has his personal staff consisting of an assistant to the President, a special counsel to the President, an executive clerk, and Army, Navy and Air Force aides. Outside this inner circle are the heads of a number of staff agencies who advise the President on policy and "help him run the administrative leviathan." The most important of these is the Director of the Bureau of the Budget. Several other Presidential agencies have also vital functions especially in the making of economic and military policies. They are: the Council of Economic Advisers, the National Security Council, the Office of the Defence Mobilization, Board of Impartial Analysis, and Office of Personnel. The Executive office of the President has since been expanded to a personnel of some 1,200 Executive Secretaries, officials, assistants, clerks and other employees. Within this large group is the White House Secretariat.

26. General Management of the Executive Branch, p. 2 (1949).

Power of law enforcement. The Constitution commands the President to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed."²⁷ It also prescribes that the President must take an oath at the time of inauguration that "he will protect and defend the Constituion of the United States."²⁸ As law enforcement official for the nation, the President's responsibility is not limited to the execution of the specific provisions of Congressional statutes. It includes as well the duty of protecting the whole constitutional system of government, guarding it against attack from any source, and ensuring to all citizens protection against rebellion or other danger to the rights the Constitution guarantees to them. The law the President enforces embraces all phases of the Constitution as interpreted by the Courts. If the enforcement of laws encounters a violent resistance the President may use the armed forces of the nation to see that the laws are faithfully executed. President Eisenhower dispatched federal troops to Little Rock, Arkansas, on September 24, 1957, to enforce the Federal Court's ruling on desegregation. Addressing the American nation on the situation in Little Rock and justifying the presence of federal troops there, the President said, "When large gathering of obstructionist made it impossible for the decrees of the court to be carried out, both the law and national interest demanded that President take action." Five years later (September 1962) there occurred the greatest clash since the Civil War between the Federal Government and the State of Mississippi, where Governor Barnett defied a Federal Court injunction to admit a negro, James Meredith, to the hitherto all white University of Mississippi. Seven hundred Federal Marshals were sent to enforce the law against the State national guards who surrounded the University on the Governor's orders and even threatened to resist by force if the Federal Marshals brought Meredith to the University. President Kennedy thereupon ordered the mobilization of the Mississippi national guards thus placing it under the command of the Federal Government. Troops and military police were also sent and James Meredith was finally enrolled. In 1894, President Cleveland, despite the protests of the Governor of Illinois, sent soldiers to Chicago where a great railway strike, affecting the movement of commerce and mail, had taken place. President Wilson, too, resorted to the same action on the occasion of the labour dispute among the steel workers at Gary, Indiana. Even if the President apprehends that laws are not likely to be obeyed, or there is the possibility of their being obstructed, he may order out the troops. President Harding ordered the troops to stand by in 1922, when a strike threatened to tie up the railways. Troops were sent to take over the plant of the

27. Article II, Section 3.

28. Article II, Section 1.

North American Airplane Corporation in 1944, when strikers refused to heed the repeated appeals of the President.

The extent of the President's authority as chief law-enforcement officer of the nation is nowhere better illustrated than in the Supreme Court's decision in In re Neagle, one of the most dramatic cases in the American Constitutional History. In 1890, the Attorney-General of the United States, under direction of the President but without any specific statutory authority, detailed United States Marshal Neagle to act as bodyguard of Justice Stephen J. Field of the Supreme Court, whose life had been threatened by a citizen of California. The Justice was attacked in a railroad restaurant when Neagle shot to death the assassin. Neagle was arrested and indicted for murder by the California authorities. Neagle sought a writ of habeas corpus to secure his release from California authorities, an action eventually appealed to the Supreme Court. His defence hinged upon finding legal authority for his special assignment, that is, the authority for the President's appointment of an agent without statutory authorization. The Supreme Court held that inasmuch as it is the duty of the President "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed" there was vested in the President authority for Neagle's assignment, although there was no specific statute of Congress allowing the President and the Attorney-General to direct the Marshal to protect Supreme Court Judges. The Court further declared that the President's duty was not confined "to the enforcement of the Acts of Congress or of treaties of the United States according to their express terms," but included "the rights and obligations growing out of the Constitution itself, our international relations and all the protection implied by the nature of the government under the Constitution."

Presidents before and after Neagle's time have not hesitated to use the immense power which the Constitution vests in them as such. But it does not mean that President's power is not without limit. It is true, that the Chief Executive may sometimes act, as President Washington did in sending troops (15,000 of them) in crushing the Whisky Rebellion of 1794; Lincoln took immediate action, with Congress not even in session, to move against 'treasonable individuals' who defied the power of the Union in southern States, or as is in the Neagle's case, without specific authorization from Congress. But he has no carte blanche to do so in all cases. The Supreme Court recently acted as a brake to slow down unlimited expansion in the powers of the President. In 1952, President Truman seized the nation's steel mills justifying his action on the grounds of the grave national emergency facing the nation if the strike should take place. The President was not supported in his action by authorization of Congress. The Supreme Court, in Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. v. Sawyer, found the President's action invalid. The majority of the Court held that the President had transcended his authority, for no support of the seizure order could be found in the Acts of Congress, in the President's power as Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces, or in the general constitutional grants of executive power to the President. The President, in this instance, was making basic law rather than executing it and the exercise of such a power he did not have under the doctrine of the Separation of Powers.

The power of appointment. The power to appoint is one of the most important and effective in the list of Presidential powers. It gives the President the means to command the allegiance of a huge number of federal officers and enables him to secure the active support of the members of Congress for his programme. The Constitution gives the President the power to nominate and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to "appoint ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments." Thus, appointments to the federal services fall under two groups: officers whose appointment is entrusted by the Constitution or by an Act of Congress to the President and Senate, and "inferior officers" whose appointment is vested by Congress in the President alone, the courts of law, or the heads of departments.²⁹ There has never been made a logical line of division and distinction between the "superior" and "inferior" officers. In the first category, however, are included heads of departments, judges, diplomats, regulatory Commissioners, Marshals, and Collectors of Customs. Some bureau chiefs and virtually all subordinate employees fall under the second category.

Taken together, the officers belonging to superior category now number several thousand. In filling these posts the President and the Senate are subject to no restrictions, except in some cases when Congress by law may fix some qualifications as citizenship, professional qualifications, technical training, etc. The Tenure Office Act of 1820 fixed the tenure of great bulk of offices at four years, and even where the term is not prescribed by statute, the custom is to replace most of them at the expiration of four years. So in practice the four years' tenure is universal, except for federal judges, and each President during his term has at his disposal an enormous extent of patronage, subject to the approval of the Senate. During 1954 Eisenhower sent in 45,916 appointments to the Senate for confirmation. Not one of these was rejected. Of the total, 420,57 were military appointments, which are customarily automatically confirmed. Of the 3,859 civilian appointments, just half were postmasters.

There are some appointments which are the personal choices of the President and the usual practice for the Senate is to ratify them promptly and without objections even if the Senate is in the hands of the party in opposition to the President. It rarely interferes with the President's selection of his own Cabinet, that is, heads of Departments, ambassadors and Supreme Court Justices. The only two exceptions during the last forty years were Charles B. Warren nominated by President Coolidge as Attorney-General and rejected by the Senate, and its refusal to confirm Eisenhower's nominee for Secretary of Commerce, Lewis, L. Strauss, for political reasons.³⁰ The choice of the diplomatic representatives is also left largely to President's discretion, although Senate's rejection of Martin Van Burn as Minister to Britain will be remembered from the Jackson administration. On occasions, the President may be obliged to withdraw the diplomatic nomination on grounds of political expediency. In 1943, President Franklin Roosevelt nominated Edward J. Flynn to the post of ambassador to Austria. A storm in the Senate broke out and Flynn was attacked as a politician with a "clouded past and a man utterly unqualified for the position in question." President Roosevelt withdrew his name. Military and naval appointments, especially in times of crisis, are principally subject to Presidential determination. Finally, Supreme Court Justiceships are filled by the President and nearly always approved. The Senate, however, refused to approve President Hoover's appointment of Circuit Judge John J. Parker in 1930, largely because of labour and negro opposition. The Senate on April 8, 1970 rejected President Nixon's nomination of Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court. In November 1969 Clement Haynsworth's nomination was rejected.

29. The only appointments made by courts of law are: clerks, reporters, and other ministerial officers. There are, however, a large number of inferior officers in the various Departments who are appointed by the Heads of Departments.

In all other instances Senate freely uses its power to ratify or reject the appointments as it sees fit. As a rule, the Senate usually gives its consent unless there are substantial reasons to reject. Much, however, depends upon its political complexion. If the majority of the Senators belong to the President's party, then, all Presidential appointments are usually confirmed, for it requires just a bare majority of the Senators present. Confirmation of appointments need not require a two-thirds vote as in the case of ratification of treaties.

A good many of the federal offices, specially those of a local nature, are subject to a custom called senatorial courtesy. This is an unwritten rule which requires that the President would confer with and secure the consent of the Senators of his party from the State in which appointment is made. If the President does not do so and insists on his own personal choice, the other Senators, acting under the rule of senatorial courtesy, will probably reject the nomination. One of the best examples of the operation of senatorial courtesy was the Floyd H. Robert case of 1938-39. President Roosevelt appointed Robert as Judge of the Federal District Court for Western Virginia. This appointment was objected to by both the Senators belonging to the State of Virginia, and the President's party. The President without heeding to their objections sent the name to the Senate for confirmation and the Senate rejected it. A similar conflict occurred in 1951 between President Truman and Senator Paul H. Douglas (Democrat) over two federal judgeships. When the President refused to accept the Senator's candidates, Douglas opposed the President's nominees and the Senate unanimously refused to confirm the President's nominees. In case the federal vacancies to be filled are located in a State which has no Senators of the President's party, the President has some discretion, but even here he is bound to consult party leaders in the region concerned.

The above statement of senatorial courtesy is not the actual practice. Ordinarily, the Senators do not wait to be consulted. They keep their eyes on the possible vacancies and send messages, through the 30. Altogether there had been eight such rejections.

President's liaison representative for Congressional affairs, requesting that certain of their followers be nominated to the positions. The President may attempt to inquire into the qualifications of the nominees of the Senators, but in many instances he simply endorses their desires. In fact, he has no time for all that.

Another class of officers subject to Presidential nomination are minor authorities like revenue officials, marshals and Federal Attorneys within Congressional districts. The custom is that the Representative, if he belongs to the President's party, names the person to be appointed for his district and the recommendation is always accepted unless for special reasons the President desires to make a "personal" appointment. If the Representative does not belong to the President's party, the patronage may go to the Senator if there is one of the President's political party. Extension of such a kind of patronage to the Representatives is of considerable utility for maintaining their political organisation.

Finally, are the great variety of federal appointments to minor offices which do not require confirmation of Senate at all. The power of all such appointments is vested by the Acts of Congress in the President alone or in the heads of various Departments and more than 95 per cent of federal appointments come under this category. By far the greater portion of them are now regarded as "classified services" and the appointment is made under civil service rules. Still, from 20 to 30 per cent are treated as patronage. When Congress carries the majority of the party to which the President belongs, and the relations between the two are harmonious, then, it is inclined to increase the proportion of officials whose appointment is vested in the President alone or in heads of Departments. But in times of conflict Congress exhibits its hostility. For example, in 1943, Congress was in "revolt" against President Roosevelt's domestic policy and it severely criticised some of the appointments made by him. The Senate went to such an extent as to actually pass a Bill providing that the selection of all officials, with certain exceptions, carrying a salary of $4,100 a year or more, should be subject to the approval of the Senate. Such a threat is always 'a gun behind the door' which Congress may employ in controlling the exercise of the President's appointing power.

The power to remove. While the Constitution expressly authorises the President to appoint officers, with the consent of the Senate, it is completely silent on the question whether he may remove an officer, either with or without the consent of the Senate. The only provision in the Constitution in regard to removal is that by Impeachment. But this process of removal is cumbersome and unwieldy. Moreover, the resort to Impeachment to remove a person from a petty inferior office "would be," as Garner puts it, "very much like shooting birds with artillery intended for destroying battleships."³¹

The issue of dismissal assumed an important topic in the first session of Congress. There was difference of opinion as to whether that power lay with the President alone or he could do so with the consent of the Senate only, or whether the power lay with Congress to prescribe how removals might be made. It was finally decided that the President might remove alone and there was no necessity of securing the consent of the Senate. This last interpretation has been the one accepted by the Supreme Court. In 1866, Congress passed the Tenure of Office Act forbidding the President to make removals except with the consent of the Senate. The Act reversed the custom which had been in practice for seventy-eight years and recognised the unlimited right of the President to remove officers securing the consent of the Senate. President Johnson violated this law regarding it unconstitutional and it was one of the chief causes of his Impeachment in 1868. The Act was, however, repealed in 1887.

31. Government in the United States (1930), p. 303.

In 1876, an Act of Congress was passed providing that certain classes of postmasters could not be removed from office except with the advice and consent of the Senate. The constitutionality of this Act was contested in the Supreme Court and it was decided in Myres v. United States that the statute was unconstitutional and that the power to remove was implied not only from the power to appoint, but also from the general authority of the Executive to see that the laws are executed faithfully.³² But this decision was modified in 1935. The Supreme Court held in Humphery's case that a regulatory commission's powers are quasi-legislative and quasi-judicial in nature and that the President's removal authority could be limited in respect to officers exercising such powers.³³

To conclude, as to purely administrative offices, for which the President bears constitutional responsibility for the faithful performance of the duties thereof, complete and independent removal power rests in the President to be exercised on any ground. But three classes of officers cannot be removed by the President. First, the judges of the Federal Courts who can be removed by Impeachment only. Second, members of the various Boards and Commissions with part legislative and part judicial powers who are protected by statutory limitations on the removal power. Third, all officers and employees who are appointed under Civil Service rules and may not be removed "except for such causes as will promote the efficiency of the service."

The power of pardon. The President's power to grant pardons and reprieves is judicial in nature, and it is exclusive. The Constitution authorises the President "to grant reprieves and pardons for offences against the United States except in cases of Impeachment." The President cannot, of course, pardon offences against State laws. Nor can he do it in regard to Impeachment offences. Otherwise, his authority of granting pardons is very wide and if he chooses he may grant a pardon before as well as after conviction. A reprieve postpones the execution of the penalty. A general pardon, granted to a large number of offenders, is called an amnesty and is granted by proclamation. A good example of amnesty is Jefferson's freeing all persons convicted under the Sedition Act of 1798. In 1865, Johnson issued a proclamation offering amnesty to all those who had borne arms against the United States, with certain exceptions and subject to certain conditions.

32. Justices McReynolds, Brandeis and Holmes did not agree with the majority opinion. The majority opinion declaring the Act of 1876 unconstitutional and giving full power of removal to President was written by the former President, Chief Justice Taft.

33. Humphery's Executor (Rathbun) v. United States (1935).

In actual practice, the President does not himself exercise his discretion in granting pardons. He has delegated his responsibility to a large extent to the Department of Justice and acts upon its recommendations, though he may take, as President Harding personally took, steps to arrange pardon for Deles.

The military powers of the President. The Constitution declares that the President shall be the Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy and the State militia when called into the service of the United States. Provisions of law empower the President to appoint military and naval officers with the advice and consent of the Senate and in time of war to dismiss them at will. The power to declare war belongs to Congress, though the President may through the conduct of the foreign affairs of the country bring about the situation when declaration of war may become a virtual necessity. President McKinley despatched a battleship to Havana, where it was blown up, and it helped precipitate war with Spain. In 1918, President Wilson sent American forces to Siberia to help Allied troops, when no state of war existed between the United States and Russia, fighting the Bolsheviks. Under Harding and Coolidge armed forces were employed to suppress "disorders" in certain Caribbean countries. The United States declared war against Germany in 1941, but the navy had begun to fire on submarines threatening the convoys to Britain long before that. In fact, "a shooting war" had started in 1940. President Truman had no authorization from Congress in 1950 when he ordered American forces to resist aggression in Korea.

When war actually comes, there is tremendous enhancement in President's power both as executive head and as Commander-in-Chief. As Commander-in-Chief, he decides where the troops are to be located and where the ships are to be stationed. It is upon his orders that troops are mobilised, the fleets assembled, and the militia of the States called out. He may direct the campaign and might, if he wished, take command of military operations, though in practice he never does so. But all major decisions of strategy, and many of tactics as well, are his alone to make or to approve. Congress may still more add to his powers by enacting blanket legislation giving him discretionary authority in matters of vital importance in domestic and foreign affairs. In World War I President Wilson was given power to control production, purchase and sale of various kinds of material for war purposes and food supplies for troops. He had power to take factories, mines, pipe lines, etc. In fact, he had a vast reservoir of power in planning broad strategy, raising military and industrial man power, and mobilising the nation's economy for war. In World War II, Congress again delegated vast authority to the President and Roosevelt became a sort of constitutional dictator. Roosevelt used "Lincolnian as well as Wilsonian" precedents. In 1942, he demanded that Congress must repeal within a month a provision in the Price Control Act that protected the farmer and which it had refused to repeal earlier. This threat of Roosevelt was characterised as "a claim of power on the part of the President to suspend the Constitution in a situation deemed by him to make such a step necessary."³⁴ Anyway, Roosevelt's threat succeeded and Congress "meekly" repealed the provision. The Supreme Court has expressed its unwillingness to pass judgment on war policies. In the West Coast—Japanese curfew regulations case in 1943, the Court declared, "The Constitution commits to the Executive and to Congress the exercise of the war power. . . . It has necessarily given them wide scope for the exercise of judgment and discretion. . . . It is not for any court to sit in review of the wisdom of their action or substitute its judgment for theirs."³⁵ In the atomic age of absolute weapons in which we live the next war-time President will have the right, of which Lincoln spoke, to take "any measure which may best subdue the enemy."

Some forms of the Constitution, no doubt, are suspended during actual hostilities. But two basic constitutional rights do remain or have so far remained during all wars of the United States. One is the ultimate control of the President by the people, that is, Presidential elections must be held during peace and war. In the midst of Civil War Lincoln had to campaign for re-election and seek the verdict of the people. Roosevelt had twice to do the same in World War II. Similarly, despite certain restrictions, the basic liberties of free speech and free press "have survived the hard test of war."

The President may establish military government in conquered territory and in territory acquired through cession, subject to the Acts of Congress. After World War II, military governments were set up by the United States in Italy, Japan, and in certain sections of Korea, Germany and Austria. These military governments functioned until the signing of the peace treaty and were administered by a combination of American and local personnel.

At home, the President may use troops in executing federal laws against resistance that cannot be overcome by ordinary civil process. It is also his constitutional duty to guarantee to each State of the union a republican form of government, protect it against invasion, and to order out troops to suppress domestic violence upon the application of the State Legislature or Executive, as stated in an earlier part of this Chapter.

The President and Foreign Affairs. The Constitution does nowhere expressly declare that the President is the chief foreign policy maker and the accredited official spokesman of the country in international affairs. But constitutional interpretations and practices accept him so and ascribe such functions to him. In 1799, John Marshall spoke of the President as "the sole organ of the nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations." In the Curtiss-Wright case in 1936,³⁶ the Supreme Court referred to the "exclusive power of the President as the sole organ of the Federal Government in the field of international relations—a power which does not require as a basis for 34. Corwin, E.S., Total War and the Constitution, p. 64.

35. Hirabayashi v. United States (1943).

36. United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp. See also University of Illinois v. United States.

its exercise an act of Congress, but, which like every other governmental power, must be exercised in subordination to the applicable provisions of the Constitution." According to the Constitution, the President appoints ambassadors, and other public ministers, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, he negotiates and concludes treaties with foreign governments subject to the ratification of two-thirds majority of the Senate, and he receives ambassadors and other public ministers from foreign countries.

The power to appoint ambassadors and to receive them is important, because it involves the vital power of recognition. The President has complete discretion to recognise or not new governments or States. In 1902, Theodore Roosevelt recognised the new State of Panama a few hours after a revolt had been staged with the help of United States forces. President Wilson withheld recognition from Mexican Governments which he disapproved. President Hoover tried to restrain Japan from an aggressive policy by refusing to recognise its puppet Manchukuo. Roosevelt recognised the government of Soviet Russia in 1933.³⁷ But the Communist regime in China has not so far been recognised. Withdrawal of diplomatic agents or alterations in their assignments or instructions amounts to disapproval with the policy of the country concerned. For example, after the conquest of Ethiopia by Italy in 1936, the American legation in Addis Ababa was reduced to a consulate. A more extreme form of indicating displeasure with a country involves closing its consulates as in the case of Germany in 1940.

The President shares his treaty-making power with the Senate. But there are many other methods by which the President may by-pass the Senate. The first of this kind are the executive agreements. Executive agreements "are pledges of certain action by executives of two countries." A famous example is the "gentleman's agreement" between President Theodore Roosevelt and the Emperor of Japan under which Roosevelt agreed to exert his influence and persuade Congress to kill exclusion legislation and the Emperor of Japan agreed to prohibit the emigration of coolies. Some executive agreements have marked famous events: The Boxer Protocol of 1901, the Atlantic Charter, and the "destroyer bases" agreement. The Supreme Court has held that executive agreements within range of the President's power are to be the law of the land. "Such precedents," says E.S. Corwin, "make it difficult to state any limit to the power of the President and Congress, acting jointly, to implement effectively any foreign policy, upon which they agree, no matter how the recalcitrant third plus one man of the Senate may feel about the matter."³⁸ rates by proclamation to the extent of fifty per cent without securing the ratification by the Senate. This Act was extended once in 1937 and again in 1940. In 1943 the term was extended for two years only.

In addition to the executive agreements, Congress may confer authority on the President to make agreements with other nations. The most notable example of such Congressional authority is the Reciprocal Trade Act of 1934, which authorised the President, for a period of three years, to enter into trade agreements with foreign countries, and lower tariff

37. Wilson, Harding, Coolidge and Hoover had refused to recognise the Russian Soviet Government from 1917 to 1933.

38. The Constitution and What It Means Today, p. 102.

The President may resort to secret diplomacy and consequently enter into secret agreements with foreign powers and commit himself to the pursuit of a specific policy. This he does by appointing personal emissaries of ambassadorial rank, without submitting their names to the Senate for confirmation as required in the case of more permanent appointees. President Theodore Roosevelt sent a high emissary to Tokyo in 1905, and came to terms with Japan on certain important matters in the Far East. On her part Japan undertook to respect American dominion in the Philippines. Roosevelt, on his part, committed his government to accept the establishment of Japanese sovereignty on Korea. He also impressed upon the Japanese Premier that the people of the United States were determined to see that peace is maintained in the Far East and that "whatever occasion arose, appropriate action of the government of the United States...for such a purpose could be counted upon by them quite as confidently as if the United States was under the treaty obligation." The whole negotiations were so quietly arranged that nothing was known about it in America until after the death of Theodore Roosevelt. Before and after United States entered into World War II, Franklin Roosevelt held top secret conferences with British Prime Minister and heads of other governments. Some of the agreements reached at these conferences were made public, others were kept secret. From Washington's Proclamation of neutrality in 1793 to Eisenhower's decision to go to the Summit in 1955, the President has repeatedly committed the nation to decisive attitudes and actions abroad, more than once, to war itself. Truman was not exaggerating much when he told an informal gathering of the Jewish War Veterans in 1948: "I make American Foreign Policy."

If properly evaluated the powers of the President as chief foreign policy maker and as Commander-in-Chief are, indeed, real, matter of fact, and colossal. And it is not surprising that the President's figure looms large in world politics. In an age of international complexities and mounting tension in which we live, every word uttered by the President of the United States is searched for meaning in foreign offices throughout the world. Whenever people talk in the capitals of their respective countries "what is the United States going to do?" they actually mean therefrom "what is the President going to do." As Commander-in-Chief he deploys America's armed forces abroad and occasionally supports policies with what is known as "Presidential war-making." It must, however, be noted that in spite of the immensity of his powers in the fields of foreign relations much depends upon the personality of the President, the state of conditions prevailing in the country and his ability to persuade Congress to approve or at least finance his programme. The President has, no doubt, the authority and capacity to act even independently of Congress, but he cannot act beyond Congress. Congress provides money and unless it provides what the President asks for, no President can succeed in his efforts. Checks and balances operate in foreign policy-making and cannot be ignored.

The President and Emergencies. Emergencies arise in the life of every nation and it is the fundamental right of every State to meet them and preserve its existence. Emergencies in the past concerned with the security of the State and martial law had long been justified as an emergency power to be exercised at the time of great stress to restore law and order and ensure the security of the State. But during the last two decades or so, emergencies have been used as a reason for the exercise of other governmental powers as well, chiefly in order to combat economic emergencies that seemed to threaten the life of the nation. "In recent years," writes Gosnell, "crisis has followed crisis; emergencies have appeared to create new emergencies. One wonders if the United States will ever return to what was formally considered normal times."³⁹ An associated cause of the growth of Presidency, according to Griffiths, is the shattering series of emergencies, both foreign and domestic, that has been America's lot during the past century. Rossiter makes us to accept an axiom of Political Science that great emergencies in the life of a constitutional State "bring an increase in executive power and prestige, always at least temporarily, more often than not permanently."⁴⁰ He cites the examples of Lincoln, Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt. "Each of these men left the Presidency a stronger instrument, an office with more customary and statutory powers, than it had been before the crisis."⁴¹

The Constitution of the United States does not specifically provide for any kind of emergency. The Supreme Court, too, has held that "emergency does not create power"; nor does it increase power already given in the Constitution.⁴² The exercise of the emergency powers by the President is based either on his military power, his responsibility to see that the laws are faithfully executed or an emergency power delegated to him by Congress. In times of military emergency the President has always resorted to extraordinary means. But, it was not until 1933, that the President first made use of emergency powers to meet an economic crisis and since then Presidents have issued proclamations declaring both "limited" and "unlimited" national emergencies.

The laws passed by Congress are not uniform concerning actions which may be taken in case of emergencies. Under a few such laws the President may act only after Congress itself has declared that an emergency exists. But ordinarily Congress authorises the President himself to determine whether there is an emergency. "The use of emergency powers is both salutary and dangerous. Properly used they are restorative; improperly used, they may become a prelude to dictatorship."

But such a contingency cannot happen in the United States. The system of checks and balances limits the emergency powers of the President. As said earlier the Supreme Court, in Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. v. Sawyer (1952), refused to uphold President Truman when he issued an order directing the Secretary of Commerce to take possession of and operate most of the nation's steel mills. The President's justification for his action was that to avert national catastrophe it was 39. Fundamentals of American National Government, op. cit., p. 285.

40. Rossiter, Clinton, American Presidency, p. 65.

41. Ibid.

42. Home Building and Loan Association v. Blaisdell (1934).

necessary. The Supreme Court declared that there was no source of authority for the President's action either in the Constitution or in any Act of Congress. It was not even a valid exercise of the military power of President, for, according to Justice Black, the Commander-in-Chief does not have the power "to take possession of private property in order to keep labour disputes from stopping production. This is a job for the nation's law-making, not for its military authorities....The Constitution does not subject this law-making power of Congress to Presidential or military supervision or control."

From the decision in the Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. v. Sawyer following inferences may be drawn when the President may act without the authorization of law: (1) There must be a real emergency; (2) it must be of a type for which Congress has not already legislated; (3) and it must be one which has arisen suddenly not affording sufficient time for action by Congress. These are valid limitations to the exercise of emergency powers of the President, yet the President may still act in time of emergency. There may be times when these limits are obscure. Justice Clark, agreeing with the majority decision in the case cited above, declared, "In my view....the Constitution does grant to the President exclusive authority in times of grave and imperative emergency. In fact, to my thinking, such a grant may well be necessary to the very existence of the Constitution itself." This is "but a substantiation of the doctrine," says Gosnell, "that when emergency power is used properly, it is restorative in nature."

So long as America held relatively aloof from the world, cognisance of national emergencies could be taken alone. Now America has assumed for itself the status of a major world power and it has upset the old balance of the nineteenth century completely and finally. Woodrow Wilson wrote, in Theodore Roosevelt's last year in office, "The President can never again be the mere domestic figure he has been throughout so large a part in our history. The nation has risen to the first rank in power and resources. The other nations of the world look askance upon her, half in envy, half in fear, and wonder with a deep anxiety what she will do with her vast strength....our President must always, henceforth, be one of the great powers of the world, whether he acts greatly or wisely or not....We can never hide our present President again as a mere domestic officer....He must stand always at the front of our affairs, and the office will be as big and influential as the man who occupies it." Rossiter maintains that it may be taken as an axiom of Political Science that the more deeply a nation becomes involved in the affairs of other nations, the more powerful becomes its executive branch. "The authority of the President", he says, "has been permanently inflated by our entrance into world politics and our decision to be armed against threats of aggression, and as the world grows smaller, he will grow bigger."⁴³ rates the Executive and Legislative branches, assigning to each a major role in the government. No machinery is provided for integrating the two. But while the chief duty of the President is to execute the laws, he is at the same time given a share in their making. Rossiter characterises the President as the Chief Legislator, though it appears to be an extravagant title. He says, "Congress still has its strongmen, but the complexity of the problems it is asked to solve by a people who assume that all problems are solvable has made external leadership a requisite of effective operation. The President alone is in a political, constitutional, and practical position to provide such leadership, and he is therefore expected, within the limits of constitutional and political propriety, to guide Congress in much of its law-making activity." President's share in law-making is both positive and negative.

LEGISLATIVE POWERS

The Presidential system of government, as explained earlier, sepa-

43. Rossiter, Clinton, The American Presidency, p. 64.

Presidential Messages. The Constitution ordains that the President "shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may on extraordinary occasions convene both Houses or either of them, and in case of disagreement between them, with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper...."⁴⁴ The Constitution in the presence of this specific provision contemplates Presidential leadership in matters of legislation and, indeed, as Charles Beard says, "it is not too much to say that the fame of most Presidents rests upon their success in writing policies into law rather than upon their achievement as mere administrators."⁴⁵ Presidents who successfully directed Congress in policy-making are Jackson, Lincoln, Theodore Roosevelt, Wilson, and Franklin Roosevelt. The nation had rated them "great" Presidents.

The information required to be furnished is contained in an annual message (State of the Union message) communicated at the beginning of each session, and in special messages communicated from time to time during the session. The Presidential message may be delivered orally in the presence of both Houses, or sent to them in a document. The annual message is major in significance and may roughly be compared to the Speech from the Throne in England. Washington and Adams came in person to Congress to deliver information and make recommendations. Jefferson adopted the practice of communicating what he had to say in the form of a written message. This was the rule for 113 years, when in 1913, President Wilson returned to Washington's custom and began delivering his messages to Congress personally. While reviving the earlier precedent Woodrow Wilson said, "the President of the United States is a person not a mere department of the government hailing Congress from some isolated island of jealous power, sending messages, not speaking naturally and with his own voice; he is a human being trying to co-operate with other human beings in a common service."

For a time Wilson's successors followed in his footsteps. President

44. Ibid., p. 19.

45. Article II, Section 3.

46. American Government and Politics, op. cit., p. 185.

Hoover read his first message to the general public over the radio as well to Congress, but subsequently he resumed the old practice of sending written messages. Franklin D. Roosevelt restored the practice of reading personally the messages as a means of drawing the attention of the whole nation to his programme—with the invaluable help of radio and camera. This was followed at short intervals by a succession of special messages, each dealing with a particular problem and outlining in some detail the administration's proposed measure for dealing with it.

The annual message contains a review of the activities of government during the preceding year, a declaration of party policies, and recommendations for such legislation as the President deems the interests of the country require. Sometimes the message may contain an important announcement, warning some other country against pursuing a certain course of action. It may also contain a momentous statement of principles as the Monroe Doctrine incorporated in President Monroe's message of December 1823 or Roosevelt's four freedoms which summarised objectives of American foreign policy in 1941. In 1954, session of the Congress President Eisenhower presented some sixty-five proposals for new legislation in his opening address and seven supplementary later messages, plus the budget message and the annual economic report.

Less obvious, but equally important, are the frequent written messages sent from the White House to Congress on a vast scale of public problems. These messages are read by a Clerk, often indistinctly, and printed in the Congressional Record. They indicate the needs of the government and the necessity for an appropriate legislation and, thus, is a gesture to friendly legislators to the President to initiate the required measures. Often, these messages are accompanied by detailed drafts of legislation and the friendly legislators take them up as they are.

The consideration which the Presidential message receives at the hands of Congress depends upon the influence which the President wields with the two Houses. If he belongs to a different political party from that which is in control of Congress, or if for other reasons Congress is out of sympathy with his policies, his recommendations receive very little consideration. Franklin Roosevelt assumed unprecedented leadership in legislation and every important measure enacted by Congress between 1933 and 1943 either emanated from the Executive Department or was sponsored by the President. But the Congressional election of 1942 made a sharp change in the attitude of Congress with a reduced Democratic majority and a general disapproval of his domestic policy. The new Congress struck down one after another measures sponsored or favoured by President Roosevelt. All the same, aside from the impact of the Presidential personality, the oral delivery of the messages gives greater public emphasis to executive recommendations than is possible in a written message. The attendant publicity is frequently a factor in mobilizing public opinion in support of Presidential proposals. If, in addition, they receive popular approval, the Presidential prestige is enhanced considerably. In summing up the legislative powers of the President, Rossiter says, "The President who will not give his best thoughts to guiding Congress, more so the President who is temperamentally or politically unfitted 'to get along with Congress' is now rightly considered a national liability."

Power to call extraordinary sessions. The President has power to call extraordinary sessions of Congress for the consideration of special matters of an urgent character. The President cannot, of course, compel Congress to adopt his recommendations at a special session any more than at a regular session but "he can some time hasten action and if he is backed by a strong public opinion he may be able to accomplish even more." In earlier days when the second regular session of every Congress ended on March 4, with the next regular session not commencing until after the following December, special sessions were fairly numerous to deal with extraordinary situations especially in years like 1909, 1913, 1921, 1929 and 1933. Under the new calendar introduced by the Twentieth Amendment the need for special sessions is less, because the intervals between regular sessions are now shorter, and the new President after his inauguration finds a new Congress already in session.⁴⁷ In 1939, a special session was necessitated by the outbreak of War in 1939. Since 1939, there had been only one occasion when President Truman called "a Congress back to Washington after it had gone home without expectation of returning."

The President is also given the power to adjourn Congress when there is disagreement between the House of Representatives and the Senate as to time of adjournment. But this power has never been exercised, for Congress has always been able to agree on this subject.

The Budget. A sound, complete, effective and practical budget system was inaugurated in 1921 under the Budget and Accounting Act. Before there was an Executive office to enable the President to discharge the responsibilities of a Manager with regard to the expenditure of the administrative agencies. Each Department of Government submitted and defended its budget directly to Congress and the President did not review the financial demands of Departments and independent agencies. The Budget and Accounting Act, 1921 vests in the President the sole responsibility for requesting the grant of funds by Congress and empowers him to assemble, correlate, revise, reduce, or increase the estimates of the several Departments and establishments. He is required to submit to Congress a complete statement—Budget—of estimated revenues and expenditures and activities of the government as recommended programme. Budget is, thus, a detailed statement of policy objectives with means of achieving them for the guidance of Congress.

The Act of 1921 created the Budget Bureau as the organ for performing the work required of the President. It is empowered to supervise the spending activities of the various agencies and to advise the President on steps to be taken to introduce greater economy and efficiency in the administrative services. The Director of the Budget, who is head of the Bureau, is appointed by the President and acts directly and solely under the President. Since 1939, the Bureau has been located in the Executive Office of the President and has become the President's largest and most valuable staff agency. The Act also created the independent General Accounting Office, headed by the Comptroller General. "In taking the initiative for transferring the Bureau of Budget to the Executive office of the President, providing high level advisers within the White House Office and creating an executive planning organization, Roosevelt made it possible for a President to come closer to fulfilling the charges of the office than would have been conceivable before these steps were taken."⁴⁸

47. The Amendment was adopted on February 6, 1933. Section 1 reads. "The terms of the President and Vice-President shall end at noon on the 20th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 3rd day of January...." Section 2 provides. "The Congress shall assemble, at least, once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 3rd day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day."

Power to issue ordinances. Under the legislative functions of the President may be included what is known as the ordinance power, that is, the power to issue certain orders and regulations having the force of law. The issuing of ordinances or "executive orders," as it is sometimes called, has now become such an important phase of the President's legislative powers that in 1935 Congress passed a law,⁴⁹ requiring that all executive orders, decrees or proclamations having general applicability and legal effect must be published in the Federal Register, which is issued daily.

Some of these regulations are issued by the President and other administrators under express authority conferred upon them by Acts of Congress; others are issued as a result of the necessity of prescribing means for carrying into effect the laws of Congress and the treaties; while still others are issued in pursuance of the constitutional powers of the President, and this he does as Commander-in-Chief of the armed forces. It has now become a normal practice with Congress to pass laws in general terms leaving discretionary authority with the President or the executive Departments to fill in the gaps and this is tantamount to legislating in fact. The National Recovery Act, 1933, authorised "the President to organize and regulate the industries of the United States to create new agencies, to make regulations for them, to delegate functions for subordinates, and to do other things deemed necessary to bring about economic prosperity." The Trade Agreement of 1934 empowered the President to make the trade agreements with foreign nations and lower the existing tariff rates by 50 per cent. And even more radical kind of delegation was contained in the Re-organisation Act of 1939. Franklin Roosevelt, in fact, broke all records. Within a short time after his inauguration he prevailed upon Congress to delegate large powers to him and, thus, started an era of executive orders. Senator Herink Shipstead compiled the statistics and figured that President Roosevelt had issued 3,073 executive orders prior to 1944. During the same period 4,553 laws were passed by Congress.

The Congressional delegation of discretionary authority to the chief executive has been a subject of deep controversy and described by many as a violation of the theory of Separation of Powers and an inroad on the legislative competence of Congress. The Supreme Court has established the general rule which requires that Congress should set standards and enunciate the policy under which the ordinance power is to be exercised by President or his subordinates. In the National Recovery Act case, for example, the Court found that Congress had given the President power without the required constitutional standard of policy.

48. Havard, William C., The Government and Politics of the United States, pp. 96-97.

49. The Federal Register Act.

The Veto Power. Finally, the President is given an important share in legislation through his veto power. The Constitution requires that all Bills and resolutions, except proposed constitutional amendments, must be submitted to the President before becoming law. If he approves, he appends his signatures thereto and is promulgated as law. If he disapproves, he returns it to the House in which it originated with his objections, within ten days. Congress, by a two-thirds vote in each Chamber, may then pass it over his veto. If the President fails to sign or veto the Bill within ten days, excluding Sundays, it becomes law without his signatures. If Congress adjourns within ten days after the President receives the Bill and he takes no action, the Bill is automatically killed. This is known as the pocket veto and it is absolute. Towards the end of a session numerous Bills and resolutions are passed by Congress in order to clear up its accumulated business. A considerable number of the last-minute Bills, to which the President may be opposed or for which he does not want to take responsibility, thus, fail to become law as a result of the President. Presidents have used the pocket veto rather generously.

The veto power has been used more vigorously during recent times than formerly. Eight Presidents, John Adams, Jefferson, J.Q. Adams, Van Buren, W.H. Harrison, Taylor, Fillmore and Garfield, did not veto any Bill. The first six Presidents vetoed only three Bills. But in contrast to this Franklin D. Roosevelt alone vetoed 631 Bills (9 were overridden). Truman vetoed 251 Bills (12 overridden) and Eisenhower 86. Both Franklin D. Roosevelt (1944) and Harry Truman (1948) ventured into new territory when they vetoed tax Bills, though both were overridden by Congress.

Washington and other early Presidents vetoed only those Bills which they regarded unconstitutional. Jackson was the first President to use this power to safeguard the Executive branch of government against the encroachments of the Legislature. Now Presidents veto Bills which they regard "as inexpedient, contrary to public policy, or for any other reason that is considered compelling." Eisenhower vetoed the first Farm Bill to come to him in 1956, on the ground that it was "bad legislation."

THE PRESIDENT AS A LEADER

Party Leader. The President combines in his person the two offices of King and Prime Minister, or as Theodore Roosevelt said, "A President has a great chance; his position is almost that of a King and Prime Minister rolled into one." On the one hand he is party leader, the spokesman and representative of the popular majority "more or less organised in the party that he heads." Originally, the chief executive was not a party man and Washington thought himself identified with no party.

But when political parties had become definitely established, we have it from Jefferson's time that Presidents began to be elected as party men and party leadership became as truly a function of the President as of the British Prime Minister. And today his position as a political leader of the party is as much a source of his power as the authority which the Constitution confers upon him. Chosen as a party man to head a government operated under a party system, the President surrounds himself with advisers of his own faith, consults usually with men belonging to his party in Congress for appointments, confers with his own men in the party in framing policy, and he uses his power as chief legislator to push through the party's programme to a crowning victory. Sometimes it troubles good Americans to watch their dignified chief of the State deeply submerged in party politics, which torment Washington's spirit. "Yet if he is to persuade Congress, if he is to achieve a loyal and cohesive administration, if he is to be elected in the first place (and re-elected in the second), he must put his hand firmly to the plow (plough) of politics."

The Voice of the People. At the same time, the President is the voice of the people; the leading formulator and expounder of public opinion in the United States. While he acts as political leader of some, he serves as moral spokesman for all. Woodrow Wilson, well before he could become the President, explained the essence of this role: "He (President) is the only national voice in affairs. Let him once win the administration and confidence of the country, and no other single force can withstand him, no combination of forces will easily overpower him. His position takes the imagination of the country. He is the representative of no constituency, but of the whole people. When he speaks in his true character, he speaks for no special interest. If he rightly interpret the national thought and boldly insist upon it, he is irresistible; and the country never feels the zest for action so much as when its President is of such insight and calibre." The President is the head of the State and the personal spokesman of the people, even of those who voted against him and who still oppose him. Former President Truman in a TV-radio interview with Edward R. Munrow in 1958, graphically described the President as "lobbyist for all the people."

As an administrator the President must faithfully administer the laws, no matter whether these laws were passed by Democratic or Republican majorities in Congress. As Commander-in-Chief, he represents the whole nation. He does not direct war for the benefit of any single party or any class of people. He, indeed, acts for all the people. The rank and file of the people identify the President with the federal government, and even with the American way of life. The White House is one of the few national sacred buildings. The President embodies the nation and as well leads it. The people naturally look to him for guidance in all sort of matters. It is he who labours to make the United States a better and prosperous place to live in. Even in democracy the people need a leader. "They need some one who will personalise government and authority, who will simplify politics, who will symbolise the protective role of the State, who will seem to be concerned with them." The eyes of the whole nation are, in fact, riveted towards the first citizen. There is a corps of astute journalists in Washington who shadow the President wherever he goes. They are always alert to catch even the most trivial phrase that falls from his lips at press conferences, at fireside chats, or off-hand and spread it broadcast throughout the length and breadth of the country. His message to Congress (State of the Union) stirs the country and it is the one great public document which is most widely read and discussed. The President, wrote Woodrow Wilson just before his first inauguration, "is expected by the Nation to be leader of his party as well as the Chief Executive Officer of the Government, and the country will take no excuses from him. He must play the part and play it successfully or lose the country's confidence. He must be Prime Minister, as much concerned with the guidance of legislation as with the just and orderly execution of law, and he is the spokesman of the Nation in everything, even in the most momentous and most delicate dealings of the Government with foreign nations."

Head of the State. In an essay on British Government, Ernest Barker has described the Monarch as "a symbol of unity, a magnet of loyalty, and a centre of ceremony."⁵⁰ The President as Head of the State, serves the American people in the same capacity. Apart from the Chief Executive, the Constitution-makers had expected him to perform, like the Monarch, what Bagehot called, the "dignified functions." Today, the "dignified" functions of the President surpass the expectations of the Founding Fathers. "Throwing out the ball at the first base ball game, lighting the White House Christmas tree, sponsoring Easter egg rolling on the White House lawn, receiving monarchs and delegations of almost reverential school children, the President is a dignified embodiment of the nation in a nation where official dignity is scarce and the supply normally exceeds the demand."⁵¹ The American people need such a symbol and it has been useful "as a cement of national feeling." This symbolic character of the office of the President has strengthened its practical powers.

Speaking of the President's powers in general, Justice William O. Douglas of the Supreme Court said in a recent opinion, "the great office of President is not a weak and powerless one. The President represents the people and is their spokesman in domestic and foreign affairs. The office is respected more than any other in the land. It gives a position of leadership that is unique. The power to formulate policies and mould opinion inheres in the Presidency and conditions our national life." Professor Laski simply epitomises the whole truth when he says, "The President of the United States is both more or less than a King; he is also both more or less than a Prime Minister. The more carefully his office is studied, the more does its unique character appear." His military role, his ceremonial functions, and his national responsibilities combine to make him a powerful chief of the State representing the whole nation.

Presidential power : Peril or Promise ? The problem of the powers of the President has echoed and re-echoed throughout the history of American nation. Writing about President Andrew, Jackson, Henry Clay said, "we are in the midst of a revolution, hitherto bloodless, but rapidly leading towards a change of the pure republican character of the government and to the concentration of all power in the hands of one man." The problem has become more critical in the present century. This is largely because of the two major evils of war and depression. The government has had to fight "hot wars" and wage "cold wars," prevent periodic trade and financial crises and to create conditions of security in all the avenues of the nation's life. The government has also to mitigate labour-management conflicts, check monopolistic trends, provide decent housing, education and health facilities, and secure civil rights. These government efforts have literally forced a modern President to be what Woodrow Wilson called a "big man."

50. Barker, E. Essays on Government, p. 6.

51. Brogan, D.W., An Introduction to American Politics, op. cit., p. 273.

This "big man" as a symbol of power for good and evils has evoked varying responses. There are those who share the view that the Presidential power has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished. They warmly supported the Twenty-second Amendment to the Constitution which limits the President's tenure to two terms in office. By this limitation they hoped that the vast expansion of executive power will not lead to dictatorship and the destruction of representative democracy. Corwin, on the other end, suggests that why such fears of Presidential dictatorship or domination are exaggerated. He notes the restraints on Presidential power that still exist. He reminds us that public opinion in the United States has strongly demanded vigorous Presidential leadership. Corwin, however, emphatically urges improved relationship between President and Congress as a possible solution of the still inadequate status of the Presidency today.⁵²

Laski finds many hindrances to the exercise of effective Presidential leadership. Instead of fearing power, he maintains that power, equal to the function the President has to perform, and suitably criticised and controlled, should be given to the Chief Executive.⁵³ Laski endorsed the views of the President's (1937) Committee on Administrative Management which were, in general, shared by the Hoover Commission, supporting administrative reorganisation in the interest of a strong, energetic, unified, efficient and responsible executive. Both the President's Committee and the Hoover Commission agreed that the President must be given administrative authority commensurate with his constitutional responsibility.⁵⁴

Presidency of the United States is, indeed, an office of great power. A number of factors, some historical and some institutional, have converged in modern times and have changed radically the character of the office as it was conceived by the framers of the Constitution. At the same time, the limits upon the Presidency are many and they have a way of exerting themselves even in the midst of grave crisis. No significant policy can be made effective without the approval of Congress, the law making and money appropriating body, and always jealous to assert its authority and independence. Congress also investigates through its committees the activities of the Executive Departments and their agencies. No unconstitutional action can escape the probity of the Supreme Court. "The opposing party, the free and active press, the permanent civil service, the governments of the fifty States and the giant corporations and labour unions and functions and universities, all these independent centres of power can frustrate any President who attempts to overstep the boundaries of his rightful authority."⁵⁵ If he becomes so desperate to cross the boundary, the President can be Impeached. As Clinton Rossiter says, "Every President's conscience, training and sense of history have joined to halt him short of the kind of deed that would destroy his fame and his standing with the people."⁵⁶

52. The President: Office and Powers, pp. 356-58.

53. Laski, H.J., American Presidency.

54. Report, pp. 1-3, 53.

Presidency, therefore, has a promise that it is an instrument of constitutional government. "And it is one of the two prides of the American people that no one of their Presidents has been a scoundrel or a tyrant." The other is the tradition of American democracy, personal liberty and moral behaviour. And that is the real strength of Presidency. Summing up the extent of the Presidential powers, Nelson Polsby says, "Measured against the opportunities, the responsibilities, and the resources of others in our political system and in other nations, the powers of the Presidency are enormous. It is only when we measure these same powers against the problems of our age that they seem puny and inadequate."⁵⁷

SUGGESTED READINGS

- | | |
|--------------------------------|--|
| Agar, Herbert | : The United States, The President, The Parties and the Constitution. |
| Beard, C.A. | : American Government and Politics , Chap. VII. |
| Brinkley, W.E. | : President and Congress. |
| Brogan, D.W. | : The American Political System , Part Four, Chap. I. |
| Brogan, D.W. | : An Introduction to American Politics , Chap. VIII. |
| Brownlow, L. | : The President and the Presidency. |
| Cornwell, Elmer N. | : The American Presidency ,: Vital Centre. |
| Corwin R.S. | : The Constitution and What it Means Today. |
| Corwin R.S. | : The President: Office and Powers. |
| Hayman, S. | : The American President. |
| Herring, E.P. | : Presidential Leadership: The Political Relations of Congress and the Chief Executive. |
| Irish, M.D., and Prothro, J.W. | : The Politics of American Democracy , Chap. 10. |
| Koeing, Louis W. | : The Chief Executive. |
| Laski, H.J. | : The American Presidency. |
| Marcus Cunliffe | : American Presidents and Presidency. |
| Milton, G.F. | : The Use of Presidential Power. |
| Munro, W.B. | : Government of the United States , Chaps. X, XII. |

55. Clinton Rossiter, The Presidency of the U.S.A., The Indian Express, New Delhi, November 6, 1964.

56. Ibid.

57. Nelson W. Polsby, Congress and the Presidency, p. 30.

- Ogg, F.A., and Ray, P.O. : Essentials of American Government, Chap. XX.
Polsby, Nelson W. : Congress and the Presidency.
Rossiter, Clinton : The American Presidency.
Swisher, Carl B. : American Constitutional Development.
Warren, Sidney : The President as World Leader.
Wilson, W. : The President of the United States (1916).
Zink, Harold : Government and Politics in the United States,
Chaps. XIV, XV.

CHAPTER IV

THE CABINET AND THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

Origin and nature of Cabinet. The Executive Departments of the Government of United States of America are: State; Treasury; Defence; Interior; Agriculture; Justice; Post Office; Commerce; Labour and Health; Education and Welfare. Each Executive Department is headed by a Secretary appointed by the President with the consent of the Senate. The ten Secretaries are recognised as the top political figures in the national administration and they are in the line of succession to the Presidency. They sit in the President's 'Cabinet'. The Constitution has nothing to say about a Presidential Cabinet.¹ It simply mentions that the President "may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the executive departments, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices."² But the framers of the Constitution had in their minds the importance of counsel in determining policies, though they "apparently deemed it unnecessary to insert any formal provision, taking it for granted that the President would have sufficient sense to avail himself of advice upon important occasions."³ They did, of course, give to the Senate a measure of such authority in connection with appointments and treaty making.

Washington, had, in the beginning, expected that the Senate would serve the same purpose that the Upper Chambers in the Colonial Legislatures had fulfilled, that is, it would be an advisory council with as much executive as legislative responsibility. The Constitution more or less implied this function of the Senate when it provided that the President shall have the power "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate" to make treaties and appointments. Washington sought the advice of the Senate in connection with Indian affairs but he was "snubbed." Relying on the precedent of English and Colonial courts, the President sought the assistance of the Supreme Court to render opinions of an advisory nature, but here again he was "rebuffed." Washington, therefore, began talking over certain questions with the principal officers of government and by 1791, he called regular conferences of key officials for consultation not only on matters pertaining to their particular Departments but in regard to questions of general executive policy. Since 1793, the name "Cabinet" came to be applied to these joint meetings of the Chief Executive with his heads of the Departments. Unknown to the Constitution, Cabinet is extra-legal and is a child of custom and tradition. But it is simply an advisory body, though its growth is an example of the manner in which usage has shaped the Constitution to meet the pressure of necessity.

1. Others may be invited to Cabinet meetings at the discretion of the President.

2. Article II, Section 2, Clause 1.

3. Zink, H., A Survey of American Government, op. cit., p. 254.

Early in his administration, Andrew Jackson dispensed with Cabinet meetings altogether and acted on the advice of several of his intimate friends. This "Kitchen Cabinet," as it popularly came to be known, served the purpose of the President's advisers. His successors, however, followed the custom of calling the heads of the principal departments into an informal conference for the discussion of complicated problems, and thus, began a series of Presidents who depended rather heavily on their Cabinets. With the coming in of Woodrow Wilson the reverse phase began. He preferred his own sources of advice or depended upon the council of a very few personal agents such as Colonel Edward M. House. Wilson's successor, President Harding, however, was excessively reliant on his Cabinet, invited the Vice-President to attend its meetings and included in its membership "men who knew a great deal more about public affairs than did he himself." President Roosevelt did not lean heavily on his Cabinet, although he did not dispense with its regular meetings. In the beginning, particularly in fashioning his New Deal, he looked for advice to a little group of younger people known as the "brain trust." For a time, he tried a "super cabinet," the National Emergency Council, which included in its membership more than thirty persons drawn from the Cabinet and independent establishments. But eventually he returned to the old system, although Roosevelt and Truman leaned heavily on personal friends such as Harry Hopkins and George Allen. President Eisenhower did his best to restore the Cabinet to full duty. He invited such key officials as the Director of the Budget and the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission to attend regularly. He even established a formal Cabinet Secretariat to organise its work and to keep the necessary records. Eisenhower, accordingly, used an expanded and augmented cabinet quite extensively as a sounding-board and policy-making group. President Kennedy, on the other hand, preferred to deal directly with those Cabinet members involved in a particular problem, and he avoided large-scale formal meetings.

Features of the Cabinet. Though unknown to law,⁴ yet it has become an integral part of the institutional framework of the United States. But it is not a Cabinet in the sense in which we understand it under a system of Parliamentary government. The members of the American Cabinet are not members of Congress and neither they take part in its debates nor do they go there to initiate and pilot legislation or to defend the policy of government or stand in need of seeking its confidence. They are essentially the advisers of the President. The President can, and often he does, override the opinions of his 'ministers' or he may not seek it or even if he does seek, it is for him to decide whether to consult them individually or collectively. The use of the Cabinet depends on the President's desire.

4. The term Cabinet is referred to by name in Chief Justice Marshall's decision Marbury v. Madison (1803).

The Cabinet meets ordinarily once a week and it is for the President to decide what matters come before it.⁵ Proceedings are decidedly informal and there are no rules of debate.⁶ Only rarely is there a vote and no minutes or official records were kept of its proceedings. President Eisenhower established a Cabinet Secretariat to organise its work, keep its records and follow through on decisions. In addition to setting up a sub-cabinet to support the Cabinet itself, he continued the practice of authorising Cabinet level committees to deal with special problems. But Cabinet members have no corporate rights which are uniformly recognised by custom. This is well illustrated by two anecdotes, one relating to America and the other to Britain. "Seven nays, one aye, the ayes have it," announced Lincoln following a Cabinet consultation in which he found every member against him. The only vote that counts is the President's own. This is so often contrasted with Lord Melbourne putting a question on Corn Laws to the vote in his Cabinet and saying, "it does not matter what we will say, as long as we all say the same thing." Unanimity of decisions is the basic principle of Cabinet government and essence of collective responsibility. The Cabinet members in America may make speeches in support of the general policy of the administration. They may even initiate a line of policy which, having been approved by the President, may be described as their own special contribution, as the agricultural policy of Wallace and the reciprocal low tariff agreements of Hull, in Roosevelt's administration. "But, in general, the American Cabinet minister lives and moves and has his being in the context of Presidential thought. However, able and distinguished, he is bound to be eclipsed by the major significance of his chief."⁷

The selection of members. The Cabinet in the United States is, in fact, the "President's family." President Monroe thought himself as merely a primus inter pares. But, as Brogan puts it, "even Monroe was primus and he had chosen his peers." A British Prime Minister may have a choice in selecting his colleagues upon whom he can rely, yet the party expects certain men to be in the Cabinet and the country, too, expects them to be there. In America the President, unlike the Prime

5. President Taft observed, "As it is, the custom is for the President to submit to its members questions upon which he thinks he needs their advice, and for the members to bring such matters in their respective departments as they deem appropriate for Cabinet conference and general discussion."

6. It is reported that Franklin Roosevelt sometimes related a story or an amusing incident. Lincoln, too, was fond of stories.

7. Laski, H.J., The American Presidency, pp. 79-80. President Roosevelt did not refer to his Cabinet the proposal to reforming the Supreme Court as contained in his message to Congress in 1937. This is narrated by the late Harold Ickes and it illustrates how the President may commit the administration to a bold or even a rash course of action without consulting his Cabinet. Harold Ickes said, "I have always deprecated the fact that President Roosevelt did not consult his Cabinet in advance and that nobody knew about the particular plan, except the President himself and the Attorney General. The Cabinet was called together hastily at eleven o'clock one morning. The message was already on the way to the Hill (i.e., Congress). Even if our advice had been sought, it would have been ineffective. We were confronted with a choice of supporting the President—or of resigning from the Cabinet and opposing it." As quoted by D.W. Brogan in An Introduction to American Politics, pp. 176-277 f.n.

Minister in Britain, does not make a team. The considerations which influence his choice are different from those of a Prime Minister belonging to a country with a Parliamentary system of government. Some of his colleagues may hardly be known to him when he chooses them. President Wilson had never met Lindley Garrison, his Secretary of the Interior. He may, again, appoint persons not belonging to his own party, though since 1795 the principle of party solidarity has been adhered to rather closely. Cleveland appointed Walter G. Gresham as Secretary of State and he had been thought of as a Republican candidate for the Presidency. Theodore Roosevelt and Taft each appointed a Democrat Secretary of War and Hoover made a Democrat Attorney-General. Roosevelt appointed Henry L. Stimson as Secretary of War, and Frank Knox as Secretary of Navy in 1940, although both were prominent Republicans and the latter had only four years previously been his party's candidate for Vice-President. Eisenhower thought it good politics to recognize the "Democrats for Eisenhower" by naming Texas Democrat, Mrs. Oveta Culp Hobby, as his first Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare. President Kennedy's Cabinet included two Republicans, the Secretary of Treasury, Douglas Dillon, and Secretary of Defence, Robert McNamara. Lyndon Johnson continued with the members of Kennedy's Cabinet, after his assassination.

If the President makes his Cabinet, he can also unmake it at his will. It is true that the choice of the President is not so unrestricted as it is generally imagined. He is limited by party necessities geographical considerations and it is politic also to recognise the major religious groups. President Kennedy appointed his brother Robert Kennedy as Attorney-General and it was obviously a personal matter. Wilson was compelled to make Bryan as Secretary of State and for the same reasons that compelled Gladstone to take in Chamberlain in 1880 and Lord Palmerstone to offer a place in his Cabinet to Cobden. But once Wilson had become settled, he was able to drop Bryan with no trouble at all. It happens only in the United States, because there cannot be a Cabinet crisis in the British sense. Leaving aside Lincolns and Wilsons even weaker Presidents can get rid of any member of the Cabinet as President Arthur got rid of Blaine, the most popular Republican and the greatest force in the party. The conclusion is obvious. In the United States the Cabinet is only what the President wants it to be. "It is his tool" and as for its members, "a breath unmakes them as a breath has made." Its composition is unpredictable. Many of its members, after their term of office, retire into the obscurity from which their elevation had brought them." "Cabinet office," in the words of Professor Laski, "is an interlude in a career; it is not itself a career. There is no technique of direct preparation for it; there is no certainty that it will continue because it has begun; there is no assurance that the successful performance of his functions will lead to a renewal of office in a subsequent administration."¹⁰ A President can get rid of all his Cabinet as Jackson did; he can get rid of his predecessor's Cabinet as Taft and Truman did.

8. Washington made Jefferson Secretary of State and Hamilton Secretary of the Treasury. But friction soon arose and it proved desirable "to bring the chief offices into the hands of men who saw eye to eye in political matters."

9. Laski, H.J., American Presidency, p. 80.

Utility of the Cabinet. Nevertheless the Cabinet has a character and importance of its own. Membership in it continues to be the ambition of many politicians.¹¹ And although there is considerable variation in its prestige and influence from administration to administration, yet it must meet once a week and transact two types of business. In the first place, the broad policies of the government are examined and discussed. The President may frequently consult the Cabinet on matters of top policy. He may accept their opinion or not, but the discussions bring out useful information and opinion, clarify views and promote morale in administration. Cabinet discussions help to sustain the President and render him more responsible to the people.

The second type of work it does is rather more routine. The President co-ordinates the activities of different Departments and resolves inter-departmental conflicts which are bound to arise in a complicated and gigantic administration, as one found in the United States. What the President does is that he frequently meets the individual departmental heads and agency chiefs, listens to their complaints and limitations and, then, asks the Cabinet to attempt co-ordination. Cabinet meetings and discussions help to iron out departmental differences and misunderstandings. The Cabinet meeting may also serve to produce a sense of administrative responsibility and coherence in an administrative structure that is fragmented, specialised, and diffused.

While evaluating the role of the American Cabinet, let it be repeated that it is a body of advisers to the President and not a council of his colleagues with whom he has to work and upon whose approval he depends. Cabinet discussion, as Professor Laski says, "is the collection of opinions by the President with a view to clarifying his own mind, rather than a search for a collective decision." The Cabinet members cannot publicly oppose the direction of the President. Roosevelt made it significantly clear. He said, "when a Cabinet member speaks publicly, he usually speaks on the authorization of the President, in which case he speaks for the President. If he takes it upon himself to announce a policy that is contrary to the policy the President wants carried out, he can cause a great deal of trouble."¹²

A few significant suggestions have been made for making the Cabinet a more potent factor in administration. One suggestion is that the Cabinet could be transformed into a vigorous institution simply by making the proper appointments. "A good Cabinet," commented Professor Laski, "ought to be a place where the large outlines of policy can be hammered out in common, where the essential strategy is decided upon, where the

10. Ibid., p. 95.

11. Prof. Brogan cites a case in which he was an eye witness. He writes, "I was present towards the end of 1948, at a discussion of the new Cabinet, Mr. Truman was expected to announce. It was suggested that Mr. Dean Acheson would be made Secretary of State and it was objected that he had resigned as Under-Secretary of State on the ground that he couldn't afford the job. A friend of Mr. Acheson's remarked, 'He couldn't afford to be Under-Secretary, but any body can afford to be Secretary of State.'"

12. Truman, Harry S., Memoirs, Vol. I, p. 329.

President knows that he will hear, both in affirmation and in doubt, even in negation, most of what can be said about the direction he proposes to follow." A Cabinet functioning in this spirit could, indeed, stimulate administrative leadership, but thus far the Cabinet has fallen short of such an ideal. It has also been suggested to establish closer relations between the members of the Cabinet and Congress by giving them seats in the Senate and the House of Representatives and the right to participate in debate without the right to vote. The Secretaries (Cabinet members) are now limited to appearing before the Congressional Committees. The proposed arrangement could conceivably be a mutual advantage. It has been contended that there is no constitutional obstacle if this arrangement is brought about. But there seems slight prospect in fact of the adoption of this plan. Congress itself is hesitant.

ADMINISTRATIVE ORGANISATION

Constitutional and Statutory provisions. The Constitution is silent regarding the administrative structure. The framers of the Constitution were not concerned with the organisation of the executive branch other than the office of the President. But having provided for the three Departments: Foreign Relations, the Military Forces, and Fiscal Affairs, it was evidently assumed that Congress would provide for additional Departments as the needs arose. This conclusion is supported by the constitutional provision that the President can require an opinion in writing from the principal officers in each of the Executive Departments. The Constitution further provides that Congress can vest by law the appointment of inferior officers in the President alone, in the Court, or in the heads of the Departments. It is on this basis that Congress creates Departments, commissions and other federal authorities.

Today, the executive branch of government is made up of the following types of administrative organisations: (1) Executive Departments, ten in number, each headed, except the Departments of Post Office and Justice which are headed by the Post Master-General and Attorney-General respectively, by an officer with the title of Secretary; (2) executive agencies outside the ten regular Departments headed by single administrators; (3) boards and commissions, which may be further divided into regulatory, non-regulatory and advisory; and finally (4) the government corporations. Agencies outside the ten Departments are usually termed "independent," in the sense that they are not responsible to the head of any Department. Some of these enjoy a large degree of independence of the President, while others do not, but all are subject to legislative control by Congress.

The bureaux or the agencies directly associated with the President in an overall planning and control play a vital role in the administrative set-up of the country. There are between 200 and 400 bureaux in the Federal Government of which about 65 report directly to the President. Important out of these are the President's personal staff of Secretariat, personal advisers, and administrative assistants; and Bureau of the Budget; the Council of Economic Advisers; Science Adviser; the National Security Council; Civil and Defence Mobilization; and the Central Intelligence Agency.

The Independent Commissions are another type of agency and these arose along with the growth of government regulation. Typically they are given regulatory powers over some sector of economy—rail and truck transport, trade practices, power, communications, aviation, tariffs. The Commission membership ranges from three to eleven. Commissions are appointed by the President with the approval of the Senate for a stated number of years. The power of the President to remove a commissioner during his tenure is usually limited.

Then, there are the 'government corporations.' Corporations, in America, as in other countries, enjoy a degree of freedom and flexibility in the performance of their functions which is not open to the more orthodox type of agency. Usually, but not always, the corporation is created to undertake some specific project or to conduct some business undertaking. The Tennessee Valley Authority is the best known of the examples of the Corporation.

Organisation of the Departments. At the head of each department, except the Justice and the Post Office, are the Secretaries. The Secretaries are essentially political appointees who express the policy of the party in power in the White House. They are also members of the President's Cabinet and are responsible to him for all intents and purposes. If any Secretary is selected by the President from the opposition party, he selects only those who are friendly to his cause. In most of the Departments the second ranking official is the Under-Secretary who is the Deputy of the departmental head and like his superior is a political appointee. There are no permanent Under-Secretaries comparable to those serving in the British Ministries. Each Department has Assistant Secretaries, in some one, in others to the maximum of four, who again are usually political appointees. Many of them may be career men.

Customarily, the Departments are divided and sub-divided into subordinate units, such as "bureaus," "divisions," "offices" and "services." The basis of division may differ from one Department to the other, but the most common basis is functions and actually speaking there is often much less difference among them than the titles would imply. A bureau in one Department is very similar in form and functions to a division in another Department. An office, however, may differ only in minor details from a service.

Powers and Duties of the Secretaries. While commenting upon the powers and duties of a head of the Department, John Sherman, a former head of the Treasury Department, declared, "the President is entrusted by the Constitution and laws with important powers, and so by law are the heads of Departments. The President has no more right to control or exercise the powers conferred by law upon them than they have to control him in the discharge of his duties....If he violates or neglects his duty, he is subject to the removal by the President or impeachment....but the President cannot exercise or control the discretion reposed by law in....any head or subordinate of a department of the government."¹³ But this is not the real position. The President, as said earlier, is the Director of Administration. He is invested with the power of removal and by virtue of vast discretionary powers conferred upon him by laws has a wide choice of ways and means to get his will dominate. Whatever be the theory, the practice is otherwise. Being a political appointee, the Secretary is expected to inject the policies of his party and the President in the conduct of the affairs of the Department he heads. When he does not belong to the Presidential Party, he must be friendly to the President's policy.

13. As quoted by Charles Beard in American Government and Politics, op. cit., p. 233.

The head of a Department is a legislator too, for he enjoys to a certain extent freedom in issuing orders pertaining to matters over which he presides. By a general Act of Congress, he may prescribe regulations, not inconsistent with law, for the government of his department, the conduct of its officers and clerks, the distribution and performance of its business, and the custody, use and preservation of the records, papers, and property pertaining to it. This broad provision is very often supplemented by legislation giving him power to issue ordinances over particular matters.

The Secretary of a Department, also, brings circuitous influence on actual legislation. He must submit to Congress annually certain specified reports bearing on the activities of his Department. He must also appear before various Committees of Congress in order to explain, give information and answer to inquiries on legislation pending before Congress. Secretaries write letters to Senators and Representatives, having political affinities with them, urging or opposing measures for discussion. "Indeed they sometimes submit to Congress, on their own motion, elaborate draft of Bills which they wish to have enacted into law."¹⁴

Finally, several heads of Departments exercise powers which are judicial in character. With the multiplication in the functions of government and growth of subordinate legislation and power of making Rules and Regulations, it has been thought expedient to give to the heads of certain departments the authority to hear cases carried up from the lower administrative divisions under their control.

FEDERAL PERSONNEL AND THE MERIT SYSTEM

Two Types of Appointments. Those entrusted with administrative duties may be divided into two categories: political appointees, and those who belong to the executive civil service. The Secretaries, Under-Secretaries and Assistant Secretaries, bureau chiefs, division heads, members of the boards and commissions form only a minor fraction of all over $2\frac{1}{2}$ million men and women who carry on the civilian activities of the national government. Such a staggering number of Federal government employees present a difficult problem, for the greatness of any government and the quality of its administration depend in large measure on the ability, loyalty and devotion of the men and women who constitute its staff and carry on its activities. Selection and retention of capable employees, therefore, is a prime requirement of public administration.

The Spoils System. For a generation or more the selection and appointment of administrative officers and other employees were based on competency, "fitness for office," a tradition set by President Washington. With the emergence of political parties more weight began to be given to political considerations when filling posts as they fell vacant or when new ones were created. John Adams, who succeeded Washington, was a party man, but he maintained to a considerable extent the principles established by Washington. The advent of Jefferson marked the first change in American public personnel practice. Though he agreed in principle with Washington's concept of "fitness for office" and there were only limited removals during the first two years of his first administration, he found the Departments of government and other administrative agencies peopled with those who were his political and personal enemies. Being a shrewd politician he was also aware of the political significance of the power of appointment. He was, accordingly, moved to remark: "How are vacancies obtained? Those by death are few, by resignation none." He found it necessary to remove some officials who had been appointed by his Federalist predecessors. Here is the start of the system known as "spoils," the requirement of party loyalty rather than "fitness for office" became the prime criterion for public employment.

14. Beard, C.A., American Government and Politics, op. cit., p. 234.

The real fillip to the spoils system was given by a Congressional Act of 1810. It provided that terms of district Attorneys, Collectors, surveyors of Customs, Navy Agents, Paymasters, and certain other office-holders should henceforth be limited to four years. It paved the way for rotation in office with the change in administration. For twenty-eight years Jefferson's party remained in power, but Madison, Monroe, and John Quincy Adams did not follow the path of their great leader and made only a few removals. When Andrew Jackson occupied the White House, the concept of a public office as "spoils" had attained complete dominance in the governments of the States and vigorous pressure was being exerted for the extension of the principle to the operations of the federal government. Jackson welcomed the change as he believed that political parties need something besides intellectual cement to hold them together.

Andrew Jackson explained and defended his appointment program which may be reduced to four propositions. First, since the administration of government is a simple process any person of normal intelligence and industry is capable of performing administrative duties; second, democratic principles support the idea of rotation in office; third, office-holders who remain over a great number of years are corrupted by a sense of power dangerous to the existence of democracy—more is lost by the long continuance of men than is generally to be gained by their experience; and fourth, democracy is "prompted by party appointments by newly elected officials." The new President did not make a clean sweep of "anti-Jacksonian office-holders," nevertheless he removed in the first year of office nearabout 700 employees in the executive Departments and filled all the new vacancies with his own party men.

The spoils system, therefore, is the practice, resorted to by political parties as well as factions, of filling appointive offices with their supporters when they come into power. "To the victor belong the spoils of the enemy," said Senator William L. Mercy in a debate in the Senate in 1832, and since then the phrase gained wide currency. While Andrew Jackson did not inaugurate the spoils system, he religiously initiated it and all appointments for party reasons became part of the accepted order of things in the National, State and Municipal Administrations. It flourished unchecked between 1829 to the close of Civil War.

To job spoils were added other types of spoils—contracts, grafts, and the like. In the following years of Civil War public opinion began to question some of the extreme practices associated with the spoils and the assassination of President Garfield at the hand of a disappointed office-seeker served to arouse public opinion, as perhaps never before, on the evils inherent in the spoils system. While the spoils system has not been wholly eliminated even today,¹⁵ important reforms were proposed and adopted in the two decades after the Civil War.

The Movement for Civil Service Reform. The price of the spoils system had been too high indeed. The spoils system and political patronage had always produced incompetent and inexperienced public servants, and sometimes grafting and corrupt ones. By the sixties the standard of the Federal Service was at such a low ebb that civil service reform had become the aim of a popular political crusade. The goal of the civil service reformers was to establish a merit system under which appointments to the public service would be based on ability, experience, knowledge and training rather than on party loyalty. In 1868, Democratic Party urged in its platform that corrupt men be expelled from office and the useless offices be abolished. In 1872, both major political parties advocated civil service reform. The death of President Garfield in 1881 by a disappointed office-seeker aroused the nation's demand for a change in the system by which Federal offices were filled. In 1883, Congress passed the Federal Service Act, better known as the Pendleton Act.

The Pendleton Act set the basic pattern of national civil service and it is still the fundamental law governing recruitment. It created a Civil Service Commission consisting of three members, no more than two of the same party, appointed by the President and the Senate. The Act divided the administrative employees of the national government into two categories: (1) those in the unclassified; and (2) those in the classified service. Power to determine under which service most administrative agencies of government were to operate were granted to the President. Admission to the classified service was made dependent upon merit as manifested through the process of competitive examination conducted by the Civil Service Commission. Although appointments were still to be made by the President or the heads of the Departments, but the choice was limited to those who ranked at the top on the eligible list prepared by the Civil Service Commission on the results of the examination conducted by it. Also, all classified employees were required to abstain from active participation in politics, and they were to be protected in their jobs against political activity.

15. Some positions are actually under a merit plan, but still "they do not seem to receive adequately qualified incumbents." Others are exempted by Law from the competitive system.

At the outset, the reform did not extend far and the number of positions affected did not exceed 14,000. After the turn of the century, the number was greatly increased and in 1937 over 60 per cent of the total positions were subject to the Civil Service Commission. By the Ramspeck Act, which came into force on January 1, 1942, many New Deal positions that had been outside the merit system were brought within its scope—a number estimated at well over 100,000.¹⁶ At that time the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission declared that more than eighty per cent of the regular employees of the national government belonged to the competitive class.

The Civil Service Reform League bluntly declared in 1937, that Congress was always the chief obstacle to progress. It had repeatedly failed, when enacting legislation calling for additional appointments, to name them as classified services. Such instances were glaring when party long out of power suddenly found, itself in control of Congress, e.g., when the Democrats took over in 1886, 1913, and 1933, and the Republicans in 1897 and 1921.¹⁷ Roosevelt's accession to Presidency in 1933, followed by his policy of New Deal, gave a rude shock to the merit system. The Democrats were back to power after 12 years, and the rank and file were hungry for offices. Creation of new agencies connected with the recovery plan multiplied the number of new jobs and in great majority of cases Congress exempted from competitive system the new entrants, thus, leaving the way open for spoils. The President by his first executive order on record withdrew from the classified service positions in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, which his predecessors had placed therein. "As a result of wholesale exemptions by statute, and of spoil raids in a good many of the older establishments as well, the service as a whole so far slipped back" and the proportion on a merit basis sank to hardly 60 per cent in the middle of 1936.

There was renewed agitation for reforms. In 1937, the President's Committee on Administrative Management recommended an extension of the merit system not only "upward and outward," but also "downward" so as to embrace skilled workers and labourers. President Roosevelt, too, urged on Congress that all except policy-making positions be placed on a merit basis. In 1938, the President ordered into classified service all New Deal non-policy determining positions. The Ramspeck Act did the rest. It authorised the President to include in the service, at Presidential discretion, all positions except those subject to Presidential appointments and subject to the confirmation of the Senate, and a few other limited groups of technical nature. In 1951, the proportion of the service operated under the merit plan was approximately 92 per cent. When President Eisenhower assumed office in 1953, he found only 17,382 jobs open for his patronage. The remaining, approximately 2,500,000 persons employed by the federal government at that date, were protected by the merit system. Of the 17,382 jobs not protected by civil service, practically all were either at very high or very low levels. Thus, the reform so modestly begun, today embraces a very large part of the federal civil personnel.

16. Ogg, F.A. and Ray, P.O., Essentials of American Government, op. cit., p. 325.

17. Ogg, F.A., and Ray, P.O., Essentials of American Government, op. cit., p. 325.

SUGGESTED READINGS

- Beard, C.A. : American Government and Politics, Chap. X.
 Brogan, D.W. : The American Political System, Chap. II.
 Corwin, E.S. : The President's Office and Powers, Chaps. III, IV.
 Fenno, Richard F. : The President's Cabinet.
 Ferguson, J.H., and McHenry, D.E. : The American System of Government, Chaps. XXI, XXII.
 Greaves, W.B. : Public Administration in Democratic Society, Chaps. VIII—XIV.
 Hermans, Somers : Presidential Agency.
 Hyneman, S. : The American President, Chap. XIII.
 Hyneman, Charles : Bureaucracy in a Democracy.
 Laski, H.J. : The American Presidency, Chaps. I, IV.
 Marx, F.M. (Ed.) : "Federal Executive Reorganisation—A Symposium, Amer. Pol. Sc. Review, XL,, pp. 1124-1168 (Dec. 1946), XLI, pp. 48-84 (Feb. 1947).
 Ogg, F.A., and Ray, P.O. : Essentials of American Government, XIX, XXI, XXII.
 Ripor, Paul P. : History of the United States Civil Service.
 Swarthout, John M., and Bartley, Earnest R. : Principles and Problems of American National Government, Chaps. VI, XVII.
 White, L.D. : Introduction to the Study of Public Administration, Chaps. XXII-XXXI.

CHAPTER V

CONGRESS : STRUCTURE AND COMPOSITION

Role of Congress. The first Article of the Constitution provides for the legislative branch of government, "the Congress of the United States" and vests all legislative powers in it. The Acts of Congress are the supreme laws of the land. But the framers of the Constitution had no intention of making it all-powerful. The demands of the doctrines of limited government and federalism are such as to deny unlimited powers to any governmental agency. Yet, the importance of Congress in the final analysis cannot be discounted. In fact, Congress today exercises an almost incomprehensibly great authority to set the course of public policy. For, Congress has not only the powers given by the actual words of the Constitution, but also powers that may be reasonably implied from those delegated powers. So vast is the extent of the implied powers as also resultant powers that it embraces more or less the entire life of the nation. Unless Congress grants money, the Executive and Judicial departments of government cannot operate, new policies cannot be enforced and the entire machinery of the government comes to a dead stop. It was, accordingly, not out of reason that the framers would have devoted the first Article in the Constitution to the organisation and powers of Congress.

Congress is Bicameral. Regarding the desirability of creating a national legislature consisting of two Chambers there was little difference of opinion among the members of the Philadelphia Convention. The Congress which operated under the Articles of Confederation was a single Chamber assembly, but the framers of the Constitution did not consider it worthy of emulation. They were familiar with the successful functioning of bicameral State legislatures. They also knew that in Britain, too, bicameral Parliament existed. The reasons, however, which prompted bicameralism were the result of a "great compromise" without which perhaps the Union would not have come into being. Under the Articles of Confederation, all States stood on a footing of equality. They would not agree to the new administrative set-up unless their old status was preserved in one branch of the legislature and where they could be represented as constituent political units. On the other hand, the larger States, which had sponsored the movement to federate, would not agree to a plan unless they were given adequate representation in proportion to their superior numerical strength. There were economic reasons too. The North, the more populous part of the country, was commercial in interest whereas the South, the sparsely populated part, was agricultural. The division of the legislature into two Houses based on two different principles of representation was in part influenced by these considerations in order to balance and harmonise the two distinct economic interests in the national government. At the same time, the Fathers of the Constitution entertained a fear of the majority rule and they desired to set up the Senate as a conservative check on the "turbulence of democracy." And if it was to be an effective check on the radicalism of the popular House, then, it ought not to be a mere duplication of the latter both in its composition and powers. Accordingly, Congress was based on States as political entities and on population, the Senate representing the former and the House of Representatives the latter. The Senate was to be smaller in size, its members chosen for a longer term of office and by a different method, higher age and residence qualifications were required. It was given certain specific powers, such as share in the appointing, treaty making and judicial powers, which were not conferred on the House of Representatives.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Composition and Organisation. The Constitution does not specify the size of the House beyond stipulating that "representatives shall be apportioned among the several states according to their respective numbers," and that there shall not be more than one member for every thirty thousand people and that every State is entitled to, at least, one representative irrespective of its population.¹ The actual enumeration was to be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress and within every subsequent period of ten years in such manner as determined by law.² Elections are to be held every second year by the people of the several States.³ "The times, places, and manner of holding elections shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations."⁴

Apportionment of seats has caused periodic controversies. The original 65 members of the House were allocated in the Constitution. Thereafter allocations were made by Congress after each census, ranging from the basis of one representative for each 30,000 in 1792 to one for 3,45,000 in 1951. After 1920 census Congress failed to carry out the constitutional mandate to reapportion seats after every ten years. The Reapportionment Act of 1929 set the "permanent" number of the House at 435. The admission of Alaska in 1958 and of Hawaii in 1959 brought the total membership to 437.

The formal qualifications which a member of the House of Representatives should possess are: that he must not be less than twenty-five years old, should be a citizen of the United States of, at least, seven years standing, and an inhabitant of the State from which he is elected. Custom has laid an important qualification regarding residence. The Constitution requires only legal residence in the State. It has also since been modified to mean residence of the Congressional district. Custom has been so insistent on the locality rule that no choice of the candidate is likely to be made unless he is resident of the locality from which he

1. Article I, Section 2, Clause 3.

2. Ibid.

3. Article I, Section 2, Clause 1.

4. Article I, Section 4.

seeks election. In fact, no candidate offers himself for election from a district in which he does not reside. Franklin D. Roosevelt Jr., after deciding to run for the New York Congressional seat vacated by the death of Sol Bloom, rented an apartment in the district and announced that address as his legal residence. Helen Gahagan Douglas rented a hotel room in the industrial-commercial district in Los Angeles which she represented, though she continued to live in fashionable Beverly Hills. In case of death or resignation of a member during his term, the Governor of his State may call a special election for the unexpired portion of the term.

Disqualifications. The Constitution provides certain disqualifications. It provides that no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House of Congress during his continuance in office.⁵ This provision was adopted for purposes of keeping separate, as far as practicable, the Executive and Legislative departments. Secondly, no Senator or Representative may, during the time for which he or she is elected, be appointed to any civil office which shall have been created or the emoluments of which shall have been increased during such time.⁶ The purpose of this provision is to prevent Congress from creating new offices or increasing the salaries of existing offices for the benefit of members who might desire to be appointed to them.

Salary, privileges and immunities. The Constitution provides that Congressmen will be paid salary and other prerequisites of office as determined by law. The law fixes the salary of both the Senators and the Representatives at $22,500 per year, subject to the national income-tax. In addition to it, travelling allowance of 20 cents per mile for one trip each session from the member's home to Washington is paid. Every member has a "franking privilege" too—of free postage on official correspondence and all other official mail matter, such as pamphlets and reprints of speeches sent free to the constituents. Stationery and office supplies, telephone and telegraph service are provided. Free medical service is made available to all members. Allowances for clerks and secretarial service are also made; $12,500 per year for a Representative and $25,000 to $60,000 per year for a Senator, depending upon the population of his home State. Retirement annuities have been provided since 1946.

Congressmen are exempt from legal process in all civil actions while attending the sessions of the Congress and when going to or returning thereto. This immunity, however, does not cover indictable criminal offences. For they are legally immune, from prosecution or suit, as for libel and slander, for anything they may say on the floor of the House.

Sessions. Before the adoption of the Twentieth Amendment in 1933, the term of the Representatives began on March 4, following their election, although they did not assemble till next December unless called in a special session.⁷ The old Congress, therefore, remained in office and continued functioning for about four months after a new Congress had been elected. The members defeated at elections would continue to make laws for their constituents who had not approved their re-election. These defeated members were popularly known as "lame-ducks" and the session of the House so convened as "lame-duck" session. The Twentieth Amendment sought to remove the evils inherent therein by providing that Congress must assemble at noon on January 3, unless another date is provided by law. Under the Legislative Reorganization Act, 1946, the regular session adjourns on July 31 unless otherwise provided by Congress.

5. Article I, Section 6, Clause 2.

6. Ibid.

7. Article I, Section 4, Clause 2.

Special Sessions. The President may call either House or both in a special session. The Senate in particular is called to confirm appointments or ratify a treaty. As a rule, the President only summons the legislature in special session to deal with a matter of national urgency and usually announces his purpose well in advance so as to focus the attention of Congress and the country sharply to the business in hand.

The Constitution permits both the Houses to adjourn simultaneously. But what is to be done, if crisis happens during the adjournment and the members desire to assemble in a session? The need for a decision on this issue happened in 1939 after the outbreak of the Second World War. The opponents of Roosevelt feared that, by taking drastic actions during an adjournment he might involve the country in the war and consequently Congress remained almost in continuous session in 1939, 1940 and 1941. In 1941, it was in session for 365 days; in 1942, for 346 days, with a brief recess in December. In 1943, between January and July, it was in session for 184 days, and the need for a vacation was generally recognised. But many members were unwilling to adjourn even for a brief recess without making some specific provision for meeting earlier than the stipulated date in a resolution of adjournment. The resolution, accordingly, provided for adjournment on July 8 and reassembling on September 14, 1943, or until three days after they were notified to reassemble whichever event occurred first. The President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House were authorised to call the Houses "whenever in their opinion legislative expediency might warrant it." The resolution further provided that Congress was to be recalled "whenever the majority leader of the Senate and the majority leader of the House, acting jointly, or the minority leader of the Senate and the minority leader of the House, acting jointly, file a written request with the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House that Congress reassemble for the consideration of legislation." According to this precedent, Congress can now reassemble on the call of the majority or minority leaders and it has been freed from the pleasure of the President to call a special session.

Power to compel attendance of Members. The Rules of the House of Representatives provide for securing the attendance of members if the required quorum for the transaction of official business is not present. Fifteen members of the House may compel the attendance of absentees by instructing the Serjeant At Arms to arrest them and bring them in the House.

The Speaker. With regard to the internal organisation of the House of Representatives, the Constitution simply says that the members "shall choose their Speaker and other officers."⁸ It does not say anything about his powers and functions. Nor does the Constitution require that the Speaker must be a member of the House, although every Speaker has been at the time of his selection a member of the House.

The election of the Speaker takes place at the beginning of each new Congress and the nominee of the majority party is invariably elected by the House. Here it differs from the office of the Speaker of the British House of Commons. Unlike Britain, the election of the Speaker of the House of Representatives is not unanimous. Nor the Speaker of the preceding House need always be elected, although the tradition is now well established that Speakers are re-elected in subsequent Congress if their party maintains a majority; Sam Rayburn remained in office for 16 years. With the coming in of the other party in majority, the Speaker must change. Seniority is, no doubt, an important consideration in choosing a Speaker, but personal popularity and political backing are the most important pre-requisites. The salary and expense allowance of the Speaker now is $45,000 per year, subject to the national income tax, and the use of a government automobile.

Unlike the impartial and judicious Speaker of the British House of Commons, the Speaker of the House of Representatives acts as a leader of his Party and uses the powers of his office to promote his Party's programme. There are two important reasons for such a development. The Constitution did not provide the House with an official leadership. Apparently the statesmen of 1787 took it for granted that the House would lead itself. As the House grew in numbers and its legislative business expanded, the need for guidance and leadership developed and this devolved upon the Speaker as a leader of the majority Party. "Beginning with Henry, the Speaker gradually became the recognised leader of the majority party, and hence of the House as a whole. He became the man on whom the majority depended for getting its measures safely through the maze of rules. More and more authority was absorbed into his hands until he became a virtual dictator."⁹ During the decades around the turn of the present century Speaker Thomas B. Reed was frequently referred to as "Czar" Reed. Joseph G. Cannon, popularly known as "Uncle Joe," held the same position. "A simple Chairmanship," as Ogg puts it, "grew into a vital dictatorship carrying the power over life and death over almost everything that the House undertook to do."¹⁰

Before the "revolution of 1910-11" which was directed against the Speaker of the House, he appointed all standing as well as select committees and the committee appointments went to those who could be depended upon to follow his wishes. And as legislation in the United States is really the work of the Committees, he had the virtual power in the shaping of legislation. As a Chairman of the Rules Committee, he would give place on the order of the business only those measures which he desired to be enacted. Moreover, until 1910, his powers of "recog-

8. Article I, Section 2.

9. Munro, W.B., The Government of the United States, pp. 324-25.

10. Essentials of American Government, p. 212.

dition," that is, the power to grant or withhold the right of discussion, enabled the Speaker to a large degree to prevent consideration of measures to which he was opposed and to cut off debate by members of the minority Party.

The Speaker's denial of the right of debate in many cases, together with the necessity of going to his room in advance in order to secure a promise of recognition, led in 1910 to revolt against "Cannonism"¹¹ by a wing of the Republican Party, the "insurgents." They were joined by the Democrats. The coalition of Democratic minority leaders and progressive Republican insurgents brought about several amendments to the rules. The Speaker was removed from the Rules Committee and the power of selection of all Standing Committees was restored to the House itself. His power of recognition, the chief source of complaint, was also taken away. All told, the blow to the powers of the Speaker was so severe that the office has never been since then quite the same.

Nevertheless, the Speaker is still the "Commanding" figure in the House and many important duties belong to the office. He presides over the sittings of the House, arranges for the orderly conduct of the business of the House, preserves order and decorum. In case of disturbance or disorderly conduct he may either suspend business or instruct the Serjeant-At-Arms to quiet any disorder in the House. But the Speaker cannot censure or punish a member; only the House itself can do that. Then, he "recognises" members desiring the floor; the only power left out of the Speaker's three potentially great powers. The rules of the House provide that if two or more members rise, "the Speaker shall name the member who is first to speak." This in effect gives the Speaker wide discretion.

The Speaker has the right to interpret the rules of the House. Though he must follow the established precedents, but it is within his power to disregard them and to create new ones, provided that the House agrees. A majority of the House of Representatives may overrule the interpretation placed on a rule by the Speaker, but it rarely exercises this prerogative. All the same, the ruling of the Speaker is not final as it is with the Speaker of the House of Commons in Britain. He puts questions to a vote, signs all acts, addresses joint resolutions, writs, warrants and subpoenas ordered by the House. The Speaker appoints select and conference committees and has the right to refer bills to committees, though the Bills now are automatically sent to committees by the Clerk of the House on the basis of their subject-matter. Occasionally, when the competency of a committee which is to receive the Bill is disputed, the Speaker decides.

As a member of the House the Speaker has the same right to speak and vote as other members, although he does not vote, except when the House is voting by ballot or when there is a tie. But the Speaker of the British House of Commons never participates in its deliberations and he votes only when there is a tie and that, too, he does according to the established customs of the House.

11. Joseph G. Cannon was Speaker in 1903-10.

The Speaker of the British House of Commons becomes a non-party man immediately after his election to that office. But unlike his British counterpart, the Speaker of the House of Representatives is actively and openly identified with his party's organisation in the House. As a leader of the majority party in the House, the Speaker is frequently called to the White House to go over legislative matters with the President.

Today, the Speaker is relatively weak, yet he still has many "weapons" which he can use to influence the course of legislation. He is by tradition and practice the active of the majority party in the House, the "elect of the elect"¹² and is second in succession to the Presidency. He, therefore, occupies an office of great prestige and importance in the Federal Government.

THE SENATE

Composition. The Senate is a small body of only one hundred members, two from each State irrespective of population or area, elected for a term of six years, one-third retiring every two years. It is so arranged that the terms of both Senators from a particular State do not terminate at the same time. The Senate is, thus, a continuous body as only one-third of the Senators face re-election for any Congress. A long term of office, with frequent possibilities of re-election, puts Senators in more comfortable and advantageous position than Representatives. Unlike the latter with a two-year term, they have time even in a single term to acquire experience, master legislative procedure, and to attain a certain degree of leadership. It is not uncommon for a Senator to run 18 to 24 years of service. The continuous existence of the Senate is also highly beneficial. The Senate never finds itself in a position in which the House of Representatives is found every two years. The latter is entirely a new body with greatly altered membership, "obliged to organise from the ground up." The Senate is continuous and always organised. Two-thirds of its members are already in office. Precedents and traditions of the House are, therefore, "carried along on the current of a never-ending stream."

Equality of Representation. All States have an equal representation in the Senate and the Constitution recognises the sacredness of this political dogma when it prescribes that "no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."¹³ The concept of equality of representation was, in fact, a great compromise which resulted in the establishment of the United States Union and proved a great balancing factor in the North and the South. George Hamilton asserted that, once the new government was in operation, there never would be a conflict of interests between large and small States. This prediction has proved true and throughout the course of American history, whether the State is large or small, it has made little or no difference in its political attitudes and alignment. The Senators, too, do not now consider themselves as ambassadors of their States. They deem themselves as representatives of the nation and their interests are national rather than regional. It has been suggested, during recent times, that the anomalies of equal representation should be removed, because, it is a gross violation of the democratic theory that geographical units should be the basis of representation. Moreover, geographical representation gives to the States with only one-fifth of the population more than one half of the Senators and if these States with few people are "gauged up" against the thickly settled ones, there might be perpetual and intolerable conflict and hostility and inconceivable repercussions.

12. Polsby, Nelson W., Congress and Presidency, p. 51.

13. Article V.

These complaints of "Senatorial tenderness towards farm and allied interests" are "frequently heard in industrial areas." To remedy the situation it has been suggested that a State be allowed an additional Senator for every million inhabitants in excess of some fixed number. "The proposal, however," as Ogg says, "is little short of fantastic, because to carry it out would require not only a constitutional amendment, but the express consent of every State whose representation would become less than that of some other State—a prerequisite which could not possibly be met."¹⁴ Even if the proposal would have been practicable, the increased strength of the Senate would reduce its efficiency as a deliberative body. And the Senate and the House of Representatives would become both representative of the same people in the same proportions. It means duplication and the need for a second Chamber disappears. The whole question of change, therefore, remains an academic one.

Qualifications. The qualifications prescribed for eligibility to the Senate are the same in principle as those required of Representatives, though there is a little difference in degree. The Senator must be not less than thirty years old, an inhabitant of the State for which he is elected, and a citizen of the United States for nine years. The Framers of the Constitution thought that the longer term and higher qualifications would tend to give greater strength and dignity to the Senate than would be found in the House of Representatives and, at the same time, a higher average ability.

There is no constitutional provision that a Senator should be a resident of a particular part of the State. In some States, however custom came to be established that the two Senators shall be taken from two different parts. Sometimes when there is a large city in the State, the custom is to take one of the Senators from the city and the other from the country. For a long time Maryland had a statutory provision that one of the Senators should be an inhabitant of the eastern shore and the other of the western shore.

Mode of Election. In regard to the mode of election of the Senators there was a sharp difference of opinion among the members of the Philadelphia Convention. The method finally agreed to was that the Legislatures of the States should elect them. There were two main reasons for adopting this method. In the first place, the Founding Fathers thought that the choice by legislatures would be the best means of forming a connecting link between the State Governments and the National Government thereby cementing the bonds of union. The jealousy of the State Governments towards the National Government was so manifest at that stage that all possible efforts were made by the Constitution-makers to bring about cohesion through the mechanism of the newly established government. Secondly, it was believed that choice by legislatures would enable the selection of Senators of greater ability as the legislators would be in a better position to evaluate the qualifications and merits of the candidates than the mass of the people.

14. Essentials of American Government, op. cit., p. 201.

But the working of this indirect method of election belied the expectations of the Fathers of the Constitution. With the development of the party machinery, the actual choice of the Senator was made in the State party convention or in the legislative caucus, and both were controlled by bosses. It frequently led to long and stubborn contests which very often ended in deadlock. Not infrequently the legislatures failed to elect a Senator and the State with vacancy in the Senate would go unrepresented. From 1890 to 1912 not less than eleven States at one time or another were represented in the Senate by one member only. In 1901 Delaware had no Senator at all at Washington to speak for the State. And, then, the breaking of deadlocks was sometimes accomplished by bribery and other corrupt influences. Indeed, charges of bribery and corruption came to be very common, "and there is little doubt that between 1895 to 1910 a number of wealthy men found their way into the Senate through the votes of legislators who were liberally paid for their support."¹⁵ Finally, prolonged senatorial contests gravely interfered with the regular business of the State legislatures. The obvious result was a spirited movement to secure the amendment of the Constitution and after a tiring effort the Seventeenth Amendment was adopted in 1913. It provides that the two Senators from each State shall be "elected by the people thereof for six years...." They are elected by vote of such persons as are entitled to vote for members of the Lower House of the State legislature. It further provides that in case there occurs a vacancy in the Senate, the Governor of the State in which the vacancy occurs may fill vacancy by temporary appointment until the next general election, at which time a successor is elected for the balance of the former Senator's term.

The Presiding Officer. The Presiding Officer of the Senate is the Vice-President of the United States and despite his much exalted position, he is little more than a moderator. He is not a member of the Senate and, indeed, may belong to a different political party that controls the Chamber. He does not appoint the committees of the Senate and so has no power of predetermining the character of legislation, and he votes only in case of a tie. Moreover, he cannot control debate through the power of recognition. The President of the Senate must recognise the members seeking the floor in the order in which they rise. The tradition requires that he shall treat the members of both parties impartially in according recognition for purposes of debate. The Senate does not expect leadership from its Presiding Officer and would resent it most bitterly, as Vice-President Dawes learnt to his sorrow in 1925, when he attempted to solve the Senate rules.

15. Garner, J.W., Government of the United States, p. 183.

The Senate also elects from among its own members a President pro-tempore, who presides in the absence of the Vice-President. The President pro-tempore, though nominally elected by the Senate itself, is really chosen by the majority of the caucus and is, like the Speaker of the House, the ranking member of the dominant party. As a member from a State, he can vote on all issues. He presides permanently if the Vice-President becomes President; as when Johnson succeeded to the Presidency on the assassination of President Kennedy.

The Filibuster. The principal point of difference between Senate and House procedure lies in the rules respecting debate. Limitation on debate in the House is a relatively simple matter and closure rules are rigid and strict. The Senate is extremely jealous of its freedom of debate and a member can speak as long as his physical capacity enables him to hold the floor. The advantage of this privilege is occasionally taken by the Senators near the close of the session for purposes of "filibustering" a measure to which they are opposed. Sometimes the Senators opposing a Bill "talk it to death" by refusing to yield the floor until the supporters of the measure agreed to drop it from discussion. Many important measures had actually been abandoned on a mere threat of the use of filibustering. Individual filibusters of note include those staged by Huey Long and Robert LaFollette, Sr., who held the floor continuously for 18 hours in 1908. The all-time record for continuously holding the floor was achieved in 1953 by Senator Wayne Morse of Oregon; he talked for 22 hours and 26 minutes. A filibuster against an atomic energy Bill produced a Senate impasse for twelve days in July 1954, including a four-day around the clock session.

More commonly, a filibuster is conducted by a group of Senators talking in relays, each yielding the floor to a colleague known to be friendly and bound to continue the delaying action. Southern Senators have used the filibuster relay to great advantage in preventing the consideration of civil rights legislation. Very often, they had gained their ends merely by threatening to take and hold the floor. In 1917, a small group of Senators filibustered to prevent the Senate from taking a vote on a Bill to give to President authority to arm American merchant vessels notwithstanding the fact that nearly all the other Senators desired to pass the Bill. President Woodrow Wilson expressed the general public resentment over the obstructionist tactics by declaring, "The Senate of the United States is the only legislative body in the world which cannot act when its majority is ready for action. A little group of wilful men, representing no opinion but their own, have rendered the great government of the United States helpless and contemptible."

The Senate had long recognised the serious repercussions of filibustering, but the incident of 1917 resulted in a movement to limit the filibuster and adoption of a new rule by the Senate which made it possible, by a two-thirds vote, to limit the debate on any measure to one hour for each Senator. This rule was applied for the first time in 1919, to bring to an end the discussion on the Treaty of Versailles. Since then it had been successfully used for three times more. The closure rule of 1917 was amended in 1949, after a filibuster on civil rights legislation. A revised closure was made applicable on any matter under Senate proceedings, except change of rules. According to Rule XXII as amended in 1949, a vote of two-thirds members of the total membership of the Senate was required to carry closure. The old Rule of 1917 required two-thirds votes of the members present. The amendment of 1949 had, thus, made closure more difficult to use. A ceaseless effort was made to change the closure rules but it was always opposed by Southern Senators who were out to filibuster the Civil Rights Bill. In 1959, on the proposal of the majority leader Johnson, the pre-1949 formula permitting two-thirds of members present and voting to impose closure was adopted. But the controversy has not ended. Current proposals centre around a closure by a majority vote or, alternatively, by a three-fifths vote of those present and voting.

Filibuster is, thus, a device by which an insistent minority can, if it feels strongly, usually block action on a proposed Bill and frustrate the business of the Senate. But "fortunately resort to filibuster," remark Professors Swarthout and Bartley, "is infrequent. It is the ultimate weapon of the intransigent few." The fact is that even on most controversial matters the Senators are usually able to reach a unanimous agreement that the debate must end at a stipulated time on a given day. "This self-imposed curb on unlimited debate," add Swarthout and Bartley, "is the rule; the filibuster is the rare exception."

SPECIAL FUNCTIONS OF THE SENATE

The Senate, as has already been said, was intended to be more than an Upper Chamber of Congress. The Founding Fathers designed it to be, in a way, the counterpart of the Privy Council in Britain and it was for this reason that they provided in the Constitution that the "advice and consent" of the Senate would be required in certain executive actions, for example, appointments and treaties. President Washington, during his first term of office, sought the advice of the Senate and expected this body to act as his advisory council. But the Senate refused to play that role and the President simply sought its consent in fulfilment of the constitutional provision and in this way "its prerogative became one of consent rather than advice."¹⁶

Even then, its power of consenting to certain actions of the executive together with co-equal legislative powers with the House of Representatives, and judicial powers relating to impeachment cases, gives to the Senate a unique position and it has eclipsed in prestige and authority the popular Chamber, the House of Representatives.

Share in the Appointing Power. The President shares with the Senate his power of appointing federal officers. The President nominates and the Senate confirms officers of the United States by simple majority. The underlying idea was to restrain the unlimited powers of the President by a system of checks and balances and thereby ensure the appointment of honest and capable men to office. The Constitution-makers never intended to give the Senate anything more than the negative power of rejecting the nominations of the President.¹⁷ But the practice of senatorial courtesy gives to the Senators of the State concerned, where an appointment is to be made, both a positive as well as a negative function.¹⁸ According to law the President sends the nomination to the Senate, where it is referred to the appropriate Standing Committee. An appointment to the federal judiciary, for instance, is referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee; an appointment to the military establishment to the Armed Services Committee. If the nomination is contested, hearing may be held at which those actively favouring or opposing the nomination are heard. If a Committee majority is favourable, a report to that effect is made to the Senate itself. On rare occasions the Committee reports unfavourably. The Senate, then, votes and if it refuses to confirm a nominee, his appointment is not possible.

16. Munro, W.B., The Government of the United States, p. 287.

But the actual process of appointment has greatly altered the provisions of the Constitution. For a proper understanding of the procedure in vogue the principal officers of the United States may be divided into two groups: (1) those who serve the nation as a whole, as do Supreme Court Judges, 'Cabinet' members, officers of the military establishments, ambassadors, etc., and (2) those who serve as federal officers, within a particular State, as do federal district judges, certain classes of post-masters, district attorneys, marshals, etc. Presidential appointments of principal officers are rarely rejected by the Senate, though there have been a few outright rejections in recent years.

Appointees whose federal duties are confined within the boundaries of a single State, and referred to under category 2 above, come under the custom of senatorial courtesy. The custom demands that the President should consult the senior Senator of the State in which the appointment is to be made. If the senior Senator does not belong to the President's party, he must do so with the junior Senator. If neither Senator is of the President's party, the President is not bound to consult with either Senator, but he will often do so. Even if he does not consult, the President will rarely appoint a personal enemy of the Senators concerned. The Senate is jealous of its traditional prerogative and will rarely approve an appointment which is personally obnoxious to the Senator most concerned. In 1938, President Roosevelt tried to break this iron-clad tradition and nominated a federal Judge in Virginia without first clearing his choice with the senior Senator from Virginia, Carter Glass. The latter, though himself a Democrat, asked his colleagues to reject the nomination as he had been by-passed. The Senate refused the nomination by 72 to 6 votes. In 1951, President Truman was unable to secure confirmation of two nominations of federal district judges in Illinois, because of the opposition of Senator Paul Douglas, senior Senator from the State. The nomination of Justice Fortas by President Johnson in 1968 for Chief Justice of the Supreme Court raised a storm and was rejected. Within five months—November 1969—April 1970, the Senate rebuffed for the second time President Nixon in his attempt to appoint a Conservative Southerner as Supreme Court Judge.

17. See ante, Chap. III. Also refer to Garner's Government in the United States, op. cit., p. 191.

18. The role of the Senate in making appointments has already been discussed in connection with the powers of the President, Chap. III.

Share in the Treaty-making Power. The Senate also shares with the President the power of making treaties. All treaties negotiated by and on behalf of the President are laid before the Senate and a two-thirds vote of the Senators is necessary to the validity of the treaty. The Fathers of the Constitution probably wanted the President and Senators to sit down together and jointly work out a treaty. It is evident from the use of the words "advice and consent" of the Senate used in the Constitution. Washington, who thoroughly knew the mind and intentions of the Philadelphia Convention, visited the Senate to discuss a treaty which he desired to be concluded with the Southern Indians. Having received the rebuff from the Senate, Washington "started up in a violent fret," and said that "this defeats every purpose of my coming here."¹⁹ And since then no President has conferred directly with the Senate. Nonetheless the Senate plays a significant role in making treaties and ratifying treaties. If the President entertains doubts on the repudiation of a treaty by the Senate, he consults the members of the Foreign Relations Committee in advance and solicits their views. In fact, the Secretary of State usually works closely with the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate.

How important is the treaty-ratifying power of the Senate is given by John Hay, once the Secretary of State. He said, "A treaty entering the Senate is like a bull going into the arena; no one can say just how or when the final blow will fall—but one thing is certain—it will never leave the arena alive." This is rather too sweeping a statement and particularly when it comes from a former Secretary of State. It is true that the extraordinary two-thirds majority required for the approval of a treaty has frequently proved a great handicap and led to the defeat of a number of treaties. It is, also, true that a small majority can sometimes threaten to defeat a treaty and to reap political advantage thereby. Some of the rejected treaties such as Taft Knox arbitration treaties of 1911-12, the Treaty of Versailles, and the protocol for participating in the World Court, were of supreme importance. But the Senate, too, "has unconditionally approved about 900 of the approximately 1,100 or more submitted to it; many of the remainder were passed with amendment or reservation." There is, however, strong agitation to modify the Senate's treaty-ratifying power. It is demanded that this power should be given to a simple majority either of the Senate or of the two Houses. There is evidently no marked sentiment for change and the Senate is not likely to surrender the power given to it by the two-thirds majority requirement so long as the proposing of an amendment to mark the change requires a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress.

The Senate as a Court of Impeachment. Another special function of the Senate is that of acting as a Court for the trial of impeachment cases. The Constitution prescribes that the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers²⁰ shall be removed from office on impeachment for 19. As quoted in Burns and Peltason, Government by the People, op. cit., p. 422.

20. Military and Naval officers are tried by court martial. The members of Congress are not liable to impeachment. In the case of William Blount, a Senator from Tennessee in 1907, the Senate decided that it had no jurisdiction of the case.

and conviction of treason, bribery, or other crimes and misdemeanours. The House of Representatives prefers the charge and the Senate sits as a court of trial. On such an occasion the Senate is on a judicial mien and issues writs, sub-poenas to witnesses and administers oaths. When a President is on trial, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court presides. A Committee of Representatives appointed by the House appears at the bar of the Senate and prosecutes the impeached official.

A two-thirds vote of the Senate is required for conviction and the penalty which it can impose is removal from office and disqualification from holding office in the future. It cannot inflict punishment ranging to imprisonment or fine. But the person convicted and removed may be indicted and tried by courts under the ordinary procedure of law as any other criminal may.

The procedure of removing an officer by Impeachment is so cumbersome and unwieldy that it is very seldom resorted to. The Senate has sat as a Court of Impeachment on twelve occasions so far, and it has given the verdict of guilty only four times. The most notable trial was that of President Andrew Johnson, who in 1868 escaped conviction by only one vote after a three-month sitting of the Senate as a Court of Impeachment.

SENATE: THE CAUSES OF ITS STRENGTH

Not a Subordinate Branch of Congress. In addition to the three special functions which the Fathers of the Constitution assigned to the Senate, it is also a legislative body. But it is a co-ordinate body and not a subordinate branch of Congress and exercises co-equal powers with the House of Representatives in making the national laws. There is no law in the United States, as it is in Britain,²¹ which empowers the House of Representatives to veto the Senate. The only eminence which the House enjoys over the Senate is the one relating to raising of the revenues and the Constitution simply provides that such measures must "originate" in the House of Representatives. But it, also, prescribes that the Senate "may propose or concur with amendments as on other Bills." It means that the Senate can agree to, amend, modify or reject any measure relating to revenues and sometimes it so drastically mutilates it that it becomes beyond any possible recognition, as it did a few years back with the tariff Bill. The Senate can, thus, "virtually initiate new revenue proposals under the guise of amendments." The tariff Bill, referred to above, was so completely amended that it "struck out every thing in the Bill except the enacting clause,"²² and every Bill carries with it the introductory clause stipulating: "Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled." According to the letter of the law, therefore, the revenue Bills must originate in the House of Representatives, but in practice the Senate can also do that and as Dr. Munro says, "it has found a way of doing what the Constitution did not intend it to do."²³

21. Refer to the Parliament Act of 1911 as amended in 1949.

22. "On another occasion when a tariff measure originated and passed in the House, came back from the Senate, there were no fewer than 847 amendments clinging to it." Munro, W.B., The Government of the United States, op. cit., p. 302

23. Ibid.

With regard to the appropriation Bills, the Constitution is silent and the only logical inference is that in the absence of any constitutional prohibition, the Senate may originate appropriation Bills, including the national budget, if it wishes to do so. The custom, however, is and the House has guarded it "with great jealousy" that it has the exclusive right to originate appropriation Bills. Yet it cannot be denied that the Senate's fiscal role rivals that of the House of Representatives.

The Investigation Committees. The Senate has very often undertaken special investigations embracing varied matters. Among the Constitutional powers of Congress to which the investigating function is ancillary are those of legislation, impeachment, determining the qualifications and elections of its members, the consideration of treaties and agreements requiring Senate action, and the confirmation of Presidential nominees for public posts. Apart from this, as a result of the implied powers, which the Supreme Court has held as the valid jurisdiction of Congress, the investigation committees may exercise the power to delve deep from time to time into many aspects of the activities of the Executive. The Legislative Reorganisation Act of 1946 charges the Standing Committees of Congress with 'watchfulness' over the corresponding agencies on the administrative side. In this 'watchdog' capacity, the committees may be concerned with the handling of appropriations, the personal or official probity of executive appointees or with matters touching the national security.

The investigation committees may sit in Washington or they may go about the country to find facts, ideas, opinion and information, and seek advice that may be of utility in coming to a conclusion. It may summon witnesses, official and non-official, require them to produce papers and documents considered necessary for purposes of the investigation.

Bryce credits committees of the Senate with having more than once "unearthed dark doing" which needed to be brought to light. There is now increasing emphasis in the United States on the 'watchdog' function of the investigation committees. The only way Congress can check the administration is through the questioning of official witnesses in the committees when appropriation Bills are under consideration, or through interim investigations of its own into the way executive agencies are being run. The Committee can summon any official of the United States, from a member of the Cabinet to the routine clerk, to testify in public and private hearings. It is, indeed, an effective method of checking administration. But to say, as Dr. Munro observes, that "they are merely seeking data as a basis for legislation is to use the words with Pickwickian versatility. What they often are seeking is ammunition that can be used in the next election campaign."²⁴ The inquiries are, therefore, largely political in nature. The Senators dominate the politics of the country and Congress, and its investigation committees are always politically vigorous. Many famous investigations have since taken place and the most recent was the Truman Committee during World War I which "probed into waste and inefficiency, made many constructive suggestions and helped put its Chairman in the White House."

Special investigation committees have all the powers of standing committees, except that they normally may not introduce legislation.

There is a mortal terror of these senatorial investigations and many officials "dread the loaded questions of hostile Congressmen." Errors are likely to arise here and there in the conduct of administration which when discovered are widely publicized for political gains, and investigations thrive on publicity. But senatorial investigations operate "directly in the spotlight" and often the "proceedings are covered by newsreel and television cameras and reported by the host of newsmen." Recently some investigators have so fanatically sought publicity that "they have indulged in defamation of character bullying and mistreatment of witnesses, and outright partisanship."²⁵ Such a situation is viewed with alarm even by the members of Congress. Senator Scott W. Lucas has warned that "unless Congress reforms its methods of conducting investigations," unless it puts some limits of responsibility both upon the interrogation of witnesses and upon the type of testimony which witnesses are allowed to give—unless, indeed, it adopts a wholly new and more judicious attitude—one of the great and important instruments of legislative process will be destroyed.

But the intrinsic utility of the investigation committees cannot be denied if they conduct their investigations keeping in view the objects they are charged with. Brogan has correctly said that the investigation Committees are "one of the most important modifications of the separation of powers and consequently, one of the indispensable driving belts of the American system."²⁶ To put it in the words of Galloway, they are "the buckle that binds, the hyphen that joins the legislature to the executive."²⁷ The investigatory power is an essential adjunct of the law-making authority, for the investigatory function is used to seek information in matters in which legislation is contemplated, to ascertain the effectiveness with which laws are being executed, to uncover the wrongs and excesses of the government and thereby to put before the public problems essential to the country's welfare. Some of the investigations conducted by the Senate Committees, especially by the Foreign Relations Committees, have been marvellously revealing and advantageous in keeping the administration on its toes.

Conference Committee. In case of disagreement between the two Chambers the differences are resolved through a Conference Committee. The members called "managers" are equally drawn, generally three and in exceptional cases five, from each Chamber and they confer together. Each Chamber votes as a unit and the conferees may be given instructions by their respective Houses. It is natural that the Senators, who are seasoned statesmen and stalwart politicians with longer and maturer parliamentary experience, should have better of the gain. And considering the degree of solidarity often exhibited by the Senators the conferees are usually supported by the Senate. The Senate, in fact, usually gives a free hand to its representatives on Conference Committees whereas the House binds its conferees more than often to instructions. That is done as the House feels that its managers are too easily out-talked by the Senators.

25. Burns and Peltason, Government By the People, p. 441.

26. Brogan, D.W., The American Political System, p. 170.

27. Galloway, G.B., "Investigative Functions of Congress," The Political Science Review, Vol. XXI, No. 3.

Political Role of the Senators. "Senators are somewhat a different breed," write the joint authors of Government of the People, "of political animal from the average representatives."²⁸ The Senators represent, as compared with Representatives, more people and greater areas and thus, are not subject to the fluctuating public opinion and personal idiosyncrasies of the electors of a particular locality. A Representative must cater to local needs and remain susceptible to the influence of a few interest groups and handful of local party bosses. The Senators, and a majority of them, enjoy nation-wide reputation for their political sagacity. Their opinions are reckoned with and even Presidents at times have and to defer to the wishes of some veteran Senators, who are the prospective candidates for the Presidency. They also very often command important positions and dominating influences in the organization and policies of their party in the State which they represent.²⁹ Their party position is essentially linked with their control of federal patronage. The power of the Senate to confirm Presidential appointments is important constitutionally as well as politically. The former is indicative as a part of the system of checks and balances whereas the latter emphasises that the individual Senator has virtually a veto power over major appointments in his State.

Senate Solidarity. Closely allied with it is the solidarity exhibited by the Senate. "In a sense the Senate is a mutual protection society." Each Senator jealously guards the rights and privileges of others irrespective of party ties and whenever an onslaught had been made to break its solidarity, as Roosevelt did to bypass the traditional method of senatorial courtesy in 1938, it has always stood together. "Washington correspondents have frequently reported that two Senators may attack each other in vehement language on the floor, only to be seen a short time later strolling arm in arm in the corridors outside." They thrive on the principle of live and let live and their code of behaviour is to speak well of the Senate as an institution. Such a sense of solidarity enables them to ward off all encroachments from outside. "The Senate," remark Swarthout and Bartley, "is alert against any possible threat of pressure by either of these two (the President or the House of Representatives) sources, and it is quick to resent any action it considers to be a danger to its prerogative or its traditions." In its solidarity lies the independence and assertiveness and these qualities make the Senate one of the most powerful legislative assemblies in the world.

Independent spirit of the Senate and Political Experience. One of the most important factors which accounts for the authority and independence of the Senators is the continuity, stability and tradition of the Chamber which the House of Representatives has not been able to de-

28. Burns and Peltason, Government By the People, p. 420.

29. As in the case of Huey Long of Louisiana, Joseph Guffey of Pennsylvania, Nelson Aldrich of Rhode Island, or, more recently, Robert A. Taft of Ohio, and Harry Byrd of Virginia.

lop. The entire membership of the House must stand for re-election every two years and every time it is faced with the laborious task of re-organising itself. The Senate, on the other hand, has been continuously organised since 1789, for only one-third of its members stand for re-election in each two-year period. Coupled with this fact is the six-year Senate term. There are many members who gain election for three terms and some even see six Presidential terms come and go. The continued long service gives to the Senators a standing and prestige and they carry with them the sense of senatorial pride. They regard themselves as senior lawmakers of the country and custodians of the balance of powers between the Legislative and Executive departments. Each Senator strives to become a specialist, working hard "at unglamorous legislative work."

Membership in the Senate is, in fact, greatly coveted. A high proportion of its members are former Representatives or former State Governors. The tendency of many of the most able House members to seek Senate seats has constituted a drain on the talent of the House of Representatives. The loss of the House is the advantage of the Senate. Similarly, the presence of around twenty-five former State Governors not only adds to the prestige and stature of the Senate but also imparts an active quality to Senate behaviour less evident among the House membership, where talent is depleted by the locality rule and some other factors.

The Conservative character of the Senate. The Framers of the Constitution had thought that the Senate would prove the bulwark of conservatism. They had, accordingly, designed it and given it special powers so that it might serve as a check on the more radical House of Representatives. The Senate has fulfilled the expectations of its designers and acted as a conservative obstacle to hot-headed action as was illustrated a few years ago when it opposed President Truman's proposal to draft railroad strikers into the army. "It is from Senators," writes Charles Beard, "rather than Representatives that the public may expect staunch defence of constitutional methods and powerful opposition to violent, high-handed and bigoted opinions and actions."

Influence on the Foreign Policy. The Senate has been the Congressional spokesman on foreign policy, and the House its junior partner. This is due to the Senate's treaty-ratifying authority and its veto power over Presidential appointments of ambassadors, ministers and other important officials. The Senate can, also, influence the foreign policy through investigations. The investigations of the Nye Committee paved the way for neutrality legislation in 1930. In 1951, the Senate investigation on the question of dismissal of General Douglas MacArthur brought Truman's foreign policy in the Far East under fire and the administration was, thus, obliged to clarify its position.

But the present trend is to undertake international obligations by legislation rather than by treaty. The notable examples of such a joint action by the Senate and the House are the Greek-Turkish Aid Programme, the European Recovery Programme, Point Four, the Indian Grain Programme, etc., etc. Some Senators have vehemently protested against such an encroachment as well as the President's frequent use of executive agreements. They stress that no obligations be incurred except by formal treaty procedure.

Conclusion. The obvious result is that all through these times the Senate has kept its supremacy. Lord Bryce had aptly remarked that the Senate "has succeeded by effecting the chief object of the Fathers of the Constitution, viz., the creation of a centre of gravity in the government, an authority able to correct and check on the one hand the democratic recklessness of the House, on the other, the monarchical ambitions of the President. Placed between the two, the Senate is necessarily the rival and often the opponent of both. The House can accomplish nothing without its concurrence. The President can be checkmated by its resistance. There are, so to speak, the negative success on its positive side, it has succeeded itself eminent and respected." There has been a good deal of overlapping of actions of the Senate and the House during recent times, but if either body has increased its powers relative to the other, it is the Senate. While Upper Chambers in other parts of the world have been declining in power and importance, the Senate has added to its strength and prestige. It is not only the most powerful Second Chamber in the world, but also one of the most powerful legislative assemblies in the world.

SUGGESTED READINGS

- | | |
|------------------------------|--|
| Beard, C. | : American Government and Politics , Chaps. IV, V. |
| Brogan, D.W. | : The American Political System , Part Five, Chaps. III, IV. |
| Bryce, Lord | : The American Commonwealth , Vol. I, Chaps. X—XIII. |
| Dimock, Marshall E. | : Congressional Investigating Committees . |
| Finletter, T.K. | : Can Representative Government Do the Job? |
| Galloway, George, B. | : Congress at the Crossroads . |
| Griffith, E.C. | : Congress, Its Contemporary Role . |
| Haynes, G.H. | : The Senate of the United States: Its History and Practice (1938), Vol. I, Chaps. III—VII. |
| Kaufauver, E., and Laven, J. | : A Twentieth Century Congress . |
| Munro, W.B. | : The Government of the United States , Chaps. XVII—XX. |
| Ogg, F.A., and Ray, P.O. | : Essentials of American Government , Chaps. XIII—XIV. |
| Polsby, Nelson, W. | : Congress and the Presidency . |
| Riddick, F.M. | : The United States Congress . |
| Rogers, L. | : The American Senate . |
| Wilson, W. | : Congressional Government (1885). |
| Young, R. | : This is Congress , Chap. III. |
| Zink, H. | : A Survey of American Government , Chaps. XVI—XVII. |

CHAPTER VI

CONGRESS (Continued)

FUNCTIONS AND POWERS OF CONGRESS

Powers of Congress. The Senate and the House of Representatives make the national Legislature or Congress of the United States. Article I of the Constitution vests all legislative powers in Congress and then enumerates the functions it shall have to perform and the powers it is authorised to exercise. If the Founding Fathers had strictly adhered to the application of the doctrine of Separation of Powers, Congress would have been only a law-making body. But the system of checks and balances gives it non-legislative functions as well, and these functions are in no way less important than its legislative functions. Broadly regarded Congress is the instrument by which the people frame, declare, and supervise the policies of the nation. Under the non-legislative functions, we may include: (1) constituent, (2) electoral, (3) executive, (4) judicial, (5) directive and supervisory, and (6) investigative. With regard to legislative functions, it must be observed that Congress is not the only law-making authority¹ notwithstanding what Article I of the Constitution says.

NON-LEGISLATIVE FUNCTIONS

Constituent Functions. While dealing with the process of amending the Constitution, we said, that proposals to amend must be made by a two-thirds vote of Congress or by a national Convention which Congress calls at the request of the legislatures of two-thirds of States. Whatever method is adopted, and only the Congressional method has ever been invoked, not a syllable of that document can be changed without the intervention of Congress. In addition to the initiation of proposals for the alteration of the Constitution, Congress determines the manner to be used, ratification by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States or by conventions in three-fourths of the States, and may specify time limit for ratification. Moreover, Congress has important duties in expanding and interpreting the original Constitution and this, as we have discussed, is one of the most important factors to make the Constitution dynamic.

Electoral Functions. Congress has electoral functions too. As a matter of routine, it meets in joint session every fourth year to count the electoral votes cast for the President and Vice-President. If no candidate receives a majority of the electoral votes for President, then, the House of Representatives selects, each State voting as a unit, the President from among the candidates with three highest votes. When no candidate secures a majority of the electoral votes cast for the Vice-President, the Senate makes the choice from among the two candidates with the highest number of votes. Only one Vice-President had been so far elected in this manner and that, too, in 1837, when the party system was not fully developed. Such a contingency cannot happen now. Congress by law determines who shall be the President in the event of the death or disability of the President and Vice-President. Congress, also, has authority to legislate on "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives,"² and that it judges the qualifications of its own members, including the validity of their elections.³ It may disqualify persons whose conduct a majority of the members disapprove.⁴ In 1926, for example, the Senate "refused to seat" William S. Vare because of his excessive campaign expenditure.

1. See ante.

Executive Functions. Executive functions extend to appointments and treaty making. Administrative functions we take under the heading directive and supervisory. This bifurcation has been made for purposes of clarity. In relation to fifteen thousand or so officials who are nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, the Congressional role, as we discussed under the heading special functions of the Senate, is specially outstanding. The Senators and the Representatives, but especially Senators, actually determine the vast majority of these appointments. Senators who belong to the President's party do not wait to be asked which candidate they would like to favour. They immediately proceed on their own initiative to suggest names of the candidate whom they desire and, except in rare cases, they get their recommendations accepted. If no Senator from a State belongs to the President's party, Representatives claim their privilege to recommend such names. Some times, even when there are party Senators, an agreement may be worked out under which the Senators share the patronage with the Representatives.

The Senate has the important function of ratifying treaties.⁵ In the negotiations of treaties, the President has the exclusive authority, but discreet and far-sighted chief executive heads consult the leading Senators and take their opinions in anticipation in order to facilitate its ratification.

Congress, as a whole, has intimate interest in the international relations of the United States. The President reviews the international situation in his message and Congress permits the expenditure to be incurred on international obligations. Declaration of war must be made by Congress. The present tendency to incur international obligations through legislation rather than treaty emphasises the need of a joint action by the Senate and the House.

Judicial Functions. Impeachment proceedings of the President, Vice-

2. Article I, Section 4.

3. Article I, Section 5.

4. The constitutionality of this practice has been questioned, although there are many precedents to support it.

5. See ante under the heading Special Functions of the Senate.

President and other federal officials can be brought about by the House and the Senate sits as a Court of Trial.

Each Chamber exercises disciplinary powers over both its own members and to a limited extent over private persons. Members of Congress are not subject to impeachment as they are not, according to the decision of the Supreme Court, civil officers of the United States. Both the Chambers, therefore, determine how to discipline their members, and a two-thirds vote of his own House is sufficient to expel a Congressman, though it is a most uncommon proceeding.

Each House has also the inherent power to punish private persons whose conduct directly interferes with the due conduct of congressional business. If, for example, a witness before a Congressional Committee refuses to answer a question, the Chamber concerned to which the committee belongs can sit as a court and convict him of contempt. It may order the Serjeant-At-Arms to hold him in custody. But he cannot be held longer than the time Congress remains in session. Such a power, however, Congress normally does not exercise. The matter is referred to the United States Attorney for punishment under the law whenever there is a case of contempt.

Directive and Supervisory Functions. Another Congressional function is that of directing and supervising administration. The President and his principal subordinates, no doubt, actually direct and supervise administration, but it is Congress which creates all the administrative departments and agencies. The Constitution does not say anything about their organisation. Nor does it define their powers and functions. The form, the organisation, and the powers to be exercised by the administrative departments are all defined by the Acts of Congress. And, then, Congress provides money for carrying on their activities. All this "opens a way for watchfulness over the work performed, for requests for information and reports for assignment of tasks and duties, and, of course, for curtailment of activities, or even termination of them altogether (perchance of the agency itself), by denial of funds." The Legislative Reorganisation Act of 1946, stressed the importance of continuous vigilance over the execution of all laws by the Standing Committees of both the Houses. Then, Congress may from time to time see fit to pass laws directing the administrative departments to report to it. Thus, the Controller-General has been made responsible to Congress rather than President. Congress may sometimes pass a resolution directing the administration to follow a certain course of action in the event of a particular situation.

Investigative. We have referred to the investigation committees of the Senate⁶ and pointed out how these committees help to keep administration within its bounds. But appointment of such committees is not the peculiar function of the Senate alone. In fact, investigations by committees of Congress are as old as Congress itself. "Legislative oversight of administration is familiar and well-grounded assumption of responsible government," writes Arthur Macmahan, and Congress can look into any subject whenever it deems necessary in order to carry out its law-making, amending, electoral, directive and supervisory, or other duties. Alexander Hamilton and the Treasury Department were investigated into by the Second Congress; Presidential and Cabinet offices have been frequently investigated ever since.

6. See ante, Chap. V.

Congressional investigations help to make administration accountable. A proper function of the Legislature, a body representative of the people, is to keep constant watch and control over the activities of the Government which they support and to make public its policies and acts. Under a Parliamentary system of government there are many devices available to do so. In the Presidential system of government there are no such means available and responsibility cannot be adequately enforced. Legislative investigations are, therefore, a major technique, even though it is sometimes cumbersome and has fearful implications for holding the executive and administrative agencies accountable. Still, the need for throwing adequate light of publicity on what the administration does has become really imminent during recent times. As Congress has been required to extend the area of governmental functions, it has also been compelled to delegate regulatory powers, to authorise wide increase in the number of administrative bureaus, and to support by "appropriation and sustain by law a great and complex government machine involving the expenditure over $42,000,000,000 annually and the activities of over two million government employees."⁷

Many Americans have held investigatory powers of Congress as un-American and have pleaded that they should be outlawed. Actually the Constitution does not provide for such investigations, but, at the same time, they are deeply rooted in American legislative procedure.⁸ It is true that there has been extravagant abuse of the investigatory powers by the politically inspired members of these Committees, but "corruption and bribery have often been revealed only through Congressional investigations. The inadequacy of old laws and the necessity for new ones have been determined only by investigations. The abuse of offices, inefficiency, misapplication of powers have all been curtailed not only by investigation but by the constant possibility of an investigation."⁹

LEGISLATIVE FUNCTIONS

Congress is Primarily a Legislative Body. In spite of the importance and immensity of its non-legislative functions, after all Congress is primarily a Legislature and to it the Constitution assigns "all legislative power herein granted." The words "herein granted" have two important meanings. In the first place, it means that consistent with the principle of limited government, the powers of Congress, too, are limited and they are enumerated in two lengthy sections of the Constitution.¹⁰ There are some eighteen different categories on which it has been made competent

7. Tourtellot, A.B., The Anatomy of American Politics (1950), p. 98.

8. The colonial assemblies of America were authorised to conduct specific investigations. The Constitutions of some of the original thirteen States contained general authorization of this kind.

9. The Anatomy of American Politics, op. cit., p. 99.

10. Article I, Sections 7 and 8.

to enact laws. Secondly, the subjects not enumerated are beyond the authority of Congress, but, at the same time, the Constitution expressly details what Congress cannot do.¹¹ The general conclusion is that Congress may exercise those powers which are expressly granted and not definitely prohibited by the Constitution, and the rest remain within the jurisdiction of the States.

Doctrine of Implied Powers. After expressly enumerating in succession the various powers of Congress, the Constitution concludes with a sort of general grant, empowering Congress to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution "the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof."¹² Within a few years after the founding of the Constitution, Congress desired to pass laws relating to matters that the Constitution did not mention particularly in connection with the proposal of Hamilton to establish a United States bank. Hamilton contended that the authority to establish such an institution was clearly implied in the power to borrow money and pay the debts of the United States. A federal bank, he asserted, was a proper, if not necessary, means for carrying into effect these important powers of Congress, just as the establishment of mint was necessary to carry out the power relating to the coinage of money. Jefferson and his associates maintained that Congress had no right to exercise any power which was not expressly conferred. As a result of the liberal attitude which ultimately prevailed and the policy of liberal interpretation, which Chief Justice Marshall of the Supreme Court and his associates adopted, Congress has profusely relied upon the doctrine of implied powers for its authority to legislate on many important questions. "Let the end be legitimate," said Marshall speaking for the Court, "let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited but consistent with the spirit and letter of the Constitution, are constitutional."¹³ But the Court in the case went even beyond the doctrine of implied power when it invoked the theory of the resultant power. The result has been to strengthen the National Government in order to enable it fulfilling the great purpose for which it was created.

Resultant Powers. The doctrine of implied powers has been further cemented by the express provisions in some of the Amendments that Congress shall have the power to enforce them by "appropriate legislation."¹⁴ There is difference of opinion over what measures may and what measures may not, fairly be deemed "necessary and proper," or "appropriate" for carrying into effect the enumerated powers. The Supreme Court has held "that if it can be shown that Congress has been given authority the two Houses are free to select any means or instrumentalities whatsoever which are not prohibited by the Constitution," and all such means "are appropriate and consistent with the spirit as

11. Article I, Section 9.

12. Article I, Section 8, Clause 18.

13. McCulloch v. Maryland.

14. Refer to Amendments XIII, XIV, XV, XIX and XX.

well as letter of the instrument."¹⁵ Moreover, whether a certain law is "necessary" within the meaning of the Constitution, the Supreme Court has held that it is a "political question for Congress alone to answer and the Courts will not rule upon it."¹⁶ The obvious result is that Congressional authority has been considerably widened by the decisions of the Supreme Court. The "General Welfare Clause" has further helped the authority of Congress to expand. The Constitution provides that "Congress shall have the power . . . to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." It means that federal government possesses powers, which are neither specifically enumerated nor implied, under the constitutional provision of the common defence and general welfare of the United States. For example, when States cannot adequately handle particular problems, which fall within their jurisdiction of residual authority, then, it devolves upon the National Government, under the General Welfare Clause, to assume the power in an attempt to relieve the situation. This opinion was supported by Mr. Justice Stone¹⁷ in his dissenting opinion to support the Agricultural Adjustment Act. A similar opinion was expressed in Steward Machine Company v. Davis and Helvering v. Davis in 1937. Mr. Justice Cardozo, delivering the majority judgment, used the "General Welfare Clause" to justify the Social Security Act. Since then, Congress has legislated on many matters embracing diversified problems covered by this mystic constitutional provision.

Emergency Powers. Reliance has also been placed on the so-called "emergency powers." During the economic depression of the 'thirties and the World War, Congress passed emergency legislation on subjects beyond its normal jurisdiction. Congress has no emergency powers and the Constitution does not prescribe any. Nevertheless Congress has enacted laws, when the country was in the midst of economic or international crisis, which it never would have passed under ordinary circumstances. The Supreme Court, however, held the "emergency does not create power," nor does it increase power already given in the Constitution.¹⁸ The powers which Congress wields at such time are not special powers. It relies on powers which it already has, but for which there is little or no need to use ordinarily.

Thus, the powers expressly given to Congress do not convey the extent of the powers actually exercised today. Two of the eighteen express powers relate to levying taxes, spending public money, and borrowing on federal credit. The third brings in foreign and interstate commerce. "These three items alone have been expanded so amazingly that despite the six lines of type which they require in an ordinary printed copy of the Constitution, they now constitute the basis for hundreds and even thousands of far-reaching statutes which Congress has from time to time enacted. The commerce clause has been invoked during the past 15. Refer to Chief Justice Marshall's classic statement in McCulloch v. Maryland (1819).

16. See ante.

17. United States v. Butler (1936).

18. Home Building and Loan Association v. Blaisdell (1934).

decade or two to justify the regulation of business practices, the protection of organised labour, the regimentation of the coal-mining industry, and the stabilization of the stock and grain markets." The remaining gap was filled by the general welfare clause and the crowning extent was made under common defence. When the economic depression began there was some feeling that Congress lacked adequate powers to tide over the difficulties in which the country was placed at that time. Today, no such fear can be entertained even remotely. "Indeed, the chief apprehension in many minds at present seems to be that too much responsibility has been loaded on Congress, especially in those fields which were long left to private and State control."

THE MAKING OF LAWS

The British and Americans, says Griffiths, are alike in their ideals as to how to legislate. "Both strive to provide thorough discussion and consideration. Both are determined that the minority shall have a fair opportunity to be heard, to criticize, to offer alternatives. Both offer opportunity to criticize the administration and call it to account." And he concludes that the differences as in two countries are chiefly differences in procedural methods rather than in objectives. Griffiths makes two important observations here. American procedure, he says, provides for much greater legislative specialization in substance and in detail and this suits well the enormity of legislation which Congress has before it. Much of it, which in part concerns details, in Britain is left to departmental orders or private Bills. Secondly, in comparison to the simple standing orders of the House of Commons and the precedents thereunder, Rules of Procedure and precedents in both House and Senate "present a maze, a mystery which even those of long-standing membership often find it difficult to master completely."¹⁹

Each Congress in its two years of existence faces over 10,000 Bills and resolutions, of which less than 2,000 are private Bills, which follow a simplified procedure. The remaining Bills are public. A Bill introduced in the first session of a two-year Congress does not have to be re-introduced in the second session of the same Congress. With the election of the new Congress all previously introduced Bills which have not been enacted into laws, lapse and these must be reintroduced, if need is felt to do so, with the coming in of the new Congress. The principal reason for this huge number of Bills is the doctrine of equality among the membership. A backbencher and a Chairman of a committee rank equally. No distinction is also made between a minor Bill and an important measure, both are of equal importance. Each follows the same procedure. There is no such distinction, as it is in Britain, between a Government and a private member's Bill.

Kinds of Bills. Before we deal with the legislative procedure, it is necessary to distinguish between Bills and joint resolutions, and, then, to say something about variations among Bills. The greater part of the work of the Senate and the House of Representatives is transacted through the medium of Bills or joint resolutions. There is practically no difference between the two, except that the latter are narrower in scope and more temporary in purpose. Otherwise, they are similar to Bills, undergo the same procedure, and become effective under the same conditions. Joint resolutions, however, differ from concurrent resolutions and simple House or Senate resolutions. Concurrent resolutions are employed to express an attitude, opinion and objective of both the Houses. But they have no legal effect and are not submitted to the President for his assent. Simple House or Senate resolutions express the opinion, purpose, or intention of the Chamber concerned and they may not be endorsed by the other. Nor have they any legal effect and are, accordingly, not submitted to the President for his approval.

19. The American System of Government, p. 30.

There is a good deal of variation among Bills themselves. Some of the Bills are of fundamental importance and embody major programmes of government policy and cover important details spreading to fifty, seventy-five or even more printed pages. Other Bills pertain to private affairs. On the other hand, there are Bills which deal with private affairs, for example, to provide pensions for widows of former Presidents, or appropriate money to pay for damages caused by post office or army trucks. The former are known as public Bills and the latter as private Bills, that is, they do not concern public matters. A private Bill is primarily of interest to some individual or group of individuals and aims at their benefit. But here, too, as in the case of Bills and joint resolutions the distinction is not always followed in practice.

Introduction of Bills. There are no government Bills in the United States as they are in Britain; public Bills introduced, sponsored and piloted by the government. The government has no place in Congress and all Bills, public or private, are introduced and defended by members of Congress. It does not, however, mean that all proposals to enact laws originate among the Senators or the representatives themselves. Some proposals do originate with them, but majority of the Bills come from the Executive, that is, from the President or from one of the executive departments or independent agencies. Some Bills originate with, or at least are inspired by, pressure groups or persons entirely outside of government circle. Anyway, whatever be the source of origin, a Bill must become a member's child and he should appear in the House as its sponsor. The Senators and representatives act as intermediaries rather than originators in the making of laws.

The member introducing a Bill endorses the copy with his name and drops it in the "hopper," a box on the Clerk's desk in the House and the Secretary's in the Senate. Any Bill may be introduced in either Chamber, except that Money Bills are required by the Constitution to originate in the House of Representatives. The Bill is immediately numbered and sent to the Government Printing Office and made available to members next morning at the document room. With this procedure the first stage in the career of a Bill is over.

Committee Stage. Reference to a Committee is the next step in the legislative procedure. In the great majority of cases the Bill goes to an appropriate Standing Committee of the House, into which it is introduced, automatically. The title of the Bill indicates what particular Standing Committee should receive it. Before 1910-11, the Speaker in the House of Representatives determined the Committee to which a Bill was to go. But now the Speaker has been deprived of this power. Sometimes, however, a Bill is of such a nature that it might be referred with almost equal propriety to any one of two or more appropriate committees. In all such exceptional cases, the Speaker decides to which Committee a Bill shall be referred. But it is the accepted practice for Speakers to exercise this discretion freely and without party prejudices. In the Senate the reference to a Committee is even more automatic than in the House, because the presiding officer there has never had the discretionary authority to assign Bills to Committees.

In Committee, Bills are first given a preliminary examination and a decision is taken whether the proposal has any merit or not. The Bills which are deemed worthy of consideration are sorted and the rest are entrusted to the Committee files. It means, Bills meriting no consideration are "pigeon-holed." It is estimated that from 50 to 75 per cent of the Bills introduced in Congress come to final rest in Committee files and are never heard of again. The more important Bills which merit consideration are studied in details, and relevant information is gathered both from official and public sources. In fact, the Committee may seek to obtain all the light on the subject. Specified portions of the measure or even the whole of it may be assigned to a sub-committee. The sub-committees are very much like regular committees, "sorting the wheat from the chaff," deciding what changes should be recommended in a certain Bill, and otherwise preparing to dispose of the business entrusted to them. In 1946 Congress decided to provide a research staff for each committee.

Committees charged with the consideration of important Bills frequently hold public meetings at which interested parties may appear and present arguments for and against the measures under consideration. In addition to the prepared statements of witnesses, numerous questions are often put by members of the Committees for the purpose of elucidating certain points or eliciting further information. Apart from the testimony received in connection with public hearings, Standing Committees are very often subjected to outside influences. The President may himself talk personally or even write letters to top-ranking members of the Committees for their due consideration of important measures. Officials of administrative agencies may ask the Committees to be heard in person or they may submit detailed statements with their reasons for a favourable action by the Committee on a certain Bill. Representatives of pressure groups also manage to make their influences felt whether public hearings are held or not. Sometimes they manage to get themselves invited to the private hearings of Committees.

On the basis of its own investigations, the information gathered at public hearings, the opinion elicited from high Government officers and the influence exercised by pressure groups, the Committee meets in executive (closed) session to arrive at its verdict. Before the final meeting is held the sentiments of various members are canvassed. It may take by majority vote one of the following courses:

- (1) it may recommend the Bill back to the Chamber concerned with recommendation that it be passed;

(2) it may amend the Bill and recommend that it be passed as amended;

(3) it may entirely change the original Bill except its title and report a new one in its place;

(4) it may report the Bill unfavourably and recommend that it need not be passed;

(5) it may "pigeon-hole" the Bill, that is, to take no action on the Bill at all, or report it so late in the session that it may not find an opportunity for consideration.

The Report to the House is usually made by the Chairman of the Committee or someone designated by him. On important matters Committee Report may be extensive and exhaustive; on minor matters it may convey a little more than a simple affirmative note. Hearings of the major Committees on important legislation are published, some in the 'documents' series of Congress. Minority reports may also be filed.

The Caucus System. Before describing the next stage in the legislative procedure, it is necessary to briefly refer to the caucus system. We have already referred to the absence of leadership in Congress and consequently the need for devising some other means to see the Bills through or to oppose them. The mechanism which has been developed to meet the situation is known as the "caucus" or "conference."

There are numerous Bills which are non-controversial and do not demand much political interest. Such Bills are left to find their own way in Congress and the individual members are permitted by their parties to take stands as they please. But the most important legislative proposals cannot be left to themselves and it is here that the caucus system intervenes. A caucus is a meeting of the members of a political party both belonging to the Senate and the House and all members are expected to attend unless they have a valid reason for absence. The caucus at its first meeting of the session elects its party leader, steering committee, floor leader, whips and party committees on Congressional Committee. The caucus of the majority party plans a positive programme for the particular session of Congress. The minority caucus has less an active role to play, although it may decide to oppose certain controversial Bills which, "are regarded especially dear to the majority party." In the caucus meetings members are free to express their opinions and persuade the caucus to accept their view. But once the decision has been taken and a particular stand determined, all members of the caucus are expected to abide by its decision no matter what their personal views on the measure may be.

It may be pointed out here that the caucus system is used distinctly more in the House rather in the Senate. The caucus of the Senate used to be as strong as that of the House of Representatives, but during the last decade or so the caucuses in the Senate "have limited themselves to setting up party machinery and arranging committee assignments, leaving Senators free to divide themselves as they like on pending Bills."²⁰

It does not, however, mean that the party whip is not issued to the members to pass a Bill which is deemed in the best interests of the party, but no official caucus is taken which would bind the party Senators in voting.

Procedure on the Floor. Each Bill reported out of Committee to the floor of the House is placed on one of the three principal calendars. A Legislative Calendar is a docket or list of measures reported from Committees and ready for consideration. The House of Representatives maintains three of these for different types of measures: (1) A Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, to which are referred all public Bills raising revenues or involving a charge against the Government. It is also called the Union Calendar. (2) A House Calendar for all public Bills not raising revenue nor appropriating money or property. (3) A Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House for all private Bills. It is also called the Private Calendar. Bills are listed on these Calendars in the order in which they are received from the Committees and remain there until the final adjournment of Congress, unless they are removed for consideration.

Both Houses guard jealously the right of the minority to be heard. In the House it usually takes the form of apportioning an equal amount of time on a given measure to its opponents and proponents. In the Senate it appears in the facilities extended for almost unlimited debate.

Committee Reporting. When the time fixed for bringing a Bill to the floor of the House of Representatives has arrived, the House ordinarily meets as a Committee of the Whole. The Senate before 1930 used Committee of the Whole more frequently than the House, but it has now abandoned this practice for the consideration of ordinary Bills, except in debating treaties. The Committees of the Whole are of two kinds: a Committee of the Whole House for consideration of private Bills and a Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union of considering public Bills. When the House goes into the Committee of the Whole, the Speaker leaves the chair and calls some one else to preside in his place. The presence of 100 members constitutes a quorum. Debate in the Committee of the Whole is conducted rather informally, and greater freedom of discussion is allowed. Divisions are taken only viva voce, by rising vote or by tellers and no record is kept how members vote. Motions to refer or to postpone are not permitted and when discussion is completed the Committee votes to rise, the Speaker resumes the chair and the mace is again placed on a marble pedestal on the right of the chair.

The device of the Committee of the Whole is really important, because it enables all Finance Bills and most other important Bills to be considered in such a way that ordinarily every member who desires to speak and offer amendments can do so. He is, in fact, given an opportunity for that. It, also, affords large number of amendments to be presented, explained and disposed of speedily. "It facilitates rapid fire, critical debate which commonly shows the House at its best. And, for better or worse, the absence of recorded ayes and nays enables members to register their sentiments without check or restraint such as published votes sometimes impose."

Three readings of each Bill are required by House rules. The first requirement is satisfied by printing the title of the Bills in the Congressional Record and the Journal. Then, the measure goes to the Committee and if reported back, is placed upon its Calendar for a second reading. The second reading occurs at the time the Bill is taken up for consideration in the House or in the Committee of the Whole. This is the actual reading in full with opportunity for debate and for amendments to be offered. Some amendments are general, "considered" amendments are seriously intended as alterations in the Bill. Others are pro forma, involving the striking out of the last word or two of a section. In the conduct of the Bill the top-ranking members of the Committee who had supported the Bill pilot it through in the House. The minority members of the Committee oppose it. Time for debate is generally predetermined and is equally divided between the supporters and opponents of the Bill.

At the conclusion of the consideration, the Speaker states: "The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the Bill." If adopted, the Bill is ordered engrossed and read a third time. After this "the question is on the final passage of the Bill." If it is passed, then it is sent, duly signed by the Speaker, to the Senate.

Action by the Senate. The engrossed Bill is sent to the Senate through a messenger where it is received with due dignity. The President of the Senate refers it to the appropriate Standing Committee in conformity with the rules. The Senate Committee gives the same kind of detailed consideration as it received in the House, and may report it with or without amendment. Then, it is placed on the Calendar.

The Rules of Procedure in the Senate differ from those in the House of Representatives. The Senator making the report may ask consent of the Chamber for the immediate consideration of the Bill. If there is no objection and the Bill is of a non-controversial nature, the Senate may pass the Bill even without a debate after a brief explanation of its purposes and effect. Any Senator may also move an amendment thereto. If there is any objection to its immediate consideration, the report must lie over one day and the Bill is placed on the Calendar. Unlike the House of Representatives, there is only one Calendar of Bills in the Senate.

At the conclusion of the morning business for each legislative day the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the Calendar of Bills. Bills that are not objected to are taken up in their serial order permitting each Senator to speak for five minutes only on any question. Objections may be raised at any stage. When the Bill has been objected and passed over on the call of the Calendar, it is not necessarily lost. The majority party of the Senate determines the time at which the debate takes place and a motion is made to consider the Bill. The motion may lead to filibuster. Closure may be applied if 16 Senators sign a motion to that effect and the motion is carried by two-thirds of the members voting. Amendments may be moved even at this stage, and these, including those proposed by the Committee that reported the Bill, are considered separately.

After final action on the amendments, the Bill is ready for engrossment and the third reading. The President then puts the question upon the passage and the vote is taken viva voce. A simple majority is necessary to pass the Bill. The original engrossed House Bill, together with the engrossed amendments, if any, is returned to the House with a message stating the action taken by the Senate.

On return to the House, it is placed, with all the relevant papers, on the table of the Speaker to await further action. If the amendments are minor these are accepted by the House, the Bill is ready for enrolment for presentation to the President. If the amendments are substantial or controversial and the House does not agree thereto, a member may request for a conference. At the conference only matters in disagreement are considered. In many instances the result of the conference is a compromise. If no agreement is reached the matter is reported by the conferees to their respective Chambers.

A Bill cannot become a law until it has been approved in identical terms by both Houses of Congress. When the Bill has finally been approved by both Houses it is sent to the President for his assent. If he approves the Bill he signs it and usually writes "approved" and it becomes law. If the President decides to veto it, he returns it with a message stating the objections to the Chamber in which the Bill originated. If the measure is repassed by both the Houses, with two-thirds votes in each, it becomes law without the signatures of the President. If two-thirds vote is not forthcoming, the veto stands. If the President keeps a Bill for ten days without signing it while Congress is in session, it becomes law without his signatures. But if Congress adjourns within ten days and the President does not sign the Bill, the Bill is killed. This has been called the "pocket veto."

Committee system evaluated. Law-making in the United States is a labyrinth, complicated and tortuous process wherein Committees play the key role. It is here that the Bills languish and die and the chairmen of the Committees play a strategic role in the process of selecting the Bills that the Committees will take up, in shaping the size and jurisdictions of the sub-committees, and in selecting members who may sponsor legislation. In countries with Parliamentary system of government the part which the Committees play is rudimentary. Their purpose is to give the Bill a final shape and it comes to them when the Chamber itself has already approved its general character. The Minister sponsoring the Bill holds its charge throughout; it is his child. It is just the other way in the United States.

The Committees are of two types in the United States, Standing or "Legislative" Committees and Special Committees. The House of Representatives has twenty Standing Committees, and the Senate sixteen. They are permanent Committees, each of which watches over a particular segment of legislative business. The number of Committees though slightly different, the division of responsibility among Committees is very similar in both Houses. Each of the Senators is assigned two of the Committees whereas one Representative gets only one. Many Committees constitute their sub-committees, some of which are permanent and are subject to little control by the parent Committee.

The House or the Senate may create a special or select committee to conduct some temporary investigation. When the function has been carried out the Committee automatically expires. In recent years, however, special Committees are seldom appointed and investigations are assigned instead to the relevant Standing Committees.

A House Committee, a phrase commonly referred to as a Standing Committee of the House of Representatives, consists of nine to fifty members and a Senate Committee usually has thirteen to fifteen members. All the Standing Committees in both Houses are bipartisan in character and the proportion is fixed by the Party in majority for the time being. There is a tendency to appoint members to Committees in the work of which they are interested. It is a forum of specialised interests, for example, ex-soldiers seek places on the Committee dealing with veterans, members from the farm States go to the Committee on Agriculture, and the industrial States of the North and East are represented on the Finance Committee. Special or Select Committees may be created at times to perform specific tasks. But such Select Committees are less used now.

Special Investigation Committees are sometimes set up to gather information or evidence on some subjects as an aid to law-making, to check on the administration of laws, or to investigate into alleged undesirable practices or conditions. The House of Representatives frequently votes itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of expediting business and reaching agreements on detailed provisions of Bills. When the House meets as a Committee of the Whole all its members sit as a Committee with an appointed Chairman.

Joint Committees consisting of an equal number of Representatives and Senators have been created by law in a few well-demarcated fields, such as the Joint Committees on atomic energy, on the economic report, on the Library of Congress, on internal revenue taxation. Conference Committees are a special form of Joint Committee used to iron out differences on Bills as passed by the two Houses.

The real work of legislation, which averages 5,000 to 7,000 Bills in a session, is done through the Standing Committees. These Committees cull out those Bills which they regard important and recommend to Congress for enactment. In fact, most Bills are enacted in the form given them in the Committees. Some Bills are redrafted de novo in Committee rooms. The Standing Committees, therefore, play a vital role in the Congressional legislative process. The reduced number of Standing Committees, 61 prior to 1927, 47 from 1927 to 1946 and since then 20, has resulted in the greater use of sub-committees as the work-load of Committee work remained the same after 1946. Each Standing Committee member serves on several sub-Committees, especially in the Senate.

In theory chairmen of the Committees in each House are designated by the Committee on Committees of the majority party. But in practice each assignment goes to that Member of the majority party who has the longest unbroken service on the Committee. This seniority rule in the appointment of Chairmen is a subject of deep controversy as it ignores ability and puts premium on continuous service on the Committee itself. The American Political Science Association appointed, in 1945, a Committee on Congress and it recommended the abandonment of the seniority rule. The Committee suggested two alternatives to the prevailing system. First, the Chairmen of Committees should be selected at the beginning of each Congress by a Committee on Committees of the majority party on the basis of merit, or, if seniority remains the dominant consideration, then an automatic limit of six years be placed on the term of all Chairmen, thereby forcing a reasonably regular rotation of office.

The role of the Chairman of a Committee in the legislative process is, indeed, extremely important. He has the power to arrange the meetings of the Committee; to select its professional staff; to appoint the members of the sub-committee; to determine the order in which it considers Bills; to decide if public hearings on a Bill are desirable; to arrange to have a Bill, favourably reported by the Committee, brought to the floor of the House; and to serve as a manager on the Conference Committee on a particular Bill, should one be necessary. "In theory the manner in which a Chairman exercises these powers is subject to review and even control by the Committee as a whole, but it is a rare committee that ever undertakes to check or rebuke its Chairman."

FINANCIAL FUNCTIONS

The Constitution establishes the financial supremacy of Congress by specifying that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriation made by law. The Constitution also provides that all Bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. The usage adds to it that the appropriation Bills are also initiated there. The Senate possesses co-equal powers with the House of Representatives in accepting or rejecting Financial Bills, but in practice it "functions as a Court of Appeals in financial legislation often mending defects of such measures sent over from the House."

The budgetary powers of Congress are, indeed, great as both Congress and the President shape national policy-making. It is "a system of separated institutions sharing powers."²¹ How Congress shares powers with the President is succinctly explained by David E. Bell, President Kennedy's first Director of the Bureau of the Budget. The Budget, he said, is "...a major means for unifying and setting forth an over-all executive programme...." It "reflects (the President's) judgment of the relative priority of different federal activities. Thus, the President's budget necessarily reflects his policy judgments and the Congress in acting on the President's budget necessarily reviews these policy judgments as to the relative importance of alternative uses of national resources.

....The essential idea of the budget process is to permit a systematic consideration of our Government's programme requirements in the light of available resources; to identify marginal choices and the judgment factors that bear on them; to balance competing requirements against each other; and, finally, to enable the President to decide upon priorities and present them to the Congress in the form of a coherent work programme

21. Neustadt, Richard E., Presidential Power, p. 33.

and financial plan.²²

GENERAL APPRAISAL OF CONGRESS

The Founding Fathers, who drafted the Constitution of 1787, had great hopes for Congress. Congress was conceived as the dominant and most powerful of all three branches of government. It was given a place of precedence and it is the first and the longest article of the Constitution—longer than all other original articles combined which deals with Congress. The Constitution gives to Congress control of the laws of the nation, the finances of the nation, the strength of the armed forces of the country. By implication it possesses unlimited investigatory powers. It has the right to impeach the President, the Vice-President and other officers of the United States, exercises complete supervisory powers over administrative agencies and has the choice to select the President and Vice-President if no candidate receives an electoral majority. In brief, because of its supervisory and appropriation powers, Congress has stronger ultimate administrative powers than the Presidency, and because of its impeachment powers, including the impeachment of the judges themselves, it is a higher court of justice than any, including Supreme Court, in the land. The powers of Congress, except for certain exceptions, are clearly constitutional and detailed carefully to cover eighteen different phases of national life and emerging therefrom are the Implied powers and Resultant powers. Members of Congress are the only officials who are exempt from arrest while attending sessions, except for treason, felony or breach of peace, and from libel law.

Its working and achievements disclose that Congress stands out as one of the successful Legislatures of the democratic world. It has endured for more than one hundred and seventy-five years, and has never failed to serve the country loyally. Nevertheless, Congress has from the beginning not fulfilled the expectations of the Framers of the Constitution. It has "suffered declining prestige, weakened influence, and a more or less chronic inability to get its work done, as the Presidency has in general grown and as the Supreme Court has on the whole held its own."

Not a really National Representative Body. Primary among the reasons of its declining prestige and authority is the fact that Congress is not, in very real sense, a national representative body. It is an assemblage of State delegations. "Its historic development, unlike the Presidency, has been along generally regional lines; its major pre-occupation has been the resolution, usually by compromise, of conflicting regional interests; its ordinary approach to national legislation has been through the avenue of the effect of such legislation, not on the welfare or the opinion of the nation as a whole, but on the interests and the reaction of the area from which the Senators and Representatives come and to which they must return."²³ Congress, is, as Professor Laski points out, the legislature of a continent and a member of Congress

22. Statement of Hon. David E. Bell, Hearings Before the Sub-Committee on National Policy Machinery, as quoted in Polsby's Congress and the Presidency, p. 83.

23. An Anatomy of American Politics, op. cit., p. 79.

is expected to think in terms of sectional interest. He must think about the effect of a measure upon the particular area for which he sits rather than its effect on the country as a whole. This regional attitude of the Congress has given it a position of backwardness, but to the advantage of Presidency which Americans regard as the pivot of national solidarity.

At the position of Congress and its members is the working of the "locality rule." The Constitution demands that the Senators and Representatives shall be residents of the States they represent and convention insists that Representatives shall, in addition, be residents of the congressional district that they wish to represent. A member of the House of Representatives is constantly aware that every two years he will be judged by his constituents and this awareness makes him far more responsive to his judgment of what will please them. The obvious result is that every Congressman keeps his ear to the ground and sacrifices national for local and sectional interests. Locality rule accounts in part of the comparative local-mindedness of the American Congress.

A member of Parliament in Britain cannot afford to disregard the party whip and go against the behest of the party even if the decision of the party may be antagonistic to the wishes of his constituents. In America, neither the Senator nor the Representative can afford to obey the party call against the wishes of the State or district. He knows that if he is defeated it will mean the end of his Congressional career. The President or the party can do nothing for him, "cannot procure for him a seat outside his own bailiwick, can only solace him with a job—and cannot always do that." The result is that the whims of the local party boss, if his fate depends upon his judgment, or that of an important section of his "home-folks" are more near and dearer to him than the national leaders of his party. Voters, too, feel that if they elect a man, he should be the local champion. All these factors combined together do not make Congress really a national representative body.

Divorce between the Executive and Legislature. The Presidential system of government envisages a distinct mechanism of government. Parliament, in Britain, is only formally a legislative body. Its real business is to endorse the decisions of the Cabinet and make them effective. Parliament may bring about minor amendments here and there in the measures before it, but fundamentally legislation is shaped in the Whitehall and not in Westminster. With Congress, it is just the reverse. Legislation is the main business of both the Chambers in the United States. The Senate and the House do not act under the instructions of the President. They, no doubt, co-operate with him, particularly during times of national emergencies, but Congress is a co-ordinate branch of government with the Executive. To put it still more explicitly, the Executive and the Legislature are co-equal partners in working the governmental machinery. There is, however, no cohesiveness and the party ties which bind the Executive and the Legislature are too flimsy for an integrated policy as obtainable in Britain and other countries with Parliamentary system of Government. To put it in the words of Laski, the party ties which bind the two wings of Government "never bind them into a unity." The interests of Congress are separable from those of the President.

From the very beginning of the establishment of the Union, Congress has always emphasised its independent existence and its independent will, except only during war, or an emergency like that of March 1933, where there had been unity of purpose and unity of will. This is for two reasons. First, the realisation of the fact that administration does not depend for its existence on Congress if it acts on its own way; and secondly, every individual Congressman endeavours to assert himself and his rights that Congress cannot be overshadowed by the President. To put alterations and modifications to the measures of the President "is to draw attention to itself that he is not the unqualified master of the nation." Sometimes the "very political survival of the Congressman, who is, after all, subject to renomination and re-election on the local level, demands that he break on one or more issues with the President of his own party."²⁴

Short-sighted Policy of Congress. The net result is incoherency and irresponsibility. The Executive has no place in Congress to co-ordinate its activities and establish a hyphen between the Executive and Legislative Departments of Government. Legislation is every Congressman's concern, but it is no one's child. To impress upon his constituents his worth as a legislator and in order to cater to the local sentiments and to justify the trust reposed in him by his electors, every Congressman has a mania to rush in all kinds of measures. Congress is, accordingly, charged of wilful parochialism and neglect of national needs. It has consequently seldom succeeded in formulating and enacting long range and lasting policies unless they were imposed upon it by a strong President.

Polsby maintains that even the "efficient minority" of Congressmen, who stand eminent in the legislative sphere, determine the consequences of their behaviour from the point of their careers. "The questions he must continually pose to himself are: How will my behaviour today affect my standing in the House tomorrow, the next day, and in years to come? How may I act so as to enhance my esteem in the eyes of my colleagues? How may I lay up the treasures of my obligation and friendship against my day of need? Or, if he is oriented to public policy: How may I enhance the future chances of policies I favour."²⁵ Such a state of mind has made Congress "the butt of jokes among all the people, the subject of despair among the enlightened and the instrument of hope among the ruthless."²⁶ It has, therefore, been correctly observed: "If the law is regarded—as properly it should be—as a codification of the moral judgment of the community as a whole, which in this case is the nation, then the Congress has been strangely and unbelievably obtuse in determining that judgment."

The Congress, thus, speaks in a confusion of tongues and the long decline of Congress has contributed greatly to the rise of Presidency. It cannot operate successfully without leadership, which none but the President can offer. When Congress finally gave up primary responsibility for preparing the national Budget in 1921, it had no choice but to call on the President to come to its rescue. By abdicating this ancient and primary function, it exercised the most short-sighted policy since it gave a tremendous boost to the power of the President, not only to control his administration, but to influence the legislative process too.

24. Polsby, Nelson E., Congress and the Presidency, p. 114.

25. Ibid., p. 102.

26. The Anatomy of American Politics, op. cit., p. 83.

Inefficient working of Congress. Even a cursory observer of the working of Congress would regret the amount of legislative time wasted on relatively minor issues, and the haste, especially in the House, in which matters of great importance are dealt with. The rules of filibuster and the two-third votes required for ratifying treaties in the Senate are a great hindrance in the way of the majority and Congress carrying out its purpose. The Rules of Procedure followed in both the Houses encourage minorities to obstruct its business by making frequent points of order and time consuming notions, introducing irrelevant business, and repeatedly demanding quorum calls.

The Congressman is not only a legislator, but he is also expected to serve his constituents as an "errand-boy" in varied fields divorced from legislation. An active Congressman once said, "Nevertheless at least half of my time is taken up with matters that have nothing to do with my legislative duties. Answering letters from my constituents, trotting around to the Departments doing their errands, trying to represent them in one way or another as a broker, a factor, an attorney, an agent, an emissary, and whatever you will takes up about half the time of the average Congressman. And I don't have to do it if I don't want to. All I have to do is to neglect it; then I get licked at the next election...."²⁷ Such kind of work seriously interferes with a Congressman's real usefulness as a national law-maker. The theory of representation as prevailing in the United States demands that the representative gives his attention, first to his constituents and secondly to national affairs. Local sentiment and pressure are, thus, intensified. Though neither residence in the district nor the element of short term of office are present in the Senate, "the attitude fostered by the relationship of constituents to their representative," write Professor Swarthout and Bartley, "is transferred over to the Senator in similar, though diminished, fashion."

The Influence of Lobby.²⁸ The Congressman is further bedevilled by the presence in the national capital of numerous individuals who press him at every turn to support or reject given legislation. There is no open bribery or graft, but the methods employed by the 'lobbyist' are frequently so subtle that the "unsuspecting legislator is under lobby influence before he is quite aware of what has happened." The 'lobbyists' are the representatives of the special groups economically or otherwise interested in the legislation before Congress. They are called 'lobbyists' because they buttonhole individual members of Congress in the lobbies and elsewhere too. The members succumb to the special interest groups. The existence of lobbies is a serious problem to Congress, because they place on the legislator a burden "from which he cannot always dissociate himself. The pleadings—and threats—of special interest groups are constantly in his ears. Even many of the church groups of the nation now maintain paid lobbyists in the nation's capital." Lobbying, no doubt, is good and it frequently performs necessary services, "but it has outgrown its evil associations and more sordid ways" with shocking results on the reputation and integrity of Congress as a national legislative body. The Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act is an important section of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, which amends to remedy some of the glaring defects in the "lobby." The Lobbying Act requires persons, corporations, and organized groups of all kinds seeking to influence the passage or defeat of legislation by Congress "to register, list contributions, and file quarterly statements of expenditures with the Clerk of the House of Representatives."

27. Also refer to Ferguson and McHenry, The American System of Government, pp. 281-82.

28. The term lobby arose from the use of lobbies, or corridors, in legislative halls as places to meet with and persuade legislators to vote a certain way.

Criticism of the Committee System. The Committee System is also subjected to severe criticism and it centres to a considerable degree on the methods used in Committees of investigation. The seniority rule in choosing Committee chairmen, sometimes almost dictatorial power of Committee chairmen, and broad authority of the Committees to "pigeon-hole" legislation are matters which are disturbing and they have since long troubled some students of Congress. "Yet curtailing these powers," observe Swarthout and Bartley, "without generally overhauling the entire congressional machine and drastically altering philosophy of the members would result in an impossible volume of work for Congress." As regards purposes of Congressional investigations, other reasons aside, investigations are often motivated by the desire of a political party to advance its own interests or to embarrass its adversary. In 1920 and 1930, the Democratic Party did its best to discredit the Republican Party through investigations into the scandals of Harding Administration and the evils of bankers and businessmen. The Republican Party took its revenge in 1947-48 and 1953-54 to expose the shortcomings of Roosevelt and Truman Administration. Thus, instead of giving fair, impartial information to Congress and to the public for constructive use, an investigating committee "usually starts out to prove something and hunts the evidence which will support this proof." The public can hardly expect Congress to function with wisdom under the circumstances.

Judicial Review. The process of judicial review also depresses the enthusiasm of the legislators. The Constitution leaves the last word with the Supreme Court and the legislators while initiating any legislative proposal have not only to think what their constituents want, or will stand, but also whether what Congress does decide will be acceptable to the Supreme Court in case its validity is challenged. No one can predict what the Supreme Court will do, but the apprehension is there. "When all legislation," observes Professor Brogan, "has to run this kind of gauntlet, the results are apt to depress the legislator and his supporters, to blunt the edge of zeal and hope to turn the minds of both parties to more practicable and tangible achievements, favours and jobs."²⁹

Unification of the Economic and Social Interests. In the context of the present state of affairs in the country there has been the growing unification of the nation's economic and social interests. The great sectional economic issues are fast disappearing and all sections of the people stand together for their common benefits. The last eight Presidential elections clearly indicate that, leaving aside "the blind emotional attitude of the South," the national politics of the country has now few sectional aspects and it is not easy to split the country geographically on economic issues. "Even socially the Midwest farmer, the Farwest rancher and the Eastern plant manager are becoming unified in their tastes and values; their children no longer go solely to their own sectional colleges and universities; their travel and vacations are no longer within sectional limits. But there is no change in the attitude of the Senators and the Representatives. The senior Senator from Tennessee is no more concerned with or closer to the residents of Oregon than he was two or three generations ago. In the halls of Congress sectional values, sectional attitude and sectional roots remain."

The result is that the people with their new national standards do not look favourably towards Congress. They are, indeed, unwilling to place great faith in a legislature which, while still protecting what local interests remain, frequently "by procrastination, indecision or opportunistic compromise endangers the nation interests." They look to the President as the embodiment of national unity and national solidarity. This really is dangerous to the prestige of Congress and a grave cause of its weakness.

STRENGTHENING THE CONGRESS

Relationship between the Executive and Legislative Departments.

It should, thus, be obvious that the problem of co-ordinating the Executive and Legislative branches has been aggravated by the fact that usage has intensified a separation that the Constitution only implied. This happened immediately after the inauguration of the Constitution when the first Congress required the Secretary of the Treasury, Alexander Hamilton, to make his reports in writing instead of orally, which he was ready and eager to do. Since then this practice has been rigidly followed with the consequence that the Executive is entirely divorced from the legislature and as Judge Story described a century ago, "The Executive is compelled to resort to secret and unseen influences, to private interviews and private arrangements to accomplish his own appropriate purposes instead of proposing and sustaining his own duties and measures by a bold and manly appeal to the nation in the face of the representatives." But the nation cannot stand at ease when the President and Congress wrangle and deadlock over important issues. The President, being the representative of the nation, the generalissimo of administration, and the people's choice, is the leader of the nation. But his leadership can only be established and stabilised, if there is proper co-ordination and co-operation between the Executive and the Legislative departments. The co-ordination really means strengthening Congress itself and thereby aiming to remove the instinctive and inherent tendency of Congress to be anti-Presidential. Three-quarters of a century ago, James A. Garfield, after a long service in the House of Representatives, declared, "It would be far better for both departments if members of the Cabinet were permitted to sit in Congress and participate in the debates or measures relating to their several departments but, of course, without a vote. This would tend to secure the ablest men for the chief executive offices; it would bring the policy of the administration into the fullest publicity by giving both parties ample opportunity for criticism and defence."

Suggestion of Cabinet Government. There are some students of Congress who have gone so far as to advocate the abolition of the entire concept of Presidential government and the substitution in its stead of the Cabinet system of government. If America is to remake her Constitution, it will most surely be a Parliamentary system of government. But this will not happen. Some discussion of the merits of the British Cabinet system took place before the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress when that Committee was making plans for the Legislative Organization Act of 1946. Walton Hamilton, of the Yale Law School, expressed his alarm on the pace at which adoption of the British system was being advocated and observed that the situation in which Americans were placed and their needs had not been correctly analysed. The conviction that the British Cabinet system would not meet American needs is widely held and it is believed that the Presidential system "with all its operational groanings and creakings has afforded a different, but equally practical and probably better adopted solution to the problem of governmental power in the United States."

Even proposals to introduce Executive initiative in legislation and to make administration responsive and responsible within the existing framework of government have not been well received. Two years after Garfield's recommendation, referred to above, young Woodrow Wilson proposed giving "the members of the Cabinet seats in Congress with the privilege of the initiative in legislation." In 1893, he urged that President Cleveland "now assume the role of Prime Minister with the Cabinet as the agency of co-ordination to accomplish the popular will." And when he became President, he wanted in very truth to be a Prime Minister. He stressed his function as the leader of his party, addressed Congress in person, and promoted and carried out a programme of notable legislation.³⁰ When he faced possible defeat on the proposed repeal of the exemption of American vessels from payment of Panama Canal tolls he declared, "In case of failure of this matter I shall go to the country after my resignation is tendered." In 1918, he appealed to the country for the returning of a democratic majority to both the Senate and the House of Representatives. "I am your servant," he said in his appeal to the electorate, "and accept your judgment without cavil, but my power to administer the great trust assigned to me by the Constitution would be seriously impaired should your judgment be adverse, and I must frankly tell you so because so many critical issues depend upon your verdict." The American electorate appeared to resent the appeal and a Republican Congress was elected although many other factors doubtlessly contributed to that event. "President Wilson learned eventually," remark Professors Binkley and Moos, "that such a system does not conform to American traditions and apparently cannot be institutionalised in the American setting."³¹

30. A Grammar of American Politics, op. cit., p. 355.

31. Binkley, W.E., and Moos, President and Congress, p. 382.

Another proposal of Congressional Executive relations has been suggested on somewhat different and less radical lines. It is suggested that ex-Presidents be given a lifetime seat in the Senate. But such an arrangement is not likely to cement the relations between the occupant of the White House and Congress, though it would provide to the Senate additional knowledge of the executive office and the understanding of the problems surrounding it which that body might not otherwise gain.

Another plan was advocated by the late Senator M. La Follette, Jr. This plan called for the creation of a permanent group consisting of important Congressional leaders—Vice-President, Speaker, majority party floor leaders of the two Houses, chairmen of major Committees—and key Cabinet members. They should regularly meet and plan in outlines the broad basis of national policy. Regular meetings between the Congressional leaders and the executive chiefs would enable them, it is claimed, to know one another well and, thus, build a team spirit. "The penalties for excluding Congress from the national council are high," says Roland Young. "Their exclusion means a continuance of the localism which are so often a predominant characteristic of Congressional behaviour. When Congress feels ignored it often retaliates irrationally, by sulking, by refusing to pass needed legislation, and by passing ill-advised legislation. When Congress is nettled, it is well to treat her like a desperate woman and walk the other way."³²

There are cumbersome and awkward methods of obtaining information on administration by Congress. For example, Congress may pass resolutions of inquiry directed to heads of Departments. Hearings may be conducted by Congressional Committees and too often these investigations are not held jointly by both Houses. Departmental information may be obtained by personal interviews or by correspondence of Congressmen with administrative officials. Recent Presidents have held weekly press conferences at the White House with leaders of the Senate and the House. The substitution of the question hour, modelled after the British practice, taking the place of the prevailing American practices, has been proposed by Representative Kefauver and Senator Fullbright. According to this plan, it is suggested that during the question hour in both the Houses, "Cabinet" members and other key administrators should be present to answer to questions put by members. The reform, it has been maintained, would bring administrators, and Congressmen together thereby removing the element of indifference that now exists. But introduction of the question hour has been considered by many thoughtful men in the United States as a sheer waste of time of the already over-burdened Congress. Walton Hamilton observed in his testimony before the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress that "we have a device here which is vastly superior to that (question hour), and that is the appearance of the administrative officer before the Congressional Committee where the matter is a great deal more informal and the questioning is a great deal more searching than it could ever be before the House."

The outcome is not clear, though the need for co-ordination and harmony between the Executive and Legislative departments is keenly felt on all sides, but within the existing system of government. "Congress and the Presidency," observes Polsby, "are like two gears, each whirling at its own rate of speed. It is not surprising that, on coming together, they often clash. Remarkably, however, this is not always the case. Devices which harmonize their differences are present within the system, the effects of party loyalty and party leadership within Congress, presidential practices of consultation, the careful restriction of partisan opposition by both Congressional parties, and the readily evoked overriding patriotism of all participants within the system in periods—which now-a-days, regrettably, come with some frequency—universally defined as crises."³³

32. This is Congress, p. 257.

SUGGESTED READINGS

- | | |
|---------------------------------|--|
| Bailey, Stephen | : Congress Makes A Law. |
| Binkley, W.E. | : President and Congress. |
| Brogan, D.W. | : The American Political System, Part Five, Chaps. I—IV. |
| Brown, G.R. | : The Leadership of Congress. |
| Burns, J.M., and Peltason, J.W. | : Government By the People, Chaps. XV—XVII. |
| Corwin, E.S. | : The President: Office and Powers, Chap. VII. |
| Galloway, G.B. | : Congress at the Crossroads. |
| Gross, Betram | : The Legislative Struggle. |
| Haynes, G.M. | : The Senate of the United States. |
| Laski, H.J. | : The American Presidency, Chap. III. |
| Lawrence, H.C. | : The President, Congress and Legislation. |
| Ogg, F.A., and Ray, P.O. | : Essentials of American Government, Chaps. XVI—XVIII. |
| Polsby, Nelson, W. | : Congress and the Presidency. |
| Tourtellot, A.B. | : The Anatomy of American Politics, Chap. III. |
| Wilson, W. | : Congressional Government, Chap. V. |
| Young, R. | : This is Congress, Chaps. II, V—VI, VIII. |
| Zink, H. | : A Survey of American Government, Chaps. XV, XVIII, XIX. |
| Zinn, Charles J. | : How American Laws are Made. |

CHAPTER VII

FEDERAL JUDICIARY

Need for the Federal Judiciary. The Articles of Confederation made no provision for a national judiciary. Hamilton declared this to be the crowning defect of the old Government, for laws, he correctly asserted, are a dead letter without courts to expound their true meaning and define their operations. During the period of Confederation all judicial controversies were left to the State Courts, and each State having its own legal system presented a variety of conflicting decisions which created conditions of uncertainty and innumerable complexities. The major task of the Founding Fathers was, therefore, to evolve out a judicial system which should preserve the integrity of the new Government to be established and remove the chaotic conditions which were existing then. They also realised that under the system of government that they were establishing, disputes between the States would become more frequent in the future and an impartial umpire, standing outside them all, would be needed to settle their controversies. Similarly, there would be questions bearing on the relations of the United States with foreign nations on matters covered by treaties which could not, even for reasons of political expediency, be left to the State Courts. To do them so, meant placing the peace and well-being of the country at the mercy of thirteen conflicting authorities. Then, disputes were certain to arise as to the meanings of various provisions of the new Constitution and with regard to the interpretation of laws passed by Congress. To leave such disputes to the courts of the different States would have meant invitation to chaos, for each State Court would give different decisions, one opposed to the other.

Finally, the framers of the Constitution were planning for a "more perfect union" and to "establish justice." If the new Constitution and the laws and treaties made under it could achieve the objects set, it was imperative, they concluded, that there should be a distinctive federal court, supreme, and independent of the States.

Constitution provides for a Supreme Court. Guided by these reasons, the Constitution makers made a provision, vide Article III, in the Constitution for the federal judiciary, and while doing so they made the judicial power co-ordinate with Executive and Legislative powers. It is a brief reference and the Constitution does not say much about its structure and organisation. Article III merely states that the judicial power will be vested in one court and such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. Thus, Congress is given authority to determine the number of judges necessary for the proper functioning of the Supreme Court, and to create additional courts as and when it deemed necessary and expedient. But in order to maintain the independence and integrity of the judges of all such Courts, the Constitution provides for permanence of tenure during good behaviour and a compensation for their services which cannot be diminished during their continuance in office.

Power of Congress to control Federal Judiciary. In spite of these constitutional provisions, Congress has still the means to control the federal judiciary. True, Congress cannot abolish the Supreme Court, or diminish the salaries of the Justices, or remove anyone of them from office, except by due process of impeachment. But it can make significant changes in so many other ways. Congress can by law reduce the number of Justices by prescribing that on death, or resignation of any of them the vacant post shall be abolished, or accept a plan, as one proposed by President Franklin Roosevelt, to appoint new Justices up to six to the Supreme Court when Justices after reaching the age of seventy fail to resign within six months, and thus to increase the number of Justices and secure the right kind of "appointments." With regard to the inferior courts, control by Congress has been real and more comprehensive. In 1802, during Jefferson's Presidency, it repealed the law of the preceding year creating sixteen posts of Circuit Judges which President Adams had filled, with men strong in federalist conviction, at the close of his term of office. Congress can, also, by law prevent certain classes of cases from coming before the Supreme Court by refusing to provide a system of appeals. But on the whole, it can be safely said that except in times of crisis the federal judiciary enjoys a high degree of independence from legislative interference.

Appointment and Tenure of Judges. The Constitution merely stipulates that the President and Senate are to appoint the Justices of the Supreme Court and authorises Congress to vest the appointment of such "inferior officers" as it thinks proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments. All Justices of the Supreme Court are, thus, nominated by the President and appointed by and with advice and consent of the Senate. With regard to the inferior courts, it has been settled by uniform practice that judges of all lower federal tribunals are not "inferior officers" and their appointment should not, therefore vest in any other authority than the President and the Senate.

The Constitution does not state what qualifications are demanded of Justices of the Supreme Court, either as to age, citizenship, and legal competence, or as to political views and background. From the time when President Washington submitted to the Senate his first list of Supreme Court appointments, the attempt has been made almost invariably to select men of high prestige and outstanding ability. Appointments have been made from time to time, it is true, "to pay political debts, to show deference to a particular section of the country, or even to provide representation for a political party, which would not otherwise be represented." But even then the calibre of the men selected has been exceptionally high. It is also true that Democratic Presidents have appointed Republicans to the Bench and Republican Presidents have selected Democrats. The men appointed to the Supreme Court are, usually, well advanced in age at the time of their appointment.¹

1. Joseph Story became a member of the Supreme Court at the age of thirty-two and served from 1811 to 1845. Justices James Iredell, Bushrod, Washington and William Johnson were appointed before they were forty years old.

Since Justices do not readily give up office even with the approach of senility, the membership of the Court has often included men past the age when they could carry the share of their work.

One reason for the reluctance of aged Justices to resign from the Court is that they hold office during good behaviour and they can be removed only by impeachment. There has been much criticism of life appointments. By the Act of 1937, Justices of the Supreme Court may retire, without resigning, after 10 continuous years of service and upon reaching the age of 70. The membership of the Supreme Court has been fixed at nine. The Chief Justice receives $25,500 and the Associate Justices $25,000 annually. No Justice of the Supreme Court has been removed by impeachment. Samuel Chase is the only Supreme Court Justice to have been impeached, but he was not convicted.²

FEDERAL JURISDICTION

The jurisdiction of Federal Courts. The powers of the national government being delegated, they are limited. The jurisdiction of the Federal Courts, as such, extends over only those classes of cases as enumerated or implied in the Constitution; the State Courts have jurisdiction over all others. The elaboration of federal jurisdiction may best be taken as contained in Article III of the Constitution.

1. Cases arising under the Constitution, Laws and Treaties. "The judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the law of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority." It means that only cases of a justiciable character can come before the Federal Courts. It cannot decide questions executive or legislative in character unless such a question involves the interpretation of the Federal Constitution, or a federal law, or a treaty in which the United States is a party. Anyone who claims that an executive action or legislative Act encroaches upon his rights guaranteed to him by the Constitution, laws or treaties of the United States, he can bring an action against the appropriate authority for the restoration of his rights. Munro sums up this federal jurisdiction in the statement of the Supreme Court: "The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States is properly commensurate with every right and duty created, declared, or necessarily inspired by and under the Constitution and laws of the United States. [But the right must be a substantial and not merely an incidental one in order to warrant its assertion in the Federal Courts]. It must appear on the record...that the suit is one which does really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy as to a right which depends on the construction of the Constitution or some law or treaty of the United States, before jurisdiction can be maintained."

Congress and the President cannot, therefore, ask the Justices of the Supreme Court to express themselves on the constitutionality of a proposed legislation. The Court is not a advisory body and will not give advisory opinions. It will render its decision only as a real dispute is presented to it for decision. Consequently there must be a party of interest to challenge the constitutionality of law in toto or in part. Nor has Congress powers to assign the Judiciary any duties other than judicial. This was definitely established in 1792 in the Hayburn case. Congress in this instance had instructed Circuit Judges to function as pension Commissioners. The Judges individually refused and the Supreme Court upheld their action.

2. Chase was impeached in 1804 on charges of partisanship. The charges were not supported by the Senate and he was, therefore, acquitted. He remained on the Bench until his death.

2. Cases affecting Ambassadors, other Public Ministers and Consuls.

In the second place, federal jurisdiction extends to all cases affecting diplomats accredited to the United States. But according to the well accepted principle of International Law diplomatic agents of foreign States are immune from prosecution in the Courts of the country to which they are accredited. The provision in the Constitution extending federal jurisdiction to all cases affecting diplomats is intended to check the State Courts from the infringement of International Law. If a diplomatic agent commits an offence, his recall may be requested or he may be even expelled, but so long as he remains a duly accredited diplomat his immunity from legal process is guaranteed.

3. Admiralty Cases.

"Admiralty and maritime" cases relate to American vessels on the high seas or in the navigable waters of the United States and they embrace all cases arising from disputes on freight charges, wages of the seamen, damages due to collision and marine insurance. In time of war, it covers cases relating to prize vessels captured at sea. The reason for giving admiralty jurisdiction to Federal Courts was two-fold. In the first place, admiralty is a distinct branch of jurisprudence and it differs in substance and procedure from the common law and equity applied in ordinary courts of law. Secondly, foreign commerce is a national subject and the framers of the Constitution, accordingly, thought it best to vest admiralty and maritime jurisdiction in the Federal Courts.

4. Cases in which the United States or a State is a Party.

The jurisdiction of the Federal Courts extends over all disputes in which United States is one of the parties, or when the dispute is between two States of the Union or between a State and a citizen of another State. As originally adopted, the Constitution permitted suits to be brought in Federal Courts against a State by citizens of other States, or by citizens of foreign countries.

Soon after the Constitution went into effect a citizen of South Carolina, named Chisholm, sued the State of Georgia (1793) for the recovery of a debt. The Supreme Court entertained the suit and held that such suits can be maintained.³ This decision caused a widespread popular indignation as it had been openly asserted, when the Constitution was before the States for ratification, that no State could be sued by an individual without its own consent. The Government of Georgia felt that it was derogatory to the dignity of a sovereign State and a demand was, accordingly, made that the Constitution be amended so as to prevent such "suits" in future. As a result of this demand, the Eleventh Amendment was adopted in 1798, which expressly forbids the Federal Courts to take cognisance of any suit brought against a State by a citizen of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State. Such suits can only be brought in the courts of the State concerned as permitted by law. If there is no legal authorisation, the courts cannot entertain such suits. But a State can be sued in Federal Courts when the other party is the United States, or another State of the Union or a foreign State.

3. Chisholm v. Georgia.

5. Controversies between Citizens of different States. Finally, the judicial power of the Federal Courts extends to all cases "between citizens of different States;—between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens or subjects." It means that disputes between foreigners and citizens of the foreign States and between citizens of different States are amenable in Federal Courts. For purposes of this article corporation or company is a citizen of the State in which it was incorporated.

Exclusive and Concurrent Jurisdiction. Although the cases mentioned above may come before Federal Courts, the Constitution does not insist that Federal Courts must assume exclusive jurisdiction in all such cases. The Constitution gives the Federal Courts no exclusive jurisdiction whatsoever, Congress is free to distribute jurisdiction over them as it pleases and, indeed, it may completely divest Federal Courts of jurisdiction in some instances. As matters stand, Federal Courts have exclusive jurisdiction over: (1) all cases involving crimes against laws of the United States; (2) all suits for penalties brought under laws of the United States, all suits under admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, or under patent and copyright laws; (3) all bankruptcy proceedings; (4) all civil actions in which the United States or a State is a party, except between a State and its own citizen; and (5) all suits and proceedings brought against ambassadors, others possessing diplomatic immunity, and foreign consuls.

Over practically all other kinds of cases to which the federal judicial power extends, Federal and State courts have concurrent jurisdiction. That is to say, in all such cases, which of necessity are always civil, and involve amounts of $3,000 or more, the plaintiff has the choice to commence it in a Federal Court or, in the Courts of the State to which he belongs, or in the courts of a State where the defendant resides. The defendant is, however, given the privilege of having the case removed to a Federal Court if it has been instituted in a State Court, provided the request is made before the latter has reached a decision.

Federal Courts are denied jurisdiction over cases involving parties with diverse citizenship and are for amounts less than $3,000. These cases must be tried in State Courts, if at all.

Federal Court Writs. In the exercise of national judicial power granted by the Constitution, the Federal Court has the authority to use the writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, injunction and certiorari.

TYPES OF FEDERAL COURTS

There are two general types of courts: Constitutional and legislative.

Constitutional Courts. Constitutional courts are those established by authority of Article III of the Constitution to exercise the judicial power of the United States. They consist of the Supreme Court, Federal Courts of Appeal, and District Courts. The Constitution provides only for the Supreme Court and empowers Congress to ordain and establish the "inferior courts." The establishment of inferior courts is, therefore, not mandatory. They have been created and their jurisdiction is defined by the statutes of Congress starting with the Judiciary Act of 1789. The Congress can, thus, at will abolish the "inferior courts," but not the Supreme Court.

Legislative Courts. Legislative courts are created by Congress and their authority is outside of Article III referred to above. They do not exercise the judicial powers of the United States, but are special courts created to aid the administration of laws enacted by Congress in pursuance of powers delegated to it or implied in such powers. For example, Article I, Section 8, grants to Congress the power to impose and collect "taxes, duties, imposts and excises." In order to decide disputes about the valuation of goods and subject to import duties, Congress established the United States Customs Court composed of nine Judges. Similarly, Congress is given power, as per Article IV, Section 3, to govern territories and has, accordingly, created territorial court systems under that authority. Congress can set rules in regard to patents and has created the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals which handles appeals from the decisions of the United States Patent Office, the Customs Court and the Tariff Commission. There is also a civilian court of Military Appeals to hear appeals from military courts martial.

All these are courts and they follow a judicial procedure. But they have been created under the Congressional power and not under the Judicial Article of the Constitution. The difference between the Constitutional and Legislative Courts, thus, lies in the source of their respective authority and the nature of the cases over which they have jurisdiction. Article II mentions the types of cases and controversies to which the federal judicial power extends and these must all come before Constitutional Courts. Legislative Courts, on the other hand, are created to carry into execution such powers as those of regulating inter-State commerce, spending public funds, laying and collecting import duties, and governing territories.

Yet another difference may be marked between the two. All Judges in the Constitutional Courts are appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate and they hold office during good behaviour. They can be removed from office only by impeachment. Judges in Legislative Courts are similarly appointed, but almost always they serve for fixed terms and can be removed by methods other than impeachment.

In spite of these differences the Legislative Courts are tied into the regular Federal judicial machinery. Appeals may be taken from their decisions to specified courts of the regular system, usually to a Federal Court of Appeals.

In the District of Columbia, Congress has set up a complete system of local courts including a Municipal Court. The District has also a U.S. District Court and a U.S. Court of Appeals. These are based partly on Article III and partly on Article 1 s.s. cl. 17, which authorises Congress to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over the seat of Government of the United States.

CONSTITUTIONAL COURTS

Supreme Court. At the apex is the Supreme Court and is ordained by the Constitution. It was first organised under the judiciary Act of 1789 with the Chief Justice and five associate Justices. Its membership has, however, varied and the present strength of a Chief Justice and eight associate Justices was fixed in 1869 where it has remained ever since.⁴ The Court held its first two terms in Wall Street in New York City. Its next two terms were held at Philadelphia and thereafter it met at Washington.

Justices of the Supreme Court are appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Constitution does not prescribe any qualifications hence the President may appoint anyone for whom Senatorial confirmation can be obtained. Terms of Federal Judges are for life or during good behaviour and they are removable by impeachment only. After reaching the age of seventy they may retire or resign and receive full salary, provided they have served for ten years or more. If they retire, and not resign, they are still Federal Judges and can be given an assignment.⁵ The Chief Justice's salary is $25,500 and the associate Justices get $25,000. Their salaries are fixed by an Act of Congress, and while they can be raised at any time no diminution can be made during the tenure of office of any judge.

The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is both original and appellate. The original jurisdiction, however, is extremely limited and an average of only four or five cases come before the court each year for original trial. The Constitution opens the court to such trials when (1) a foreign ambassador, minister or consul, or (2) one of the states is a party. This jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is the grant of the Constitution itself and the Supreme Court has decided, in the famous Marbury v. Madison case, that Congress can neither increase nor reduce the jurisdiction of the court in this respect. Legislative action, however, has granted concurrent trial power to the District Courts in some of these cases. Under the present Judicial Code the following original cases must be brought to the Supreme Court: (1) cases against foreign ambassadors and ministers, and (2) cases between one of the States and the United States, a foreign State, or another one of the States.

In all other cases the Supreme Court has appellate jurisdiction, both

4. President Roosevelt made an attempt in 1937 to have the membership of the court vary between nine and fifteen depending upon Justices who did not resign at the age of seventy. The plan did not succeed.

5. There has been only one instance of a Supreme Court Justice to have been reappointed after an interim of private life. Justice Charles Evans Hughes was appointed on May 2, 1910, by President Taft. He resigned in 1916 to be Republican candidate for Presidency. On February 13, 1930, he was appointed Chief Justice by President Hoover.

as to law and facts "with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make." In accordance with this provision, Congress has defined in detail the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. At present, cases come to it from State Courts, Federal Courts of Appeals, and, in a few instances, Federal District Courts. The expectation is that the Supreme Court should not devote its time "upon mere settlement of law suits in the manner of an ordinary law court, but rather upon constitutional interpretation and policy, especially in economic and social fields, appeals lacking in this higher interest are likely to encounter no very warm reception."⁶

There are, thus, two general sources from which cases may reach the Supreme Court on appeal:

(a) Cases from the highest State Courts where a federal question is presented—namely, when the State Court has held that a federal law, treaty or executive action violates the Constitution of the United States or has held that the law enacted by the State or the State action is valid under the Constitution and when that finding of the State Court is challenged. The power of the Supreme Court to review State laws is based upon the constitutional provision that the laws made by Congress and treaties concluded by the Federal Government are supreme law of the land and consequently supersede State Constitutions and laws enacted by the State Legislatures. Some of the Court's greatest decisions have been rendered in such cases, where an appeal has been taken to it when a State Court has denied a claim based upon an alleged federal right.

(b) Cases from the lower Federal Courts, chiefly from the Courts of Appeals. But the cases coming to the Supreme Court on this count are insignificant, only one in thirty cases, since final determination has been vested by law in these courts in many types of cases between private individuals. But when a litigant claims that a constitutional right has been denied to him, it is a case for the Supreme Court.

Two special proceedings may also, be noted. The Supreme Court may require a Court of Appeal to transmit a case to it, either before or after decision, when, on a petition of a party to the suit, the Court concludes that the case is of such significance as to make decision by the highest court desirable. A Court of Appeals may also take the initiative of certifying to the Supreme Court questions or propositions of law involved in a case before it require instructions from a superior court to enable it to make a proper decision. The Supreme Court may, on such a reference, merely answer the question or it may require that the whole case be submitted to it for final decision.

Cases in a few instances may go directly from a District Court to the Supreme Court. If a District Court holds a Federal law to be unconstitutional in a case in which the United States is a party or in a case between two private parties in which the United States has been made a "party by intervention," direct appeal goes to the Supreme Court. The Judiciary Act of 1937 permits such direct appeals to the Supreme Court. An occasional case also goes up from one of the special courts.

6. Ogg and Ray, Essentials of American Government, op. cit., p. 351.

The Supreme Court meets on the second Monday in October for a session which generally extends through to July. Special sessions may be called by the Chief Justice when the court is adjourned, but the occasion must be of unusual urgency and importance.⁷ Six Justices constitute a quorum no matter whether the Chief Justice is present or not. When a case has been argued, the court holds a conference where the Justices discuss their views and, then, vote. The Chief Justice usually states his opinion first and other Justices follow him in order of their seniority. The meeting culminates with a vote conducted by the Chief Justice who calls upon his associates in reverse order according to the dates of their commission and himself voting last. If the Chief Justice belongs to the majority opinion, he may request one of his associates to prepare the opinion of the court, or he may prepare it himself, after which it is scrutinised by the Court at a second conference and approved. Any member of the Court who disagrees with the majority may file a dissenting opinion, a right frequently taken advantage of. The concurrence of at least five of the nine Judges is necessary to the validity of a decision⁸ and, as a matter of fact, many important decisions have been rendered by a bare majority of the Court.

The Federal Courts of Appeals. Next below the Supreme Court are Federal Courts of Appeals, known before 1948, as the Circuit Courts of Appeals, 11 in all, one for each of the ten judicial circuits in which the United States is divided and an additional one for the District of Columbia, created in 1948. These courts were created in 1891 to relieve the overburdened Supreme Court of a great deal of its appellate jurisdiction by making many decrees and judgments of the Circuit Courts final. The Chief Justice is assigned by law to the Federal Courts of Appeals of the District of Columbia. The eight associate Justices are distributed by assignment among the other ten circuits. Six of them are assigned to one district and each of the remaining two are assigned to two districts. The requirement of the original Judiciary Act that Justices of the Supreme Court travel on circuit has been repealed and they now only rarely if ever choose to do so. A Court of Appeal must have at least three Judges, two of whom are necessary for a quorum. The number of Judges in each circuit varies from three to nine.

The Federal Courts of Appeals have essentially appellate jurisdiction, that is, they hear and determine only cases appealed from the lower courts, and their decisions are final in most cases except where the law provides for a direct review by the Supreme Court. This relieves the Supreme Court of all but the most important cases and enables it to dispatch its business more promptly. Federal Courts also review and enforce orders of the Legislative Courts, and quasi-judicial boards and commissions. The Supreme Court may call up from a Federal Court any case on a writ of certiorari involving an important constitutional or legal point.

7. In 1942 the court was called to a special session on July 29 to consider a petition for writ of habeas corpus of seven German "saboteurs."

8. There is a difference between opinion and decision. An opinion is the statement of the reasoning by which the Court fortifies a decision in a particular case. The decision is reached by secret vote of the Justices, and the Chief Justice then assigns a Justice the task of writing the opinion.

District Courts. The lowest grade of Federal Courts is the District Court, held in each district and the country is divided into some ninety districts. In some cases a State constitutes one district; in other cases a State is divided into two or three districts which may further be broken into divisions. In each district there must be at least one judge, though in many cases there are several judges for a single district, each holding court separately.

Excepting the few cases which originate* in the Supreme Court, and those of a special character that commence in the Legislative Courts, most other cases, civil and criminal, under the laws of the United States, start in District Courts. Their jurisdiction is original and no case comes to them on appeal, although cases begun in State Courts are occasionally transferred to them. Ordinarily, cases are tried with one judge presiding. Since 1937, three judges must sit in most cases involving the constitutionality of federal statutes. Appeals in such cases may be taken directly to the Supreme Court and it was a part of President Roosevelt's proposal to reorganise the Federal Courts. Otherwise, appeals, as a rule, go first to the appropriate Court of Appeals.

The jurisdiction of the Federal Judiciary may, thus, be summed up:

Supreme Court:

Original Jurisdiction:

1. Actions by the United States against a State.
2. Action by a State against a State.
3. Cases involving ambassadors and other public ministers.
4. Action by a State against citizen of another State or aliens (jurisdiction is not exclusive).

Appellate Jurisdiction:

1. From lower District Courts.
2. From State Courts when a 'federal question' is involved.

11 Courts of Appeals:

Appellate Jurisdiction only:

1. From Federal District Courts.
2. From certain Legislative Courts.
3. From certain great commissions, such as Securities and Exchange Commission.

90 District Courts:

Original Jurisdiction:

1. Over cases of crimes against the United States.
2. Over civil actions by the United States against an individual.
3. Over cases involving citizens of different States.

4. Over actions by a State against an alien or citizen of another State.
5. Over cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.
6. Over such other cases as Congress may validly prescribe.

JUDICIAL REVIEW

The Power of Judicial Review. The Supreme Court is the most powerful judicial agency in the world. Alexis de Tocqueville, writing in 1848, observed, "If I were asked where I placed the American aristocracy, I should reply without hesitation....that it occupies the judicial bench and bar....scarcely any political question arises in the United States that is not resolved sooner or later into a judicial question." Exactly a century later Professor Harold Laski wrote, "The respect in which the Federal Courts and, above all, the Supreme Court are held is hardly surpassed by the influence they exert on the life of the United States."⁹ What accounts for this great influence and prestige of the Supreme Court is its power to interpret the Constitution. Justice Frankfurter put it rather bluntly that "the Supreme Court is the constitution." When Justices interpret the Constitution, they make policy decisions and thereby have the final say over the determination of the social and economic issues that confront the country. They uphold or declare null and void, and consequently of no effect, the acts of Congress or State Legislature or Executive orders which are in conflict with the Constitution. By doing so the Supreme Court becomes the guardian of the constitutional system of the United States.

There is no direct authority in the Constitution which empowers the Supreme Court to declare the constitutionality or otherwise of State or Federal Acts. Some writers, however, hold that the framers of the Constitution did not intend to confer such a power, at least over Federal Acts, upon the courts of the United States and the exercise of authority of holding Federal Acts or orders unconstitutional is the usurpation of power. President Jefferson had unequivocally declared that the "design of the Fathers" was to establish three independent departments of Government and to give the Judiciary the right to review the acts of Congress and the President was not only the violation of the doctrines of the Separation of Powers and limited government, but it was also in violation of the intentions of the makers of the Constitution.

There are others who consider that judicial review is inherent in the nature of written Constitution. There are two important provisions of the Constitution, it is maintained, which are, indicative of the intentions of its framers. One is Article VI, Section 2, which reads, inter alia, "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land...." The second provision is found in Article III, Section 2, which says, "The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under this authority" Both these provisions are sufficient to fill in the gap which the Constitution failed to expressly provide for. The thread of the intention of the framers of the Constitution can be connected with what Hamilton wrote in the Federalist: "The interpretation of the laws is the proper and peculiar province of the courts. A Constitution is, in fact, and must be, regarded by the judges as fundamental law. It must, therefore, belong to them to ascertain its meaning, as well as the meaning of any particular act proceeding from the legislative body. If there should happen to be irreconcilable variance between the two, that which has the superior obligation and validity ought, of course, to be preferred; in other words, the Constitution ought to be preferred to the statute, the intention of the people to the intention of their agents." And as Professor Beard remarks, here is good ground to think that a majority of the members of the Philadelphia Convention favoured judicial review. In fact, it was already in existence in the American States after their break with Britain in 1776. If it was not expressly provided in the Constitution, it was because the framers believed the power to be clearly enough implied in the language used in Articles III and VI referred to above.

9. The American Democracy, p. 110.

Chief Justice Marshall makes the issue clear. Whatever may have been the intention of the framers of the Constitution, the issue was finally decided by Chief Justice Marshall in 1803, in the famous case of Marbury v. Madison and since then judicial review has become a part of the constitutional law, in fact, its very corner-stone. The facts of the case, briefly stated, were that Congress had provided in the Judiciary Act of 1789, that requests for writs of mandamus¹⁰ could be made to and granted by the Supreme Court. On the night of March 3, 1801, Marbury was appointed Justice of Peace for the District of Columbia by President Adams, whose term of office expired before the commission of his appointment could be delivered to Marbury. The new President Jefferson and his Secretary of State, Madison, refused to deliver the commission to Marbury who petitioned to the Supreme Court for a writ of mandamus ordering Madison to deliver the commission. Marshall, in writing the opinion of the Court, held that Marbury was entitled to his commission and that mandamus was a proper remedy in the situation, but the Supreme Court had no authority to issue the writ. The issuance of such a writ, declared Marshall, was in violation of the constitutional provision of Article III as it clearly does not include such writs. The Judiciary Act of 1789, which empowered the Supreme Court to issue writs enlarged the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and Congress was devoid of authority to enlarge its original jurisdiction. Marshall argued that the Justices were bound by oath to support the Constitution, and when they found that one of its provisions was in conflict with the law they must hold the latter repugnant and void.

10. Judicial orders commanding government officials to perform duties required by law.

The argument of Chief Justice Marshall, in brief, was that the Constitution is the supreme law of the land and the Justices are bound to give effect to it. When the Court is called upon to give effect to a statute passed by Congress which is clearly in conflict with the supreme law of the Constitution, it must give preference to the latter, otherwise the declaration of the supremacy of the Constitution would have no meaning. The implications in Chief Justice Marshall's decision may, for purposes of clarity, be summarised as under:—

(1) that the Constitution is a written document that clearly defines and limits the powers of Government;

(2) that the Constitution is a fundamental law and is superior to the ordinary law passed by Congress;

(3) that the Act of Congress which is contrary to and in violation of the fundamental law is void and cannot bind the courts; and

(4) that the judicial power conferred by the Constitution together with the oath to uphold Constitution,¹¹ which the Justices take on the assumption of office, requires that the courts should declare, when they believe, that the Acts of Congress are in violation of the Constitution.

Since Marshall's decision in 1803, the power of the Supreme Court to declare Acts of Congress invalid has been resented, evaded, and attacked, but never overthrown. The principle of judicial review is now firmly embedded in the American System of government and Marbury case forms the basis of this important authority exercised by the Supreme Court. During the first eighty years only in the key case of Marbury v. Madison and in the Dred Scot v. Sandford (1857) a Federal Law was disallowed.¹² Since then about eighty Acts of Congress have been invalidated in part or in their entirety. In most of these cases only part of a statute has been declared void. Only eight or ten statutes have been held unconstitutional in their entirety. Statistically, the incidence of judicial review on Congressional legislation has been extremely slight. State laws have been more frequently the subject of Supreme Court disallowance; over 700 in number.

Laws passed by the State Legislatures, ordinances of municipal councils and even the provisions of the State Constitutions themselves may be declared null and void in case they are in conflict with the national Constitution or the laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof. In 1810 the Supreme Court invalidated a law enacted by the State of Georgia as there was constitutional prohibition on such legislation. In famous case of McCulloch v. Maryland, 1819, the Court upheld the power of the Congress to create a bank and held a Maryland law taxing the operations of the bank to be invalid as an encroachment upon the national jurisdiction. Soon thereafter, the Supreme Court established its national position by its assertion of power to review the decisions of a highest State Court when it was challenged under the United States Constitution; Cohens v. Virginia, 1821. A great majority of cases reaching the Supreme Court now involve the constitutional validity of some State statute or a right, title or privilege under the national Constitution and the State Court having decided against the right or privilege claimed. For example, if a man is prosecuted or convicted under a State law or some provision of a State constitution, he may carry his appeal to the Supreme Court on the ground that his conviction is contrary to some provision in the Federal Constitution or Laws made thereunder. The Supreme Court, then, determines the constitutionality or otherwise of the State law or provision of the Constitution involved. Such a power with the Supreme Court is a necessary consequence of the supremacy of the Federal Constitution and Federal Laws.

11. Without prescribing any specific form, the Constitution requires (Art. VI) all judicial as well as executive officers to take oath to support the Constitution. The wording of this oath were fixed by the Act of 1868.

12. In this case the Supreme Court held that negroes were not citizens of the United States. Chief Justice Taney ruled, such persons were considered as "subordinate and inferior class of beings." The fourteenth Amendment reversed this decision.

The Meaning of Judicial Review. Judicial review is, therefore, the term to describe the power of courts to declare Acts of Legislature of no effect and consequently invalid if they are found to be in conflict with the Constitution. Although the discussion of judicial review concentrates upon the Supreme Court, actually all courts—State and Federal possess this power. A Federal District Court or Court of Appeals and any State courts of record may hold a State or Federal law invalid under the national Constitution and refuse to enforce it. But an appeal can be carried against such a decision to the Supreme Court for final determination. In similar manner, appeals may be taken from executive or administrative actions on the ground that the agency has exceeded its constitutional authority. "In reality, then," writes Harold R. Bruce "Judicial review is a 'rights protecting service' rendered by the Courts—to protect personal rights against legislative and executive action, states' rights against national action, national rights against state action, and the respective rights of executive and legislative bodies—as these various rights are held to exist under the national Constitution. It is a virtual necessity in governments having a written Constitution, federal division of power, agencies of limited powers, and guaranteed personal rights."

Since Marshall's time, the Supreme Court has emphasised repeatedly that it is not concerned with the policy, wisdom or expediency of legislation but only with its constitutionality. In its own words, it "neither approves nor condemns any legislative policy. Its delicate and difficult office is to ascertain and declare whether the legislation is in accordance with, or in contravention of, the provisions of the Constitution; and having done that, its duty ends." In another case the Court said, "Even should we consider the act unwise and unprejudicial to both public and private interests, if it be fairly within delegated power, our obligation is to sustain it."

Although the final judgment in cases of this kind is made by the Supreme Court of the United States, judicial review is a prerogative of all courts from the highest to the lowest. Even a Justice of the Peace may exercise this authority in proper cases, although his decision would certainly be appealed. When a court declares a legislative Act unconstitutional, it means that it cannot be enforced as its inconsistency with the Constitution deprives it of the character of law. But the courts have no power at their disposal to carry out their decrees. It is for the Executive to enforce them and it may be possible for an executive officer to ignore them and this has actually happened in a few cases as, for example, in a famous case in connection with which President Andrew Jackson wrathfully remarked that "John Marshall has made his decision, now let him enforce it." Generally, however, "the prestige of the doctrine is so great that a pronouncement of the Courts is accepted as final even when the act declared unconstitutional is a popular one." As Bryce expressed it, the Supreme Court is "the living voice of the Constitution," and, as such, the country obeys, both by inclination and habit.

Criticism of the power of Judicial Review. Those who have critically studied the power of judicial review contend that as a result of it the Supreme Court has expanded its authority to such an extent that it has become a non-elective super-legislature. The judges while giving their decisions, and in whatever legal dress such decisions are clothed, are, it is maintained, political decisions. The judges do not confine themselves to such legal questions as the limits of Federal or State jurisdiction, or the carrying out of legal regulations which are essential to make due process of law, but they discuss the advisability of legislation, its essential justice, and its conformity to the law of reason. The law of reason and essential justice are what the temperaments, characteristic attitudes, and views of the Justices are. The Justices have their own political, economic and social predilections and to which they very often owe their appointments. The appointments of the Judges are customarily, but not exclusively, partisan. And in interpreting and applying phrases, like "regulate," "commerce," and "due process of law," they "hardly can fail to be swayed consciously or unconsciously by their social philosophies and general outlook on affairs."¹³ Between the Civil War and the New Deal, Republicans were in White House for all but sixteen years. Regardless of party affiliations, most of the Presidents and Senators believed in the policy of complete laissez-faire and looked with suspicion any proposal which restricted the right to economic freedom regarding it "dangerous, socialistic, populistic, and anarchistic." And these were the men who appointed most of the Justices of the Supreme Court. With the appointment of Melville Fuller as Chief Justice in 1888 a new period began in the history of the Supreme Court. Between 1888 and 1937, it became "an aristocracy of the robe and twisted the due process clause into a moat around all forms of private property." It censured and invalidated all kinds of legislation which, in the opinion of the Justices, unreasonably interfered with the use of private property. The Court gave a narrow meaning to the inter-State commerce and, thus, in many ways clipped the powers of Congress. It did not even hesitate to veto all attempts by Congress to forbid child labour.

In 1895, the Supreme Court reversed an old and well-accepted and hitherto practised precedent and made it impossible for the Federal Government to levy income tax. It was a decision of five to four Justices and Justice Field made manifest the feelings of the majority opinion about such experiments. He regarded income-tax as a sheer assault on capital and contended that "it will be but the stepping stone to others, larger and more sweeping, till our political contests will become a war of the poor against the rich, a war constantly growing in intensity and bitterness."¹⁴ When the Supreme Court retarded the manifestation of public opinion by imposing upon the nation its own construction what the social and economic order ought to be, it really assumed the power of a super-legislature but not in its representative capacity. The popular opinion took a political revenge by adopting the Sixteenth Amendment in order to reverse this decision. In the "notorious" Adkins case Justice Sutherland, speaking for the majority, "defined the role of the court," as Brogan says, "in a way that a radical critic could hardly have bettered."¹⁵ And referring to this case Boundin remarked, "the announcement that the court has constituted itself in a super-legislature is perhaps plainer than in any other case."¹⁶ Justice Sutherland had unequivocally asserted that "there are limits to power, and when these have been passed, it becomes the plain duty of the courts, in the proper exercise of their authority, to so declare." Such decisions are, indeed, political in nature, and are not impressive, impartial and worthy of any special respect as the decisions of a court should generally command.

13. Essentials of American Government, op. cit., p. 252.

It may be further said that all such decisions had come forth with five to four majority and if Justice Sutherland is to be relied upon that it was the plain duty of the courts, in the proper exercise of their authority, to declare invalid any exercise of authority which passed beyond the limit, it follows that the four dissenting Justices had always been oblivious of their plain duty. In the Adkins case particularly the minority included the very conservative Chief Justice Taft.

The Supreme Court's assumption of power as a super-legislature has always been contested by a minority of the Justices. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes (1902-32), who spent well over thirty years on the Court, consistently and ceaselessly protested "against his colleague's habit of writing their own economic predilections into the Constitution." Holmes was a conservative with a little faith in social reform in legislation, but he never allowed his personal views become the measure of the constitutionality of legislation and he was, accordingly, in dissent. Louis D. Brandies, too, appointed in 1914, by President Wilson, joined with Holmes in protesting against "the major direction of the Supreme Court's opinions and exposing the reasons behind the reasons of the court's majority." With the coming in of Harlan Fisks Stone, in 1925, "Holmes, Brandies, and Stone dissenting" became a familiar phrase in the law review.

There is yet another aspect of the problem. While interpreting and applying the spirit and language of the Constitution the Justices also decide questions of public policy. When an Act of Congress comes before the Supreme Court, the Justices are, in fact, either accepting or rejecting a policy embodied therein. The policy once rejected by them has no chance of enforcement until a differently constituted Court at some later time takes a different attitude. The Supreme Court is the least responsive to public opinion. "If the Constitution is supreme because it is an expression of the people's ideas then those agents who most directly represent those ideas have the best right to interpret the Constitution." It is, therefore, pertinently asked that why should five men, who constitute the majority of the court, holding office for life and brought to their posts for their strong political, social and economic predilections, have the power to tell Congress and the President, elected by the people, what they may or may not do? The undue partiality and excessive dependence on legal formulas shown by the Supreme Court has seriously retarded progress in the United States.

14. Pollock v. Farmers Loan and Trust Co.

15. The American Political System, op. cit., p. 22.

16. As quoted in Brogan's American Political System, p. 22 f.n.

The claim of Chief Justice Hughes that "we are under a constitution but the Constitution is what the judges say it is" or to express the same what Justice Frankfurter tersely said, "The Supreme Court is the Constitution" is difficult to accept so long as some, at least, of the Justices are keen politicians by training, and are keen enough "to yearn for the Presidency even after they have become Justices of the Supreme Court."¹⁷ It is not, indeed, an exaggeration to say that, at any given time, one or two of the Justices are potential candidates for Presidency. It would not also be out of place and unimportant to mention here that Chief Justice Taft did not "think it incompatible with his high office to act as a personal adviser to Mr. Coolidge throughout his Presidential terms."¹⁸ Chief Justice Hughes and some of his associates, it is alleged, played a considerable part in the defeat of President Roosevelt's Court plan in Congress.¹⁹ When Judges are politicians and become active politicians, the prestige of judiciary does not carry with it the esteem which it should carry as an impartial custodian of the Constitution.

Suggestions for reform. The system of judicial review has, thus, from time to time been violently assailed and many remedies have been suggested. One reform suggested is not to permit invalidation of statutes by mere majorities of the Court or even by the votes.²⁰ The spectacle of important Congressional legislation being overthrown by votes of five to four does not add to the prestige of the Supreme Court. In fact, it adds to the scepticism of "judicial infallibility." It has, therefore, been proposed that an exercise of the power of judicial review should require the concurrence of seven of the nine Justices of the Supreme Court. Such a kind of reform, it is contended, can be accomplished by an Act of Congress. But it is doubtful if the Supreme Court would declare this kind of Act valid. Two other proposals have been suggested. One is to abolish the power of judicial review by constitutional amendment. But this is an impossible task. There has actually been little or no demand for abolishing judicial review, its continuance being assumed even by various schemes for altering the personnel and jurisdiction of the Courts. The second is that Congress may re-pass a law set aside by the Court as it may override a Presidential veto. But

17. Laski, H.J., The American Presidency, p. 68. Justice Charles Evans Hughes was appointed on May 2, 1910, by President Taft. He resigned in 1916 to be a Republican candidate for Presidency. On February 13, 1930, he was appointed Chief Justice by President Hoover.

18. Ibid.

19. See below.

20. In the event of the tie the decision of the inferior court is affirmed.

this, too, would require a constitutional amendment.

The remedies which require a constitutional amendment are not deemed sufficiently efficacious, because of the difficulties of uncertain results and circuitous methods involved therein. It took nearly twenty years for the Sixteenth Amendment to come into effect and, thus, to undo the work of the Supreme Court. It must, however, be added that none of these proposals has evoked popular enthusiasm, and most Americans continue to hold the system of judicial review a desirable feature of the governmental system as obtainable in the United States. "Generally speaking," as Burns and Peltason put it, "Americans have never been willing to put full trust in the majority. An independent judiciary with the power of judicial review has been the major institutional sign of this fear of unchecked legislative and popular majorities."²¹ But how far independent are the judges? We have said much about it, but one more illustration will be instructive in this connection. Chief Justice Taft feared to resign lest the "radical" Hoover be allowed to appoint some one in his place. In 1929 he wrote, "I am older and slower and less acute and more confused. However, as long as things continue as they are, and I am able to answer in my place, I must stay on the Court in order to prevent the Bulsheviki from getting control...."²²

Roosevelt's Proposals. President Franklin Roosevelt's battle with the Supreme Court is a more recent and "more dramatic attempt by a political leader to influence the course of judicial decisions." President Hoover left office in March 1933, in the midst of the great economic depression. On the same date, President Roosevelt entered upon his duties promising a "New Deal" and steer the country out of the economic chaos. Under his leadership Congress passed in quick succession laws of far reaching importance in record breaking time. Haste was justified by the emergency.

By 1935, these measures began to come before the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court declared five of the New Deal statutes unconstitutional during the Court term beginning in October 1935. In all it invalidated, within three years of its battle with the President, twelve New Deal statutes or its provisions thereof. It will be interesting to know something about the composition of the Supreme Court at that stage. Between 1933 to 1937, the Supreme Court consisted of nine judges, all of whom had been appointed before 1933, and except two, McReynolds and Brandies, the rest were appointed by Republican Presidents. Their average age was seventy-two (in 1937), the highest in the Supreme Court history, and it so happened that four (McReynolds, Sutherland, Butler and VanDevanter) of the six, who were over seventy, were "conservatives," while the fifth (Hughes) was a "middle of the roader" and only the sixth (Brandies) a "liberal."²³ On most of the measures which came before the Supreme Court the Justices were divided into two definite blocs: "conservative" and "liberal."

Early in 1937, when the conflict between the President and the

21. Government By the People, op. cit., p. 582.

22. As quoted in above, pp. 583-84.

23. Ferguson and McHenry, The American System of Government, op. cit.

Supreme Court was moving towards its climax, Roosevelt presented to Congress his own programme to reorganise the federal judiciary. The President and the Democratic Party had given no indication of such a reorganisation during the Presidential election campaign. His message to Congress on February 4, 1937, embodying his reorganisation proposals had, therefore, a dramatic effect. The most significant proposal was to give the President the power to appoint an additional Justice for each member of the Court who had served for ten years and who remained in the bench after reaching the age of seventy, provided the maximum number should never exceed fifteen. The object of the proposal was to "rejuvenate" the Supreme Court and to make it more efficient so that it could keep up with its work.

The proposal was defeated in its entirety. The only redeeming feature which emerged out of it was that Congress permitted Supreme Court Justices with ten years of service to retire at seventy with full pay. Although it was a political defeat for Roosevelt, yet, it has been observed that the President "lost his battle but won his war." In 1938, Justice Roberts wrote another majority opinion, this time holding that the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, which also aimed to regulate agriculture, was constitutional. It is true that by the fall of 1937, the "liberals" were clearly in majority in the Supreme Court and by September 1942, only Justices Roberts and Stone remained out of the old lot. But even before any changes could be made in the personnel of the Supreme Court, the Court manifested a change of mind by reversing its previous attitude towards State Minimum Wage Law for women, by re-defining the Commerce clause as to include 'manufacturing,' by upholding the Social Security Act and the Labour Railway Act.

'Modernization' of the Court. The Switching on of Chief Justice Hughes and Justice Roberts, who had up to that time voted with the 'conservative' Justices, indicated the truthfulness of the newly coined political terminology, "A switch in time saved the Nine." Within four years most of that which President Roosevelt had sought to achieve by his proposal to liberalise the court had achieved without changing its structure. Since 1936, only two minor sections of two Federal Laws had been declared unconstitutional. The Court now interprets the Constitution in the light of the social and economic conditions prevailing in the country. It treats the Constitution as a body of living principles and consequently has validated a large expansion in the authority of the centre under the commerce clause and in a new interpretation of the welfare clause. The result is the emerging legislation in the context of a welfare state.

Another significant feature of the Supreme Court's 'modernization' is a substantial change in its regard to precedents. Justices of the old school had adhered to precedents to the point of religious devotion which robbed the Constitution of its adaptability to changing conditions. The new court attitude has freed constitutional interpretation from the restrictions of stare decisis. In 1941 and 1957 the court reversed its previous decisions in child labour and women's minimum wages respectively. The new court attitude is best expressed by Justice Reed. He declared in Eire Railroad Company v. Tompkins (1938), "In this court stare decisis, in statutory construction, is a useful rule. not an inexorable command."

SUGGESTED READINGS

- Beard, C.A. : American Government and Politics, pp. 46, 58, Chap. VIII.
- Beard, C.A. : The Supreme Court and the Constitution.
- Beth, Loren P. : Politics, the Constitution, and the Supreme Court.
- Brogan, D.W. : The American Political System, Part one, Chap. II.
- Carr, R.K. : The Supreme Court and the Judicial Review.
- Corwin, E.S. : Twilight of the Supreme Court.
- Corwin, E.S. : Court over Constitution: A Study of the Judicial Review as an Instrument of Popular Government.
- Cushman, R.E. : The Supreme Court and the Constitution.
- Cushman, R.E. : Ten Years of Supreme Court (1937-47), "American Political Science Review," Vol. XLII (Feb. 1948), pp. 42-67.
- Curtis, Charles, P. : Lions under the Throne.
- Ferguson, J.H., and
McHenry, D.E. : The American System of Government, pp. 63-66, Chap. XVI.
- Freund, P.T. : On Understanding the Supreme Court.
- Harris, R.J. : The Judicial Power of the United States.
- Laski, H.J. : The American Democracy, pp. 73-78, 110-16, 671-73.
- Mendelson, Wallace : Capitalism, Democracy and the Supreme Court.
- Ogg, F.A. and Ray, P.O. : Essentials of American Government, pp. 42-46, Chap. XXIII.
- Pound, Roscoe : Organization of the Court.
- Roberts, O.J. : The Court and the Constitution.
- Rodell, F. : Nine Men; A Political History of the Supreme Court from 1790 to 1955.
- Schlesinger, A.M. : The Supreme Court.
- Swisher, C.B. : The Growth of Constitutional Power in the United States, Chap. IX.
- Warren, Charles : Congress, the Constitution, and the Supreme Court.
- Warren, Charles : The Supreme Court in U.S. History.

CHAPTER VIII

POLITICAL PARTIES

Importance of Political Parties. Political parties are indispensable for the working of a democratic government. Without them, says MacIver, "there can be no unified statement of principle, no orderly evolution of policy, no regular resort to the constitutional device of parliamentary elections nor of course any of the recognised institutions by means of which a party seeks to gain or to maintain power." If there were no parties, politics would be a sheer babel of tongues and the power of the people, termed as popular sovereignty, would dissipate itself into numberless channels and become quite ineffective and futile. A disorganised mass of people can neither formulate principles nor can they agree on policy and the obvious result is complete chaos. Political parties provide necessary leadership and direct reservoir of popular sovereignty. They bring order out of chaos by putting before the people for what they stand and educate them with their programmes. The people approve the programme of a party which they deem best and return it to power. The party returned in majority forms the Government and pursues its programme vigorously. The primary business of a political party is, in brief, to educate the electorate and mould the public opinion, to win elections and to form the government.

Opposition of the Fathers to the Party System. But the men who framed the American Constitution shared the common opinion that political parties were highly detrimental to national solidarity as they encouraged strife, division, chicanery, and personal manipulation. Planning as the Fathers were for the United States as a whole, they sought to provide a mechanism of Government which would be free from all "violence of the faction," as Madison called it. They apprehended that their young republic, too, might meet the fate of the republics of the ancient world and of medieval Italy, if the system of Government they were establishing permitted the growth of factitious spirit. That Philadelphia Convention had, therefore, to transcend party and the device of division of powers and the system of checks and balances were designed, among other objects, to prevent party domination, no matter how noble its purpose be.

Yet, within a few years of the career of the Union Party divisions and party spirit were sufficiently evident. In fact, hardly had Washington taken the oath of office that he noticed the signs of an emerging party split. To give "the fledgling government" a sense of unity and to rise above faction and party, Washington included both Alexander Hamilton, the leading Federalist, and Thomas Jefferson, the most influential Anti-federalist, in his Cabinet. But Jefferson resigned as Secretary of State in Washington's second administration to devote full time to the job of welding together a great party following. Washington deplored the emerging state of affairs and in his Farewell Address he warned his countrymen against "the common and continuous mischief of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it. It serves always to distract the public councils and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms, kindles the animosity of one part against another...." But Washington was no political philosopher and he did not see the inevitability of partisanship. In the Presidential election of 1796, the third under the Union and the first in which Washington was not a candidate, there were two national parties, one supporting John Adams and the other supporting Thomas Jefferson. By 1800 the party system had settled itself quite firmly in the government, even to the extent of necessitating the addition of the Twelfth Amendment so as to make the electoral college method workable.

It scarcely need be added that since that time political parties have played a very vigorous role in the United States. Sometimes they have been more vigorous than others. National emergency may cause their temporary eclipse or an independent President may be able to transcend them for a time, but the party system has never received a setback. It has grown from generation to generation, and today this extra-constitutional growth forms the hub of the political life of the nation. "But for the appearance of a national party system," as Professor Brogan realistically points out, "the election of a President really enough of a national figure to carry out his duties, might have been impossible. And it is certain that the greatest breakdown of the American constitutional system, the Civil War, came only when the party system collapsed."

The basis of American Party System. It is important to remember that the basis of the American party system is not the same with which we traditionally associate political parties. "American parties have never been bodies of men united on some general principles of government and united to put these principles into concrete form by legislation and administration." The line of division in the Philadelphia Convention was between large and small States with the slavery issue looming large in the background. It was in interests and reactions of an economic and sectional nature that the parties started on their career in the early years of the republic. The Federalist party relied upon the commercial, financial and industrial elements of the New England and the Middle States, whereas the backbone of Jefferson's Republican Party were agrarian interests, planters and farmers, of the South and rural North.

Both Hamilton and Jefferson were genuinely prompted by their keen desire to build a strong, vigorous and free nation and they concentrated their best energies in achieving that virtuous purpose. But "each had a distinctive road to strength, vigour and freedom." Hamilton believed in a strong Federal Government and he attempted to build it, enjoying an advantageous position as Washington's Secretary of the Treasury, on real and sound financial basis. He caused the national bank to be founded, passed excise taxes and extended in general the authority of the national government within the framework of the Constitution in order to make the people of the United States feel that they really made a nation, and the national government represented the nation; it was no confederation of States.

Thomas Jefferson took a serious objection to Hamilton's methods and there was a rift in the Cabinet. Jefferson resigned and devoted his political talents to building a party to combat "Hamiltonians," as Hamilton and his followers came to be nicknamed. Jefferson's irritation was that all the measures of the government were directed to strengthen the mercantile class without any consideration of the interests of the yeomanry. Devoted as he was to the ideal of an agrarian democracy, he concluded that the whole Federalist programme would result into the creation of an oligarchy, the rule of the propertied few in the interests of a propertied few. He could think, of no other means to remedy it except to plead for State rights and a narrow construction of the constitutional powers of the Central Government.

It may appear rather confusing that Jackson, Polk, Cleveland, Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt differed from the founder of their party and depended on the extension of the authority of the national government and a broad interpretation of the Constitution. But Jefferson's attitude of mind cannot be divorced from the context of the "extra-political conditions of the early days. The lack of communications, the provincial values, the absence of a national spirit and of an identity of the people with the new nation, all these factors retarded the growth of national sentiments and the Central Government being regarded as the custodian of the interests of the nation. Jefferson consequently felt that only by reserving a great body of rights solely to the States could mean protection of the interests of the people. "There was, therefore, no essential contradiction in his historic position as the founder of the Democratic Party and his overt defence of State rights against national encroachment."²

The two great American parties were and are combination of interests and their strength is local. Roughly speaking, United States may today be divided into four groups. The manufacturing North-Eastern group is in the main Republican; the agricultural south is overwhelmingly Democratic. The support of the central farming States is sought by both the parties. Another development of the present century is the political importance of the still mainly agricultural and grazing but rapidly industrialising West. It is the constant endeavour of both the parties to go beyond their citadels of strength and secure the support of either of the two uncertain groups, or preferably both. These two groups are, in fact, the determining factors of Presidential and Congressional majorities and to enable the Republicans and the Democrats to bank upon their support means a high degree of political organization. But so long as North remains Republican and South Democratic, locality will continue to embrace the party politics of the country.

The two-party system. Throughout its history, the United States had, barring a few minor parties, two major political parties. Various explanations for such a development have been offered. First, it is maintained that the people belonging to the English speaking countries are less doctrinaire and more inclined to compromise. Second, the problems of race, nationality and religion are not so prominent to divide them into different factions as compared with Continental countries of Europe. Third, the two-party system is a legacy of the colonial regime and it has since then perpetuated. Fourth, the two-party system is the consequence of the American voting system, especially the electoral college and the single member district plan of electing legislative representatives. It is, no doubt, true that the electoral method of electing the President would be very undemocratic if a strong third party should emerge. If no majority is won in the electoral colleges, the House of Representatives elects the Chief Executive head of the State from the highest three, each State casting one vote. The single member district scheme of electing representatives also discourages the development of minor parties.

2. Tourtellot, A.B., An Anatomy of American Politics, op. cit., p. 168.

Two-party system has certain important results. Under the parliamentary system of government, one party which carries the mandate of the electorate forms the government and with its legislative majority has the power to carry out that mandate. But under the Presidential system of government, the separation of powers, upon which hinges the framework of government, may occasionally create conditions of deadlock between the executive and legislative departments though normally it results in a situation where the President has a Congressional majority of his own party. In the event of joint congressional majority being of one party and the President of another, the nation suffers because of the friction and critical role which both play. During the last two years of Truman's first administration, the Republican Congress enacted legislation not liked by the President and President Truman spent a good deal of time criticising it. At the same time, the President was conducting the government through the execution of his constitutional and statutory functions and Congress spent a good deal of time criticising him. A more piquant situation arises when the Senate is of one party and the House of Representatives of another and the President necessarily divided in his attitude towards Congress.

Under the two-party system the parties become moderate and compromising bodies highly sensitive of their responsibility. Each party endeavours to rally round as many interests as it possibly can to win power. And as each party is at all times either the government or the opposition it remains in touch with realities and can ill-afford to make wild and irresponsible statements of policy. Finally, multiple party system would make continued functioning of the electoral college virtually impossible.

Third parties. It does not, however, mean that minor parties have never existed in the United States. From early times, dissatisfied elements have launched "third" parties; totalling at least a score. But the one redeeming feature is that third parties have come and gone and during the last 150 years none except the Republican Party has ever gained sufficient strength to displace an existing major party. Several times minor party candidates for the Presidency "have polled sufficient votes to hold the balance of power between the two majors, but they have been unable to keep their separate identity or strength for long." On six different occasions since Civil War, third parties have played respectable results and the most recent one was that of Robert M. La Follette, the progressive candidate for Presidency in 1924, who polled $4\frac{1}{2}$ million votes.

The role of the minor parties in American politics cannot be discounted. They are generally the innovators of policy, if not holders of office. "The old parties have not hesitated to take plank after plank from Populists, Greenbackers, Socialists, and Progressives and instal them in their own platforms." Minor parties are almost invariably radical than the old line organisations and much of what these left-wing parties advocated two or three decades ago may be found in the Democratic and Republican platforms of today. There may not be a future for the third parties in the United States, but those who promote them have the satisfaction to see their programmes for which they worked become the law of the land under the auspices of old parties.

HISTORY OF AMERICAN PARTIES

(1) The Democratic Party. The Democratic Party is now a century and a half old and was established under the leadership of Thomas Jefferson during Washington's administration. Known under various names, including Anti-federalists, Republicans, Democratic Republicans, and Democratic, the party has survived under the most difficult circumstances. Early in history it took a stand against protected tariffs, ship subsidies, imperialism, and the extension of the powers of the national government through "constructions" of the constitution. Its historic centre of gravity was long in the agricultural interests of the country although a large proportion of importing merchants and urban mechanics were soon brought into its fold. After the extinction of the Federalist Party around 1816, the Democratic Party enjoyed a period of virtual political supremacy. During the Jacksonian era, however, considerable split appeared and the party now known as Democratic soon faced a formidable Whig opponent. It receded to opposition after the Civil War and continued a minority for decades together, but at intervals spirited up with vigour in Congress and captured the Presidency twice with Cleveland, twice with Woodrow Wilson, and four times with Franklin D. Roosevelt. Kennedy occupied the White House with a comfortable Congressional majority of his Party and Lyndon Johnson in the 1964 elections secured the biggest popular majority in United States history. A noticeable trend is that a greater proportion of young and new votes support democratic candidates than support Republican candidates. It is also apparent that the more education a person has the more likely he is to support Republican candidates.

(2) The Republican Party. The Republican Party of today is in essence the successor of two earlier major parties. The Federalist Party led by Hamilton, which had championed strong national government and a liberal construction of the Constitution, had expired after making tactical errors during the War of 1812. It appeared first as National Republican and then Whig during Jackson's time. The Republican Party was founded in 1854 and nominated John C. Fremont as Presidential candidate in 1856, and took a strong stand on slavery. Fremont lost to a Democratic coalition still strong enough to win. Four years later Lincoln gained victory on a Republican platform that proposed abolition of slavery and favoured internal improvements including a "satisfactory homestead measure for farmers," and "liberal wages for working men and mechanics." From 1860 down to 1913, it controlled the executive department of government continuously with exception of eight years when Grover Cleveland was President (1885—1889; 1893—1897). It was, however, not a smooth sailing for the party. It suffered from the exposure of the corruption during Grant's administration. It was also shaken by internal divisions "between East and West, between conservative businessmen and not-so-conservative farmers and workers, between reform-minded Liberal Republicans and stand-patters, between party regulars (Stalwarts) and party independents (Half breeds), and between many different combinations of these." In spite of these divisions and shakings, the party could stand abreast and succeed, "because by design or by chance" its leaders "could assuage the different elements." William McKinley saved the party from collapse when important labour and rural elements were on the verge of deserting the party towards the end of the century. When in the following years reformists against the conservatism of the party policy, Theodore Roosevelt, a progressive Republican, reoriented the party's appeal.

The Party has stood for a liberal interpretation of the Constitution, especially those parts relating to the powers of the national government, it has shown less sympathy than the Democratic Party for the rights of the States. It is the champion of the protective tariffs, of internal improvements under federal auspices, of colonial expansion, liberal pensions for veterans, subventions for the merchant marine, Negro suffrage, and gold monetary standard.

Party decentralization. One of the most significant features of the American political parties is their decentralization. Although the Republican and the Democratic parties are two national parties, much of the power in the party system is concentrated in the State capitals and rooted organizationally in the county and municipal levels. Apart from the selection of Presidential and Vice-Presidential nominees and the preparation of national platform, the party's central agencies are virtually powerless. Control remains with the State and local leadership in conducting the campaign and in deciding upon candidates for office. "A sense of discipline to higher authority is almost unknown, and, if pressed, doubtless would be met by indignation and resistance on the part of the local units concerned."³ Professor Key says that the national party is little more than a "gathering of sovereign (or their emissaries) to negotiate and treat with each other."⁴

There is, however, evidence of a counter trend in the direction of a greater concentration of power and this is essentially due to the centripetal tendencies of modern government. This is a universal phenomenon and American party system cannot escape therefrom. For example, the Presidential party increasingly has come to be identified as national in outlook no matter whether the occupant of the White House is a Republican or a Democrat. On the other hand, localism still remains strong in the Congressional party. The result is a wide gap between the President and Congress in the formulation of policy. But the reality is otherwise. The two wings of the party are not so sharply divided due to the "nationalisation" of politics and if this process continues the sectionalism is sure to disappear from the American party system.

3. Barkar, Benjamin and Fiedelbaum, Stanley, H., Government in the United States, p. 147.

4. Key, V.O., Politics, Parties and Pressure Groups, p. 263.

Party divisions no longer clear cut. Another important characteristic of the American parties is their reluctance to become tied to any rigid ideological doctrine. The party division is rather blurred and no distinct line of demarcation can be drawn to separate their programmes. Agriculture is not now the predominant occupation of the Americans, and the greater part of the annual wealth does not come from the soil. Large sections of the Middle West and the South, once the strongholds of agrarian democracy, have become industrialised and, accordingly, there is a corresponding change in the attitude of the people. Their needs have also changed and so they look towards government with changed spectacles. Then, the interests of industry, trade and agriculture overlap and dovetail in many ways. There can be no divorce between them. Within industry itself there is a sharp difference and different points of views are put forward to remedy their disabilities. For example, automobile and allied industries are not inclined to protective tariffs; investors of capital abroad and bankers favour low tariffs.

These complexities in the economic life of the country have made the Democrats to shift to new grounds. They have abandoned their old slogan of "tariff for revenue only" and stand for protection, if somewhat modified by reciprocal trade agreements. The Republicans, too, extend considerable support to this programme. The result is, as Professor Beard says, "that the cleavage between the right and left wings of each is greater than the gulf between the parties themselves, especially in the Senate where agrarian States have a disproportionate weight."

Lord Bryce after a deep study of the American party system maintained, "the great parties were like two bottles. Each bore a label denoting the kind of liquor it contained, but both were empty." It is not true, according to Beard, "that the two parties are exactly identical except as to their labels."⁵ There are two important facts to be observed in this connection. The first is, loyalty to tradition which makes the strongholds of both the parties to continue in their support to the parties concerned. Secondly, the old sentiments and opinions still determine the attitude of different interests and, as such, characterise the divisions among the voters. This can be illustrated by a sample poll taken by the American Institute of Public Opinion in December 1940 and cited by Professor Charles Beard. According to this sample poll the Democratic candidate, President Roosevelt, "received 28 per cent of the votes in the upper income group of citizens, 53 per cent in the middle income group, and 69 per cent in the lower income group; while his Republican opponent, Wendell Wilkie, received 72 per cent of the votes in the upper group, 47 per cent in the middle group, and 31 per cent in the lower group." A similar poll was again taken in 1943 and identical results were obtained except for some minor changes in the percentages.

5. American Government and Politics, op. cit., p. 67.

6. Ibid., p. 68.

To sum up, both the major parties in the United States are deep rooted in capitalism. The only difference between the two is that the Republicans think that the more government leaves capitalism alone the more it flourishes. The Democrats maintain that unless capitalism is constantly adjusted to social, technological and economic changes, it may perish of its own inflexibility. In international politics the Democrats play the "strange role of the party of nationalism, strong armies and navies, international intervention and war, leaving to the Republicans—at any rate for the time being—the less glamorous and rather unfamiliar role of advocating caution, restraint and even isolationism."

SUGGESTED READINGS

- | | |
|--|---|
| Beard, C.A. | : American Government and Politics , Chap. III. |
| Bone, H.A. | : American Politics and System , Chaps. I—X. |
| Brogan, D.W. | : An Introduction to American Politics , Chaps. II—V. |
| Brogan, D.W. | : The American Political System , Part Two, Chaps. I—IV. |
| Bruce, H.R. | : American Parties and Politics . |
| Mackenzie, C.W. | : Party Government in the United States . |
| Merriam, S.E., and
Gosnell, H.F. | : The American Party System . |
| Penniman, H.R. | : American Parties and Elections . |
| Rohlfing, C.C. and
Charlesworth, J.C. | : Parties and Politics . |
| Stannard, H. | : The Two Constitutions , Chap. VI. |
| Tourtellot, A.B. | : The Anatomy of American Politics , Chaps. V—VIII. |
| Zink, H. | : A Survey of American Government , Chaps. VIII—XI. |

CHAPTER I

NATURE AND CONTENT OF THE CONSTITUTION

Historical background. Canada, which today has an area of 3,845,000 square miles and a population of about 15 millions out of which more than 3 millions are French originally, was founded in 1608 by the French Colonists. The Seven Years' War between the French and the English had its repercussions in Canada too. General Wolfe, Commander of the British Forces in North America, conquered Quebec in September of 1759, and Montreal a year later. As a result of the Treaty of Paris, 1763, France recognized the cessation of Canada to Britain. The Treaty, however, provided that "His Britannic Majesty, on his part, agrees to grant the liberty of the Catholic religion to the inhabitants of Canada."

The King of Britain thereafter appointed a Governor to rule Canada on his behalf. He was assisted by a Council and an assembly. But complications soon arose because of the heavy influx of British immigrants. Parliament passed an Act in 1774 which aimed to remove the grievances and disabilities of the Roman Catholics. But the situation again worsened when a large number of loyalists from America, immediately after the declaration of Independence by the thirteen Colonies, entered and settled in Canada. Parliament thereupon passed the Constitution Act, 1791, which divided Canada into two Provinces, the Upper Canada with a British majority, and the Lower Canada with a French majority. Each Province had its own Council and Assembly, the former nominated and hereditary and the latter was elective. The Governor was independent of the legislature and he received instructions from the Colonial Office in London. But even this system of administration did not remedy the situation. In Lower Canada the British dominated in the Council whereas the French were in majority in the Assembly. This resulted into unceasing deadlocks between the two Chambers and the irresponsible executive and the representative Assembly. The racial and religious controversy, French versus English became unmanageable. Papineau, the leader of the French, declared an open revolt against the King of England. The rebellion was suppressed and Papineau fled, "but the smouldering embers of discontent were not finally extinguished." In Upper Canada, too, things were not running smooth. The British majority there could not reconcile itself with an irresponsible and irresponsible executive and clamoured for popular control over the administration.

The British Government suspended the Constitutional Act and sent Lord Durham to Canada with full administrative authority. Lord Durham went deep into the problems of Canada and after two years of his stay submitted to the British Government his report which is eminently known as the Durham Report. The Durham Report constituted a land-much in British Constitutional history as it set a political way for Canada. Lord Durham recommended, inter alia, that establishment of responsible government could alone bring the English and the French to an enduring national integration. Parliament passed an Act in July 1840 uniting the Upper and Lower Canada. For two decades the system of government thus established functioned no doubt, but new problems emerged which finally necessitated the union of all the colonies in North America in a federal policy.

The Birth of a Dominion. The four Colonies which in 1867 became the Federated Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were little more than scanty pockets of settlement, subsisting in forests, farms, fisheries, industries and localised manufacture. They possessed only three cities—Quebec, Montreal and Toronto—with more than 30,000 inhabitants, and a little more than 12 per cent of the people lived in towns with a population of over 5,000. There were a variety of conditions which favoured the union of these struggling Colonies and the potentially hostile political bodies. At the Montreal Inter-Provincial banquet of 1861, Joseph Howe maintained, in the after-dinner speech, that if public men of the various colonies could only get together as were then doing, they would discover what excellent fellows they all were and the barriers between them would soon go down. Here were the germs of the second political miracle occurring on the North American Continent, the first having occurred when thirteen States united to form the United States of America.

The idea of a union of the Colonies in the British North America dates back to the time of the American colonies winning their independence. But the co-operating circumstances which would have resulted into the materialisation of such ideas never took place. Lord Durham, while favouring a union, wrote in his famous Report, "I found two nations warring in the bosom of a single state; I found a struggle, not of principles, but of races; and I perceived that it would be idle to attempt any unification of laws or institutions until we could first succeed in terminating the deadly animosity that now separates Lower Canada into the hostile divisions of French and English." The situation was no better in other Provinces and to the situation in Lower Canada were added all the problems and difficulties that were found in the other colonies as well.

The two major recommendations of the Durham Report were the re-union of Upper and Lower Canada and the immediate grant of responsible government. Lord Durham had considered that only union between the two Canadas could eliminate the radical conflict in Lower Canada and, thus, make it possible for responsible government to function effectively. But the separate cultures of the two peoples complicated the working of responsible government and created endless frictions which resulted in political deadlock, sudden ministerial changes, and general instability. The demand in Upper Canada for representation according to the numbers threatened to upset the political balance. The French in Lower Canada, which was less populous, feared it as an attempt to destroy their separate culture and concluded that they could survive only as a distinct community within the framework of a true federation. Federation, they considered, was the best possible solution of harmonizing the diverse cultural groups in a larger political unit. Professor Alexander Broad sums up cogently the circumstances that helped the birth of a federation. He says, "it was a means of preserving their identity; for other colonies it was an escape from colonial inferiority to self-government in a generous national plane, with an ever-widening horizon of expansion."

Economic problems also played a divided Canada. The repeal of the Navigation Laws and the abandonment of the protectionist tariffs in the forties and fifties gave a new and combining impetus to the personal for union. Economic embargos were apprehended by all to become more acute with the expiration of the Reciprocity Treaty with the United States as it would result into serious loss of markets for the Canadian producers. The only solution of these and other difficulties following in their wake was enlargement of political and economic boundaries where all Canadians in union with each other "strengthen their position as best as they might in a highly dispersive and competitive world." Defence was no less important. The many ill-effects from the United States "and a shadow over all the colonies; the bellicose statements of many American politicians; the exceptional military power of the country engaged in a prolonged civil war; the danger frequently apparent of becoming embroiled in war through British American quarrels; and the threat to the colony of Canada, although this in a sense was a common threat also, of having the United States isolate the whole north-eastern corner of North America from the remainder of the continent by taking possession of all empty western territory."

Finally, the pre-federation period was a time of great economic upheaval which disturbed the economies of all the Colonies. With their limited resources and undeveloped means of communications and transport the colonies could not adjust themselves to the new technological and industrial needs. "The shift from wood to iron," says Prof. Creighton, "from water-power to steam heat became virtually an accomplished fact. All these changes fell with jarring force upon provincial economies which were unprepared to contain the tremendous and expensive adjustments involved."

The cumulative effect of all these circumstances was that the Canadian federation became a matter of practical politics in the spring of 1864, when Dr. Charles Tupper, the Prime Minister of Nova Scotia, introduced a resolution in its provincial legislature for the appointment of delegates "to confer with delegates who may be appointed by the Governments of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island for the purpose of considering the subject of the union of the three provinces under one Government and Legislature." The Nova Scotia legislature unanimously endorsed Tupper's resolution, and similar resolutions were passed by the legislatures of the two Maritime Colonies, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. A conference was called to meet at Charlottetown on September 1, 1864. On June 30, a new coalition government was formed in the Province of Canada which pledged to use its best efforts to bring about federation in the British North American Colonies. The proposed Charlottetown conference was considered propitious by the Canadian Government and at the request of his Cabinet, Lord Monck entered into communication with the Lieutenant-Governors of the Maritime Colonies and asked if a Canadian delegation might join the conference and participate in its deliberations. The request was granted and eight Canadian Ministers, including MacDonald, Brown Carter, and Galt, joined the conference. Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island sent five delegates each, making a total of twenty-three delegates in all.

The conference met as scheduled. The Canadian representatives put forward their proposals for a comprehensive union of all the Colonies. The delegates from the Maritime colonies proceeded to the separate consideration of the proposals to which their respective legislatures had agreed and authorised them to confer. But it became soon apparent that the union among themselves could not hope for success. Federation was the only feasible plan and the delegates reached a decision that a formal conference of all the delegations, including New Foundland, should re-assemble at Quebec in October.

On October 10, 1864, there assembled at Quebec one of the most epoch-making conferences in the Canadian history. Canada had its twelve delegates. New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island seven each, Nova Scotia five, and New Foundland two in all thirty-three. The fundamental principle accepted at Charlottetown was endorsed unreservedly at Quebec, that is, that the new government should be a federation. In less than eighteen days seventy-two resolutions were agreed on, which practically became the subsequent North America Act of 1867. These resolutions were approved by the Parliament of Canada, but met with considerable opposition in the Maritime Provinces. This led to the convening of a conference by the British Government in London consisting of the representatives of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Canada. The outcome was the passage of the British North America Act of 1867, which received royal assent on March 29, and was proclaimed on May 22, and came into effect on July 1.

Thus, on July 1, 1867, came into being the Dominion of Canada consisting of four Provinces—Ontario, Quebec (United Canada redivided), New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia. The Queen was given power, on the advice of the Privy Council and on the addresses from the Parliament of Canada and the respective legislatures of New Foundland, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, to admit the remaining colonies or any of them into the Dominion, and with the same advice she was given power to admit Rupert's Land and North-Western territory on address from Parliament of Canada. Rupert's Land and North-western territory were, accordingly, admitted in 1870. The Province of Manitoba was admitted at the same time, and in the following year came in British Columbia. Prince Edward Island was admitted two years later in 1873. In 1905 two Dominion statutes transferred a large block of the western territory into the Provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. Finally, in 1949, New Foundland became the tenth Province of the Dominion of Canada.

Nature of the Canadian Federalism. Canada is now made up of ten constituent units, called the Provinces: the two Canadas (now Ontario and Quebec), the three Maritime Provinces (New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island), the four Western Provinces (Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and British Columbia), and New Foundland and several territories, known as the Yukon Territory and the North-west Territories, which are not included in any of the Provinces.

The Canadian Constitution—the British North America Act, 1867, and certain subsequent amending Acts—present certain definite federal characteristics. First, it divides the powers between the Dominion and Provincial Governments by giving the latter exclusive legislative control over a list of enumerated subjects. The Dominion has exclusive legislative control over the rest, which “for greater clarity,” as the British North America Act states, have also been enumerated, though not exhaustively. Secondly, Governments of the Dominion and the Provinces are distinct in personnel from each other and neither has the power to alter the Constitution so far as the distribution of subjects is concerned. The Constitution-changing power rests with the British Parliament. Finally, the Canadian Courts can declare Dominion or Provincial laws void on the ground that they transgress the jurisdiction assigned to the respective governments by the Constitution. This establishes the supremacy of the Constitution.

But the Fathers of the Canadian Constitution were not wedded to the narrow ideas of federalism and they did not follow the path carved out by the framers of the American Constitution. The United States had been engaged from the days of Jefferson in the long and bitter controversy over rights and powers of the States which culminated in the tragic Civil War. Canadian leaders had the opportunity to become wiser from the experience of their neighbours. The majority of the delegates assembled at the Quebec conference had the abiding conviction that the outstanding lesson to be learnt from the menacing circumstances of the American Republic was the necessity of strengthening the centripetal forces in a federation, which they proposed to set up. The best way, they decided, was to give a few enumerated subjects of jurisdiction to the constituent units and leave the residue for the Central Government. “The true principle of confederation,” asserted Sir John MacDonald, “lay in giving to the Central Government all the principles and powers of sovereignty, and that the subordinate or individual states should have no powers but those expressly bestowed on them. We should, thus, have a powerful Central Government, a powerful Central Legislature, and a decentralised system of minor legislatures for local purposes.” At another occasion MacDonald confidently claimed that, “Here, we have adopted a different system. We have strengthened the Central Government. We have given the Central Legislature all the great subjects of legislation. We have thus avoided that great source of weakness which has been the cause of the disruption of the United States.” The distribution of powers in the Canadian Constitution was, thus, in vast contrast to that of the American Constitution and it was directly the result of the events that followed the inauguration of the federation culminating into the Civil War. The Canadians strived to be wiser from the experience gained from the neighbouring country and avoided all possibilities to plague their own.

Being determined to possess a strong central government, the Canadian Fathers built up the authority of the Dominion in a number of other ways:

(1) The enumerated powers given to the Provinces constituted a moderate list containing subjects essentially of a local nature. Some powers which in the United States had been left with the States, such as criminal law, marriage, and divorce, were given in the Canadian Constitution to the Dominion.

(2) All powers not explicitly given to the Provinces were granted to the Dominion. The United States' Constitution allotted certain enumerated powers to the national government and reserved the rest for the States. The Tenth Amendment clearly stated that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or the people." The Quebec Conference decided to follow the other course and passed on the residue to the Dominion. And to make the matter quite clear, after enumerating a long list of powers which were explicitly placed under the Dominion jurisdiction, Section 91 of the British North America Act empowered the national Parliament "to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the Provinces." This is an all-embracing clause which enables the Dominion Parliament to make laws even on subjects which are within competence of the Provinces on the plea that they effected the peace, order and good government of Canada.

(3) The Dominion Government was given the power to disallow any law passed by a Provincial legislature within a year of its passage.

(4) The Dominion Government possessed the power of appointing and removing the Lieutenant-Governor in each Province. It could also instruct the Lieutenant-Governor to withhold his assent to Provincial Bills or reserve them for the consideration by the Governor-General. The Governor-General might refuse assent to such reserved Bills if he thought fit.

(5) All important judicial appointments in the Provinces were vested in the Dominion Government.

(6) The members of the Senate were nominated by the Dominion Government and the Chamber did not provide equal representation to the Provinces, big and small. The Senate was not, accordingly, like its namesake in the United States, wholly or mainly protective of Provincial interests.

The Canadian federation was, thus, intended by its architects to depart radically from the federal principle which divides and distributes powers between a Central Government and Governments of the units, and accepts both sets of governments within their respective spheres of jurisdiction as co-ordinate and independent. The most essential characteristic of a Federal Government is that neither the Central Government nor the regional governments can render the one helplessly dependent upon the other for its existence or proper functioning. But the Canadian Provinces were desired to be inferior bodies "possessing little more prestige and authority," as Dawson says, "than inflated municipalities." In the discussions at the Quebec Conference Provincial legislatures were repeatedly described as "subordinate," "minor," and "inferior" bodies. Speaking on the Quebec Resolution in Parliament of Canada on February 6, 1865, MacDonald said "We...strengthen the Central Parliament and make the confederation one people and one government, instead of five peoples and five governments, with merely a point of authority connecting us to a limited and insufficient extent...this is to be one United Province with the local governments and legislatures subordinate to the general government and legislature." The amplification of this point by Dr. Charles Tupper is yet more blunt. He said "we propose to preserve the Local Governments in the Lower Provinces because we have not municipal institutions." But he was also careful to state that "while we should diminish the powers of Local Governments we must not stock too largely the prejudices of the people in that respect." Thus, it was the definite intention of the Constitution-makers to make the Provincial Governments in Canada subordinate to the Central Government and not co-ordinate with it. Their purpose was not to repeat the events that had happened in the United States of America. Whatever the intentions of the Founding fathers, it must be admitted that they defeated the purpose of a federal polity.

The powers of disallowance and veto further rendered the Provinces helplessly dependent upon the Central Government. The British North America Act empowered the Dominion Government to prevent the Provincial legislature from making laws upon its own allotted subject, if the Dominion Government happened to disapprove the policy involved in such laws. In Re-Disallowance and Reservation (1938) the Supreme Court of Canada held that the Dominion Government's powers of disallowance and veto are unrestricted in law and extend to all kinds of legislation, financial and ordinary. This is tantamount to placing the Provincial Governments entirely on the mercy of the Dominion Government.

All these are unitary elements and Professor Wheare, a renowned authority on federalism, tersely puts it, "Could there be a more powerful weapon for centralising and unifying the government than this?"¹ Prof. Wheare, then, examines the controversial question whether Canada has a unitary or federal type of government. His conclusion is that in spite of these unitary elements, "the federal principle is not completely ousted" from the Canadian Constitution; it does find a place there and an important place. "Yet if we confer ourselves to the strict law of the constitution," he adds, "it is hard to know whether we should call it a Federal Constitution with considerable unitary modifications, or a unitary constitution, with considerable federal modifications. It would be straining the federal principle too far, I think, to describe it as a Federal Constitution, without adding any qualifying phrase. For this reason I prefer to say that Canada has a quasi-federal Constitution."²

1. Wheare, K.C., Federal Government, p. 20.

2. Ibid.

But Professor Kennedy, another renowned scholar, categorically says that "Canada is a federation in essence." His conclusions are based upon a series of legal decisions, and he reduces them into four:

(1) The Dominion Parliament is not a delegation from the British Parliament or from the Provinces. It has full and complete powers over its sphere of jurisdiction;

(2) The Provincial Legislatures are not delegation from the British Parliament. Their authority is plenary within the limits prescribed by the Constitution and, as held in Hodge v. The Queen within the sphere so prescribed "the local legislature is supreme and has the same authority as the Imperial Parliament or the Parliament of the Dominion;

(3) The Provincial Legislatures are not delegations from the Dominion Parliament and their status is in no way analogous to municipal bodies. In the liquidators of the Maritime Bank of Canada v. The Receiver-General of New Brunswick, Lord Watson declared that "The Act of 1867...nowhere professes to curtail in any respect the rights and privileges of the Crown or to disturb the relations then subsisting between the sovereign and the provinces. The object of the Act was neither to weld the provinces into one, nor to subordinate provincial governments to a central authority, but to create a Federal Government in which they should all be represented, entrusted with the exclusive administration of affairs in which they had a common interest, each province retaining its independence and autonomy....As regards those matters which by Section 92 are specially reserved for provincial legislation of each province continues....as supreme as it was before the passing of the Act."

(4) The Provinces remain independent and autonomous. Professor Kennedy summing up the position and status of the Dominion Government and Provinces says that both governments "exercise co-ordinate authority and are severally Sovereign within the sphere specifically or generically or by implication constitutionally granted to them."³ This construction, he holds, agrees with the preamble of the British North America Act which reads, "whereas the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united."

A Federal Constitution is really what the Judges declare it to be. In interpreting the Constitution of the United States the Supreme Court adopted a definite theory of federalism. It had been assumed that the States retained their 'sovereignty' in all matters which were not expressly taken away from them and as such no legislation of Congress must interfere with powers which remained with the States, and no legislation of the States must be allowed to interfere with the exercise of powers specifically assigned to the Federal Government. The Supreme Court has the power to declare unconstitutional federal or state legislation which, in its opinion, offended against the limitations imposed by the Constitution. Moreover, in interpreting the Constitution, the Supreme Court has always remembered that a Constitution is not an ordinary law. It is a fundamental law providing the machinery of government and it has to be interpreted according to the conditions which it has to meet and solve. Mere reliance on the letter of the law and the intentions of its framers would make the Constitution static thereby preventing the organs of government adapting themselves to changing social and economic conditions.

3. The Constitution of Canada, p. 408.

But the Supreme Court of Canada and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has not followed the practice of the American Supreme Court. They have regarded the British North America Act as a statute to be interpreted like other statutes. And faithful to the traditional rules of statutory interpretation, the Judges have been concerned with the literal meaning of the words in the British North America Act without reference to historical facts, or the intentions of the framers of the constitution, or the changing social and economic conditions of the country to which the machinery of the government must fit in. The result is that there has not been a straight line interpreting the British North America Act. Lord Haldane, in the Attorney-General of Australia v. Colonial Sugar Refining Co., held that the Constitution of Canada could not be described as federal except in a loose sense. But in spite of the conflicting interpretation of the British North America Act, history has proved otherwise. The American federation began its career with a theory of state rights. Today, we find there the ever-increasing growth of central power and the process of centralization is in full swing, that is, the national government assuming influence or control over functions which formerly were considered under state jurisdiction. Canada began its political existence with the scales highly tilted in favour of the central authority. Today, the Canadian Provinces enjoy powers almost greater than those in the states in the American federation.

Many factors are responsible for this development, but it has been essentially determined by the attitudes of mind prevalent among those vested with political authority. Sir John MacDonald, the most outstanding statesman of the early period and, in fact, the architect of the Canadian federation, had convincingly viewed the Provincial Legislatures subordinate bodies and regarded the Lieutenant-Governors as nominees of the Dominion government whose interests he expected them to safeguard as dutiful servants. MacDonald also set the precedent of disallowing provincial legislation and twenty-nine Acts were victims in the first decade of the career of the federation. But the Liberal Party, particularly as represented in the person of Oliver Mowat, Prime Minister of Ontario (1872-1896), had strongly protested and fought against MacDonald's wide use of Dominion authority and essentially its power of disallowance. The Liberals urged the view that within their sphere of jurisdiction, the Provinces were as supreme as the Dominion within its own. By 1887, the dissatisfaction against the centralist policies of the Dominion Government had reached a pitch. In a conference held at Quebec the representatives of the five Provinces met to vindicate the plenary nature of provincial authority, and agreed to agitate for: (1) curtailment of the federal jurisdiction; (2) abolition of the power of disallowance; (3) recognition of the Lieutenant-Governors as the representatives of the King rather than servants of the Dominion Government; and (4) each Province should nominate some members to the Senate.

When the Liberal Party assumed office, at the Centre, in 1896, it adopted a responsive attitude and tried to lessen a fear of centralisation prevalent in the new growing nation. It did not repudiate any of the powers which the British North America Act conferred upon the Dominion Government. Nor did it set to make those powers become obsolete. But since then the power of disallowance has been more cautiously used, an exceptional rather than a normal expedient or as Brady says, "an extreme medicine of the Constitution." The present position is well explained by Dawson. He says, "Sporadic revivals of disallowance have occurred during the past thirty-five years, but it is a far from being the active agent in assuring to the Dominion that oversight which was contemplated in 1864. It is now generally recognised by the Canadians that the true judge of the mistakes and injustices of the provincial legislature is the electorate and not the Dominion Government. Since the Dominion Government has now definitely assumed a federal aspect, it balances divergent interests, thus, subordinating the legal powers to the federal principle in practice."

The conventions of the parliamentary system of government go still further. The British North America Act empowers the Dominion Government to appoint a Lieutenant-Governor, and by law the Lieutenant-Governor appoints his ministers who hold office at his pleasure. But the parliamentary system of government demands that the Lieutenant-Governor must appoint his ministers only those persons who belong to the majority party in the provincial legislature and command its confidence. The real functionaries are, thus, the choice of the people who returned them in majority at elections and the Dominion Government must accept their choice and endorse their policies for which they hold a mandate. In fact, the Dominion Government cannot afford to do otherwise as it is itself the choice of the people and it has to appeal to the people at periodic intervals for return to power. This custom of the Constitution renders almost nugatory the intention of the Quebec Conference that the Dominion influence over the Province would be effectively exercised through the agency of the Lieutenant-Governors. Similarly, although the Dominion Government has the power to make all the important provincial judicial appointments, yet it exercises this authority with due discretion and has not attempted to pack the courts with partisans opposed to provincial powers. Professor Wheare, accordingly, comes to the conclusion that "Canada is politically federal and that no Dominion Government which attempted to stress the unitary elements in the Canadian Constitution at the expense of the federal elements would survive."

Professor Wheare does not entirely rely upon the law of the Constitution for determining whether it is federal or not. The practice of the Constitution, he says, "is more important almost than the law of the Constitution," for a country "may have a federal Constitution, but in practice it may work that Constitution in such a way that its government is not federal. Or a country with a non-federal Constitution may work in such a way that it provides the example of a federal government." Professor Wheare's conclusion is obviously clear. "It seems justifiable to conclude," he says, "that although the Canadian Constitution is quasi-federal in law, it is predominantly federal in practice. Or to put it in another way, although Canada has not a federal Constitution, it has a federal government."⁵

Canada has really a Federal Government. The unitary elements are being so worked that they do not conflict with the federal principle. The Provinces now enjoy wide political and legislative authority. Within the sphere of powers granted to them, they are practically autonomous. The power of disallowing Provincial legislation is sparingly used and confined only to acts which infringe the principle of legislative power and contravene the interests of the Commonwealth. A Lieutenant-Governor is no longer an instrument of the Central Government. His appointment by the Dominion Government is, in fact, an evidence of the federal link and does not mean subordination once he is legally appointed.

Nature of the Constitution. According to Paul Gerin Lajoie, Canada does not possess any constitutional document called the "Constitution" or "the Constitution Act."⁶ But this is not a true appreciation of the nature of the Canadian Constitution. The British North America Act is the written part of the Constitution and constitutes its original and basic written document. It is the instrument that created the Dominion of Canada by uniting the four original Provinces and binds together in perpetual common ties the ten Provinces which today make the federation of Canada. As the British North America Act was designed to bring unity into the diversity of the new nation, it contains the scheme of distribution of powers between the Dominion and the Provinces, and the organisation of governments at both the levels.

The British North America Act is, thus, the pivot on which hinges the constitutional framework of Canada. It is written and fundamental, though the document is not comprehensive. At many places it is silent on vital matters, such as the exercise of executive power, and its relation to the legislature, and at others when it goes into details, they are given in such a way that they become ambiguous if not sometimes misleading. The explanation of this peculiarity is due to the contents of the Preamble which states that it was the desire of the original Provinces to be united "with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom." It means that all those principles which are basic to the cabinet system of government in Britain and find their origin and continuance on the conventions of the Constitution would be observed in all their essentials in Canada too. The North America Act itself does not contain any of these conventions. The Preamble is not a part of the Act, but the direction it contains for the fulfilment of the objective makes a vital difference in theory and practice. All this, however, does not mean that Canada has no Constitution.

The Constitution also contains the statutes other than the British North America Act, of the British Parliament, as also the statutes of Canada which comprise the written part of the Constitution. In the Statutes of the United Kingdom are included British North America Acts amending from time to time the various provisions of the British

5. Ibid.

6. Constitutional Amendment in Canada, p. 5.

North America Act, 1867, the Statute of Westminster, 1931, and Parliament of Canada Act, 1875. The Statutes of the Parliament of Canada include such enactments as the succession to the Throne Act, the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Speaker of the Senate Act, the Speaker of the House of Commons Act, the House of Commons Act and the Salaries Act. Then, there is the Canadian Bill of Rights passed in 1960. Provincial statutes relate to Executive Councils, Legislatures, representation, etc. The Letters Patent constituting the office of the Governor-General of Canada and the Instructions issued to the Governor-General also constitute the "written material" of the Constitution.

From this analysis, E.A. Dreidger, Deputy Minister of Justice and Deputy Attorney-General of Canada, concluded that "In Canada there is no document that purports to set out the complete laws pertaining to the country's government. The Constitution, as in the case of the United Kingdom, consists in part of written material and in part in conventions or customs." He categorises the Constitution of Canada, "in its broadest sense", to include:

- (a) Statutes of the United Kingdom, e.g., British North America Acts, Statute of Westminster, 1931, Parliament of Canada Act, 1875.
- (b) Statutes of Canada, e.g., Senate and the House of Commons Act, Canada Elections Act, Representation Act, North-West Territories Act, Yukon Act, Saskatchewan Act, Alberta Act, Manitoba Act, Bill of Rights of 1960.
- (c) Statutes of the Provinces, e.g., Acts relating to the Executive Council, the Legislature, Representation and Election.
- (d) Other Documents, e.g., Instructions to Governor-General and Lieutenant-Governors and Letter Patent.
- (e) Conventions.

In spite of the scattered sources of the Canadian Constitution, it is not correct to say that there is no "Constitution Act" or any constitutional document called the "Constitution." The British North America Act is the fundamental law of the country and it provides the machinery of government both for the Centre and Provinces. Even the Constitution of the United States as it emerged out of the Philadelphia Convention was a brief document and its framers left sufficient room for it to grow. Bryce has correctly said that "the American Constitution has necessarily changed as the nation has changed, has changed in the spirit with which men regard it, and, therefore, in its own spirit." The American Constitution is, accordingly, not the written fundamental instrument framed at Philadelphia together with its amendments. It also includes statutes enacted by Congress, executive orders and actions which enable the government to function efficiently, the judicial decisions and the innumerable usages and customs. This is the process of development in every country and Canada is no exception to it.

Amendment of the Constitution. The British North America Act, unlike the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act, contains no amending clause whatever. The reason for this omission from the Act is not clear, "although it may be supposed that a British statute appeared to be normal instrument through which another British statute might be changed."⁸ But this procedure of amending the British North America Act by an act of the British Parliament gives to Canada, in the opinion of the vast majority of the Canadians a humiliating position, "for after many years of insistence on her independent status, she is compelled to admit that she is dependent on an outside legislative body for the exercise of one of the most basic powers of self-government."

But the British Parliament does not amend the Act as and when it desires. From 1871, it has become the accepted practice that the demand for amendment proceeds from the Canadian Parliament, the Senate and the House of Commons, in the form of an address to Her Majesty requesting the passage through the British Parliament of an amending Act. The British Parliament has always acted a little more than an automation and quietly and quickly passes the required amendment. The British Parliament is, thus, simply an agent in the realization of the wishes of the Dominion Parliament and that, too, with regard to those constitutional amendments which cannot now be made by any legislative authority in Canada.

The British North America Act, 1867, gave to the Canadian Provinces the power to amend their Constitutions, except as regards the office of the Lieutenant-Governor,⁹ but the same power was not conferred on the federal Parliament. Amendment to the federal Constitution thus could be made only by the British Parliament and this was done on address to the sovereign from both Houses of Canadian Parliament. In 1949, the British North America Act was passed in accordance with a request made by the Canadian Senate and the House of Commons, so as largely to remove this disability. Section 91 now empowers the Parliament of Canada to legislate with respect to constitutional matters and amend the Constitution of Canada, except as regards the legislative authority of the Provinces, the rights and privileges of the Provincial Legislatures and Governments, schools, the use of the English and French language and the duration of the House of Commons.

At present time, therefore, the constitutional laws for Canada may be made by the Parliament of Canada, by the Provincial Legislatures or by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. There has, however, been an earnest effort in Canada to find out a suitable method of amending the Constitution of Canada in Canada and thereby to remove the stigma that it is the only country among the independent nations of the world that does not possess the complete legal power to amend its own Constitution. This issue had been discussed in various conferences. In December 1961, the conference of the Attorneys-General worked out a draft amending formula

8. Ibid., p. 138. For an instructive study reference may be made to Paul Gerin Lajoie's Constitutional Amendment in Canada.

9. Article 92(1).

which was transmitted to the Provincial Governments for their consideration. No firm decision has yet been taken thereupon.¹⁰

Basic freedoms. Every Canadian citizen enjoys certain Rights or basic freedoms and these rights are the foundation of the Canadian way of life. These rights include freedom of speech, freedom of worship, freedom of movement, freedom of enterprise, freedom from arrest, freedom of private property, freedom of the press and freedom of choice respecting political parties. Until the Canadian Bill of Rights in 1960 few of these freedoms or rights had been set down in the form of laws. They have grown steadily and have been handed down from one generation to another.

Although these rights or basic freedoms are greatly treasured and guarded by the Canadians, yet in times of danger when the security of the nation is threatened, some of these rights may be temporarily withdrawn. Even under such circumstances, however, the consent of the people must be given through their representatives in Parliament.

10. For details refer to the Reference Papers No. 112, op. cit.

CHAPTER II

THE EXECUTIVE

The Crown. Government in Canada proceeds from the Crown as it does in Britain. The Preamble of the British North America Act states that "the Provinces of...., have expressed their desire to be federally united into one Dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom....with a Constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom." The Constitution of the United Kingdom is a body of rules indicating the structure and functions of political institutions and the principles governing their operation. These rules and principles of political governance lie scattered in the various Charters, Statutes, Judicial decisions, usages and traditions, and all mark a steady transference of power from the King as a person to a complicated impersonal organisation called the Crown. The King is still there and legally all government radiates from the person of the Monarch. But in actual practice the King reigns and does not govern. The King has become the Crown. The King does not exercise the powers which belong to the Crown on his own initiative and authority. He does so at the behest of those who exercise the will of the people, that is, Ministers responsible to Parliament. The King, Ministers and Parliament make a synthesis of supreme authority and it is called the Crown. The principles governing the operation of all the three political institutions essentially embody the British Constitution. The nature of the British Constitution has been beautifully summed up in a fairy tale and it runs, "once upon a time there was a King who was very important and who did very big and very important things. He owned a nice shiny crown, which he would wear on especially grand occasion, but most of the time he kept it on a red velvet cushion. Then somebody made a Magic. The Crown was carefully stored in the Tower; the King moved over to the cushion and was transformed into a special kind of Crown with a capital letter; and this new Crown became in the process something else; no one knows exactly what, for it is one thing today, another thing tomorrow, and two or three things the day after that. The name given to the Magic is the Constitutional Development."

Her Majesty, Elizabeth the Second, is the Queen of Canada, Australia and other Dominion countries, and the reigning Monarch of Britain. In fact, she is several monarchs wrapped up in one person, but each is completely divorced from all the rest. She is the Queen of Canada not because she is the Queen of the United Kingdom, but because she is the Queen of Canada separately. At each step of the evolutionary process of constitutional development in Canada, the relationship of the Crown to Canada was altered to meet the aspirations of the growing nation until the present association emerged in which Elizabeth the Second is the Queen of Canada as distinct from her status as Monarch of the United Kingdom. Her Majesty is simply a symbol, the symbol of Canada's free association with Britain and the other Commonwealth nations, and a symbol of the history and traditions which a majority of the Canadian people revere.

In fact, Britain had herself consistently encouraged this gradual advance to partnership, "possibly because she had learned her lesson the hard way in the days of the third George, and that this attitude, more than any other factor, is responsible for Canada's retention of the symbol of the Crown, as the tie which binds the partnership." When the Canadians desired a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom what they had in mind were the Monarchy, a Cabinet to advise it, a Parliament consisting of two Houses and the Cabinet responsible to its representative Chamber, the law courts and the common law.

The functions of the Canadian Crown, which are substantially the same as those of the Queen in relation to the Government of Britain, are generally discharged by the Governor-General. A few Canadian prerogative powers, such as the granting of honours and awards and the appointment of ambassadors and ministers plenipotentiary, are dealt with by the Queen personally; most are, however, performed on her behalf by the Governor-General, and in either case the prerogative is exercised on the advice of the Government of Canada.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL

Appointment and term of office. The Monarch of Canada occupies the Canadian throne, but the permanent home of the occupant is not Canada but Britain. As the Monarch cannot reign herself from a distant land which is her permanent home, she appoints a personal representative to act on her behalf and he is the Governor-General of Canada. Formerly, the Governor-General was appointed by the Sovereign on the advice of the Colonial Secretary, a British Minister of the King. In 1890, the old practice was altered. The Dominion Government was consulted before making the appointment, though this procedure had not invariably been followed, as in 1916 when the Duke of Devonshire was appointed without any preliminary consultation. The Imperial Conference of 1926 made a revolutionary change. It was decided at the Conference that if the Governor-General "is not the representative or agent of His Majesty's Government in Britain or of any Department of that Government," the British Government must not have to do with anything in making the selection. Since then the appointment of the Governor-General is made by the Dominion Government. The Prime Minister of Canada recommends the appointment to the King or the Queen and the advice so tendered is invariably accepted. Britain simply checks up the availability of the person so advised to be appointed if he happens to be her national. In 1936, Prime Minister Bennet devised another method. When Lord Tweedsmuir's name was being considered, Mr. Bennet first discussed the matter with the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Mackenzie King. His object was to make the appointment non-partisan in character by carrying the approval of the leaders of both major political parties. This procedure was hoped to become a practice, but the appointment in 1952 of the first Canadian Governor-General, Mr. Vincent Massey was widely critiesied. Massey was prominently identified with the Liberal Party and he was once a Cabinet member when the Party was in office. Many people in Canada do not view it a healthy practice of appointing a Governor-General from among the Canadians themselves. They fear, remarks Leslie Robert, "that once the appointment of one of their own has become accepted practice, little time will elapse before the Governor-Generalship becomes a political plum—the ripest in the gift of government."¹ But with the appointment of Roland Michener, it appears that this objection does not carry much significance now. Michener succeeded General George P. Vainer who died on March 5, 1967 and is the third Canadian to become his country's head of the State.

The term of office of the Governor-General, writes Dawson, "may be simply, if somewhat ambiguously, stated as being officially recognised as six years, customarily treated as five years, while on occasion it has been seven years."² Therefore, the Governor-General traditionally serves for a term of five years.³ He may be removed from office by the Queen acting on the advice tendered by the Canadian Cabinet. His salary is $10,000 a year plus various allowances, other amenities consistent with his high office, and general upkeep of Rideau Hall, a part of the Quebec citadel, his official residence.

Powers of the Governor-General. The powers of the Governor-General are, indeed, extensive and he exercises his authority under the Letters Patent constituting the office of the Governor-General, and the provisions of the British North America Act. But, like his master, the Monarch, the Governor-General has ceased to rule now and he has personally nothing to do with the affairs of government. The actual exercise of powers and rights associated with the office of the representative of the Monarch belong to Her Majesty's responsible ministers in Canada. "The Governor," writes Dawson, "has tended to follow the same path which had been marked out a few generations earlier by his august principal and he now shares substantially the same disabilities. He is a legal survivor who has contrived to remain a political necessity—the once supreme chief whose powers have largely passed into other hands, yet who has nevertheless retained a substantial residue of his former ascendancy and importance."⁴

The British North America Act vests the executive government and authority in the Crown⁵ to be exercised by the Governor-General with the aid and advice of a Council chosen and summoned by him and liable to be removed by him at his pleasure.⁶ But law is not practice and the executive power is actually exercised in the Queen's name by ministers who derive their authority from the Dominion Parliament and are responsible to it for the use they make of their powers. As a

1. Canada, the Golden Hinge, p. 58.

2. The Government of Canada, p. 176.

3. Reference Papers No. 70. Information Division, Department of External Affairs, Ottawa, Canada.

4. Ibid., p. 165.

5. Article 9.

6. Article 11.

constitutional head the way is carved out for the Governor-General by the established practices of the parliamentary system of government, which the British North America Act established in Canada similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. He follows the usual course of summoning the leader of the majority party in the House of Commons and entrusts him with the duty of forming the Council of Ministers and the ministers remain in office so long as they command the confidence of the House of Commons. The constitutional position of the Governor-General was explained in a formal statement by the Imperial Conference in 1926. The statement affirmed that the Governor-General of a Dominion was the "representative of the Crown and not of any department of the British Government, and that his position in relation to the administration of public affairs in the Dominion was essentially the same as that of His Majesty the King in Great Britain." The Governor-General has nothing to do with the determination and execution of the policy, and he does not take part in the deliberations of the ministers. Duke of Argyll (1878-83) discontinued attending meetings of the Cabinet and since then this practice has been invariably followed.

The Governor-General is the Commander-in-Chief of the land, naval and air forces of the Dominion. He appoints representatives of Canada to the United Nations and signs treaties of minor importance which are not signed by the Crown directly. He also appoints and receives those ordinary agents and ministers who are not appointed and received by the Government directly. Till 1926, the Governor-General performed certain ambassadorial functions on behalf of the British Government and was charged with the duty of guarding the wider interests of the Empire. But the Imperial Conference of 1926 not only clarified the position of the Governor-General with relation to the government of a Dominion, but it also declared his complete separation from the British Government. In 1928, all such functions of the Governor-General were transferred to the High Commissioner stationed in Canada as representative of the Government in London.

The Governor-General appoints, according to law, the Lieutenant-Governors of the Provinces and can remove them from office as well. In practice, all such appointments and dismissals are made by the Dominion Ministry. The Governor-General also appoints the Speaker of the Senate, the Judges of the Supreme Court, Provincial Courts, Commissioners, justices of the peace and officers of various other categories. And like his various other acts, these appointing functions are really those of his duly constituted ministers responsible to the House of Commons.

The Governor-General summons, prorogues and dissolves Parliament. But like the various other powers of the Governor-General, these are also his nominal powers. The Bying episode of 1926, finally decided that the right to ask for dissolution belongs to the Prime Minister and the Governor-General cannot refuse it. The power of the Governor-General to veto a Bill or to reserve it for the assent of Her Majesty is an obsolete practice now. The Imperial Conference of 1926, and the Conference on the Operation of Dominion Legislation, and Merchant Shipping Legislation (1929) definitely decided that the disallowance of Dominion legislation by British authorities and reservation by the Governor-General did not conform to the equal status of the autonomous communities within the British Empire. The explicit obligation placed by the British North America Act to keep the British Government informed of the Acts passed by the Canadian Parliament was faithfully observed until 1942, when it was quietly discontinued. This was followed in 1947 by the passage of an Act amending the Canadian statute which had provided for transmission of copies of current Acts to the Governor-General and to the British Government.

Such are, then, the powers of the Governor-General. According to law there is no sphere of administration where the authority of the Governor-General does not intervene. But in practical politics Lord Bying's episode finished once for all the controversy and conflict of opinion as to the exercise of powers by the Governor-General, and the Imperial Conference of 1926 vindicated his constitutional position. There are, however certain functions which the Governor-General does not exercise on ministerial advice. The most important of them is the appointment of a Prime Minister. No one else except the Governor-General can commission a new Premier in the form required by the established custom of the parliamentary system of government. The task of the Governor-General is simple, if the party commanding parliamentary majority has an accredited leader. But if the office becomes vacant, because of a sudden death or resignation of the incumbent or when party dissension may make the office of Prime Minister to fall vacant and there is no obvious leader, the Governor-General has, then, the discretion to select a person who may command the confidence of a stable majority in the House of Commons and be in a position to form government. He may even seek the advice of those whom the Governor-General feels can give some advice, as Lord Aberdeen did in 1897, in his search for successor to Sir John Thompson. The Governor-General may adopt another procedure and he may tap the potential Prime Ministers and discover for himself who can form a Cabinet. In 1896, Lord Aberdeen, after first sounding out Sir Donald Smith, eventually commissioned Sir Charles Tupper to succeed Sir Mackenzie Bowell. Aside these two occasions, the Governor-General had not the opportunity to exercise his judgment in selecting the Prime Minister, but the contingency is still there and it may happen as it did in 1916 and 1923 in Britain or as it occurred in Australia in July, 1945.

The second function of the Governor-General is that he acts as a mediator and uses his influence to settle political disputes between political leaders whenever occasion may demand it. As the Governor-General wields no political power his advice is deemed valuable and generally accepted. The Duke of Devonshire in 1917, summoned Sir Robert Borden, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and four others to a meeting at Government House to discuss and amicably decide the conflicting issues regarding conscription, postponement of elections during War, and the possibilities of forming a Coalition Government. This is how the King intervened in Britain in 1914 in his efforts to secure agreement on the Home Rule Bill. The Governors-General have sometimes intervened to settle quarrels between the Dominion and a Province, as Lord Dufferin endeavoured to remove the bitterness between British Columbia and the Dominion immediately after the latter's membership of the federation. Twenty years later Lord Aberdeen held a series of interviews with the Premier and Attorney-General of Manitoba.

Governors-General have also been expected at times to act as quasi-diplomatic agents. In early days, Governors-General paid official visits to the United States with a definite diplomatic purpose and under instructions from the government in London. Today, their visits are neither diplomatic nor are undertaken on the instructions of the British Government. They are goodwill visits to strengthen the ties of friendliness between the two neighbouring countries undertaken with the approval of the Canadian Government. All the same, as Dawson points out, "It is, indeed, probable that these social calls are still occasionally used to review unofficially and tentatively matters which are of common interest to the two nations, although their usefulness for purposes of diplomatic intercourse is obviously restricted."

The Governor-General, like the King of Britain, is also an important part of the social structure and he wields a great social influence. His patronage is an enormous asset to any cause and ensures for popular support. His name is always associated with multifarious activities and various fields of art, music, literature, theatre, social service, youth movement, etc., which are organised and function under his patronage. These "dignified" functions, as Bagehot describes them, are more important than the government functions.

Closely connected with the social activities are the Governor-General's ceremonial duties as the Chief Executive Head. He opens Parliament, receives foreign diplomatic agents, and he is Canada's busiest host. He is also Canada's most travelled VIP and goes on tours throughout the Dominion once or twice a year. The ceremonial functions of the Governor-General have been graphically described by Leslie Roberts. He writes, "the Governor-General receives, dines and wines foreign and domestic celebrities at Government House, his official residence and Ottawa. He pins medals on heroes and welcomes visiting celebrities. He travels the country from end to end unveiling monuments, opening hospitals, launching charity drives, and taking his ease with the war veterans in their sanctuaries. He is primarily a goodwill ambassador, but it is not goodwill for Britain that the Governor-General works to create, but goodwill between Canadians and goodwill towards Canada on the part of the nation's distinguished and official guests."

The Cabinet government, in short, pre-supposes the presence of some titular head of the States, some central and impartial figure, and the Governor-General fulfils that purpose. His position is very often compared and made analogous to that of the King in Britain. The influence of the Governor-General is, indeed, not negligible. But there is a subtle distinction between the role of the King and his representative. The Governor-General is the nominee of the Canadian Government, and since he comes and goes within a relatively short period of time, he cannot enjoy the national prestige of the Monarch himself. The King is the chief of the nation, he is everybody's King and provides a useful focus for patriotism. People live and die for the Monarch. He personifies the State. "We condemn the government," says Jennings, "and cheer the king." The Governor-General is, as Sir Robert Borden not inaptly described him, "a nominated President" who can seldom appeal to popular sentiment in the same magnetic way as the Monarch. "However much he may graciously act as the king himself would act, he is still a substitute. Consequently he loses much as a potent symbol and mirror of the nation. For such a symbol Canadians must look beyond him to the king in person." The Governor-General may offer informal council to his ministers and like the King he has the right to be consulted, the right to encourage and the right to warn, but he has not the same continued and ripe experience of life-time as that of the King. The King acquires political knowledge and experience which makes him a mentor and a wise minister is not only obliged but positively desires to consult him.

THE CABINET

The Privy Council and the Cabinet. The cabinet is the motive power of all political action. It is the magnet of policy and the supreme directing authority which co-ordinates and controls the whole of executive government, and integrates and guides the work of the legislature. Yet, as in Britain, it has no legal status in Canada. It is an extra-constitutional body, a committee of Queen's Privy Council, whose acts are formally made the actions of the Privy Council which body has existence in law.⁷ The whole machinery of the cabinet system is based upon conventions, unwritten but always recognised and stated with almost precision as the rules of law. It is by convention, that the members of the Cabinet are members of either House of Parliament and the Cabinet resigns office when it no longer holds the confidence of the House of Commons.

The British North America Act provides for the Privy Council. Section II states that "there shall be a council to aid and advise in the Government of Canada, to be styled the Queen's Privy Council for Canada; and the persons who are to be Members of that Council shall be from time to time chosen and summoned by the Governor-General and sworn in as Privy Councillors, and Members thereof may from time to time be removed by the Governor-General." The legal body, therefore, to be constituted for aid and advice in the Government of Canada is the Privy Council. It is chosen and summoned by the Governor-General and is subject to removal by him. But in practice, the Privy Council as a whole does not aid and advise the Governor-General. Nor is it removed by him as a whole. The real advisers of the Governor-General are the members of the Cabinet, the active part of the Privy Council, and they aid and advise him in the Government of Canada only by custom. All members of the Cabinet are, no doubt, members of the Privy Council, but all members of the Privy Council are not members of the Cabinet. The Privy Council consists of about 113 members. Members of the Cabinet aside, about twenty in number, it may contain other persons of distinction, such as the Prince of Wales, the British Prime Minister, former Ministers, the Canadian High Commissioner in

7. Articles 11 and 12.

London. In 1953 the Chief Justice of Canada, the Speaker of the House of Commons and the Senate, and the Leader of the Opposition were all made members of the Privy Council before they left for coronation of Queen Elizabeth to form a part of Canada's official delegation.

The Privy Council as a whole holds no meeting and this practice has been followed even since 1867, except only for two occasions. It met for the first time in 1947, to receive the formal announcement by the King of his consent to the marriage of Princess Elizabeth, and for the second time in 1952, to hear the proclamation of the accession of Queen Elizabeth on the death of her father. The Privy Council does not meet as a functioning body, and its constitutional responsibilities as adviser to the Crown are performed exclusively by the Ministers who constitute the Cabinet of the day.

The Ministry and the Cabinet. The Cabinet and the Ministry in Canada are usually treated as if they are synonymous, and the fact is that during the large part of the Canadian history there had been no difference between the two. But there does exist a difference between them, as it is in Britain, because not all the members of the government formed by the Prime Minister make the Cabinet. A Cabinet consists of a select circle of colleagues of the Prime Minister who meet together from time to time to decide matters of high policy. The number of ministers not in the Cabinet has remained till recently absolutely insignificant and it is only since the Second World War that this "penumbral group" has become fairly large. Before the War there used to be one or more members, in 1943 out of a total of twenty-seven members of the government twenty were in the Cabinet and seven not in the Cabinet, and in 1954 the number of the members not in the Cabinet increased to eleven. Since then this level has been maintained.

It means that Ministers in Canada, too, are not alike in status and they differ in importance. The first group comprises the great bulk of the personnel of the Cabinet, usually fourteen or fifteen in number, who "head up the government" and are also the immediate associates of the Prime Minister. Then, come the Ministers without portfolio, three or four, who are surely the members of the Cabinet, but are not the political heads of the departments of administration. Britain, on the other hand, has not liked such a category of ministers, though from 1915 to 1921 ten cases occurred of Ministers in the Cabinet without Portfolio. It ended in 1921 after a ruthless criticism in the House of Commons. Baldwin revived it in 1935, but just for a brief period. In Canada it is a usual practice to have ministers without portfolios. The leader and spokesman of the Government in the Senate is usually a Minister without Portfolio and there are one or two others who "may for a wide variety of reasons be similarly honoured."

Finally, is "the penumbral group" which has recently become fairly large. "The most numerous of this quasi-ministerial group are the recently created parliamentary assistants, who are members of the Commons appointed to relieve the Cabinet Ministers of some of their less important duties." They are members of Parliament and they come and go out of office as the Cabinet Ministers do, but they have no place in the meetings of the Cabinet and have nothing to do with the determination of policy. Nor do they head up the departments of administration. They may be considered analogous to "Junior Ministers," in Britain.

Composition of the Cabinet. A Canadian Cabinet differs from the British in its composition, but it is strikingly like the British in the thorough manner in which it accepts the pre-eminence of the Prime Minister along with the rules of homogeneity, collective responsibility and secrecy. The Cabinet government means party government and solidarity of the government demands its political homogeneity so that as a team all should play the game of politics under the captaincy of the Prime Minister. Like Britain, Canada hates coalition government and since 1867 there had been only one instance of a Coalition Government when a Union Government was formed during the First World War to enforce the terms of the Conscription Act of 1917. The principle of homogeneity in government had such an impress on the minds of the Canadians that they have carried it through with unfaltering conviction. "There is something more required to make a strong administration," wrote Joseph Howe over a hundred years ago, "than nine men treating each other courteously at a round table. There is the assurance of good faith—towards each other—of common sentiments, and kindly feelings, propagated through the friends of each, in Society, in the Legislature and in the Press, until a great party is formed....which secures a steady working majority to sustain their policy and carry their measures."

But in the selection of his colleagues, the Canadian Prime Minister does not exercise an unrestricted choice as the British Prime Minister does. The Canadian Cabinet is always designed to represent the principal races, religions and regions of the country. The representativeness of a member is sometimes much more evident than his ability. "The inevitable consequence is," as Dawson remarks, "that the choice of the Prime Minister is seriously restricted and he is often compelled to push merit to one side in making some of his selections." The first requisite of Cabinet composition is that every Province must have, if at all possible, at least one representative in the Cabinet. It makes the Cabinet federalised. This practice was begun while constituting the first Dominion Cabinet and since then it has hardened into a rigid convention.

The convention that each Province, if at all possible, must have at least one representative in the Cabinet makes another convention almost mandatory, namely, that the two large Provinces must each be given more than one representative. An effort is usually made to obtain at least one Protestant English-speaking representative from Quebec and three or even four French. This gives to Quebec the minimum of four members. Ontario must also have four, and possibly five members and one of them should be a Roman Catholic of Irish extraction. "Provincial representation," remarks Dawson, "has frequently been further elaborated in that a few portfolios have been commonly recognised as the special preserve of certain areas." The kind of conscious and planned representativeness is deemed imperative in order to strengthen the executive in a country having diverse religious, linguistic and economic interests. It helps to ensure that in reaching decisions the Cabinet will hear and discuss all the major interests and harmonise them in such a way as to satisfy all without jeopardising the national interests. "I feel," remarked Mackenzie King in 1922, "that the whole purpose of confederation itself would be menaced if any great body of opinion, any considerable section of this Dominion of Canada, should have reason to think that it was without due representation in the shaping of national policies."

THE PRIME MINISTER

Informal basis. Jennings describes the Prime Minister of Britain "as the keystone of the Constitution." The position of the Canadian Prime Minister is exactly the same, for like his prototype in Britain, he is the most powerful man in the country. He forms the Cabinet; he can alter it or destroy it. "The Government," to put it in the words of Greaves, "is the master of the country and he is the master of the government." And yet the office of the Prime Minister, like various other institutions in Canada, is not known to law. The Cabinet system of government pre-supposes the pre-eminence and leadership of one single person and he is the Prime Minister. There are no legal powers which may determine the extent of his powers, but constitutional conventions, upon which is firmly erected the mechanism of government, give him the whole weight of government. Abolish the institution of the Prime Minister or diminish any part of his powers, the entire political structure would be destroyed.

The Choice of the Prime Minister. The choice of the Prime Minister, as stated before, is obvious. The Governor-General summons a recognised leader of the political party having a clear majority in the House of Commons and that leader becomes the Prime Minister. But on occasions when the choice is neither obvious nor simple, as in the event of a sudden death or resignation of the Prime Minister or party dissension, the Governor-General has some discretion in the selection of the Prime Minister. But such occasions do not occur frequently and since 1896, the Governor-General has not been called upon to use his own judgment in selecting a Prime Minister. It does not, however, mean that the power of the Governor-General has become obsolete. Dawson points out that "the conscription crisis in Canada in 1944 might easily have resulted in the Governor-General being compelled to choose a successor to Mr. Mackenzie King."

Powers of the Prime Minister. "The Powers of the Prime Minister," said Arthur Meighen, "are very great. The functions and duties of a Prime Minister in Parliament are not only important, they are supreme in their importance." Talking about the powers of the British Prime Minister Lord Oxford and Asquith, himself the occupant of that office in the first decade and a half of the present century, said, "the office is what its holder chooses to make it," and only a few holders exhibit any marked desire to lightly view their responsibilities and duties as heads of government.

The Prime Minister is the corner-stone of the Constitution and in his hand is the key of government. The Prime Minister makes the government, allocates offices, and his unabridged power of reshuffling or dismissing his colleagues. In the selection of his colleagues, the choice of the Prime Minister, as said before, is seriously limited, but once the Ministry has been formed the control of the Prime Minister over its members is unchallengeable. It is purely the personal authority of the Prime Minister to ask a colleague to resign or to accept another office. While referring to the question of ministerial responsibility, Professor Dawson writes, "The members of the Canadian Cabinet acknowledge three separate and distinct responsibilities: a responsibility to the Governor-General, which is now rarely invoked in any aggressive sense, a responsibility to the Prime Minister and to one another, which produces what is called the 'solidarity' of the Cabinet; and a responsibility, both individual and collective, to the House of Commons."⁸

It is from Lord Argyll's time that the Prime Minister presides over the meetings of the Cabinet and as the Chairman of the Cabinet he attracts, like the British Prime Minister, a special kind of loyalty. He exercises a casting vote and it is inherent in the Chairman. If there arises difference of opinion in Cabinet discussions, the Prime Minister is the major influence in helping to arrive at decisions. Then, he determines the Cabinet agenda and thereby accepts or rejects proposals for discussion put forward by Cabinet Ministers. In this way, the Prime Minister leads the Cabinet. As the leader and guide of the Cabinet, the Prime Minister is always consulted by every Minister before an important proposal is put forward. In fact, he is the chief co-ordinator of the policies of the several Ministers and Ministries.

The Prime Minister, as the leader of the parliamentary majority, guides the deliberations of Parliament. He leads the House of Commons, makes all principal announcements of policy and business, answers all questions on departmental affairs and upon critical issues, initiates or intervenes in debates of general importance, and corrects the errors of omission and commission of his colleagues. He apportions the time of the House of Commons and submits the measures of his Government for its approval.

The Prime Minister, as the leader of the parliamentary majority, and, like the British Prime Minister, he may on special occasions man the entire policy. He is the link between the Governor-General and the Cabinet on matters of public concern and is in a special sense the chief adviser of the former. He also has the primary responsibility for the Council advising the Governor-General when Parliament should be convened and when it should be dissolved.

The patronage exercised by the Prime Minister is enormous. He recommends all important appointments, including the Lieutenant-Governors, to the Cabinet. He may, also, attend and participate in international conferences or meetings and conducts relations in matters of Cabinet rank with the Commonwealth countries.

Prime Minister's Position. The most apt description of the British Prime Minister's position is the one given by Dr. Jennings, although Lord Morley's that he is primus inter pares, has now become classical. Dawson remarks that the Canadian Prime Minister "cannot be first among equals for the very excellent reason that he has no equals."⁹ The actual authority of the Prime Minister is, indeed, great and his powers potentially enormous. One who appoints and can dismiss his colleagues and is, in fact, though not in law, the working head of the State, he can have no peers. The Prime Minister, therefore, "is, rather, a sun around which planets revolve."

But the Prime Minister's position is bound up with the party. So long as he retains the hold of his party, he is able, within limits, to dictate his policy. But a hold on the party has also an important reference to the relationship of the Prime Minister with his colleagues in the Cabinet. Dawson remarks that the quotation primus inter pares "contains, however, some truth: it calls attention to one very important aspect of this relationship, namely, that the other ministers are the colleagues of their chief and not his obedient and unquestioning servants."¹⁰ A Prime Minister who treats his colleagues as his subordinates and issues orders to his Ministers or interferes persistently in their departmental work heads towards his downfall. Prime Minister Bowell attempted such an attitude and unnecessarily began interfering in the departmental work of their ministries with the result that seven members of his Ministry chose to rebel and he was compelled to agree to the terms dictated by them. Commenting on this outstanding Cabinet rebellion in Canadian history, Dawson remarks, "All members of the Cabinet are responsible to the House; and while they gladly acknowledge the leadership of the Prime Minister and will, in fact, usually bow to his decisions, they can never completely surrender their individual judgment or responsibility."¹¹ The office of the Prime Minister is, as Jennings says, necessarily what the holder chooses to make it and what other ministers allow him to make of it. His power and prestige essentially depends upon his personality and his personality significantly counts in leading the Cabinet, Parliament and the nation.

9. The Government of Canada, p. 221.

10. Ibid.

11. Ibid., p. 222.

CHAPTER III

THE DOMINION PARLIAMENT

Canadian Parliament. The federal legislative authority is vested in the Parliament of Canada, consisting of the Queen, an Upper House, styled the Senate, and a Lower House, known as the House of Commons. The Queen is represented by the Governor-General. The part of the Governor-General in the process of legislation has become little more than formal, for he must follow the advice of his Cabinet. This is the way of the parliamentary system of government. The Senate and the House of Commons are two different institutions having different functions and different characteristics. The Senate is in theory an independent legislative body and the British North America Act, 1867 endows it with co-equal powers, but in practice it usually surrenders before a potent and consistent pressure of public opinion reflected in the votes of the Commons. Democracy demands that the Upper Chamber must not persist, though it should resist, and in strict obedience to this democratic principle the Canadian Senate has cautiously avoided a clash with the popular Chamber. It has, in fact, always submitted to the wishes of the House of Commons. It is really a recording Chamber and Parliament is surely the House of Commons. Yet it is the joint action of the Governor-General, the Senate, and the House of Commons, which law requires, to make legislation possible.

Legislative authority of Parliament. Under Section 91 of the British North America Acts, 1867—1960, the legislative authority of Parliament of Canada extends to the following matters: The amendment of the Constitution of Canada, subject to certain exceptions; the public debt and property; the regulation of trade and commerce; unemployment; insurance; the raising of money by any mode or taxation; the borrowing of money on the public credit; postal service; the census and statistics; militia, military and naval service, and defence; the fixing and providing for the salaries and allowances of civil and other officers of the Government of Canada; beacons, buoys, lighthouses, and Sable Island; navigation and shipping; quarantine and the establishment and maintenance of marine hospitals; sea coast and inland fisheries; ferries between a Province and any British or foreign country or between two Provinces; currency and coinage; banking, incorporation of banks and the issue of paper money; savings banks; weights and measures; bills of exchange and promissory notes; interest; legal tenders; bankruptcy and insolvency; patents of invention and discovery; copyright; Indians and lands reserved for the Indians; naturalization and aliens; marriage and divorce; the criminal law, except the Constitution of courts of criminal jurisdiction, but including the procedure in criminal matters; the establishment, maintenance, and management of penitentiaries. The Dominion Government also exercises all powers which are not specifically granted to the Provinces by the Act of 1867, that is, residuary powers.

In addition, under Section 95 the Parliament of Canada may make laws in relation to agriculture and immigration concurrently with Provincial Legislatures, although in the event of conflict, federal legislation is paramount. By the British North America Act, 1951, it was declared that Parliament may make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada, but that no such law should affect the operation of any Provincial laws in relation to old pensions.

THE SENATE

Need for bicameralism. The democratic demand for bicameral legislature and more so in a federal policy was fully recognized and the British North America Act recognizably provided for one. But the Senate in Canada, unlike its namesakes in the United States and Australia, was not planned to perform a strict federal function. Curiously enough, there was only one suggestion, from the delegates of Prince Edward Island, at the Quebec Conference, that representation in the Upper Chamber should be on the strictly federal basis of equal representation of all the constituent units, big or small. Even this proposal was substantially modified by its proposer almost as soon as it was put forward and today Provinces large and small, are much less concerned with representation in the Senate than representation in the Cabinet: "The most likely explanation of this lack of assertiveness on the part of the small provinces," observes Dawson, "is that the conference (Quebec) regarded this feature of the American Constitution as one of the grave dangers implicit in the doctrine of State rights."

Another departure from the federal principle was the mode of appointment of the members of the Senate. The American experience with an elected Chamber had not impressed the delegates of the Quebec conference. They were convinced that inasmuch as responsible government was identified with the Lower Chamber, it was not desirable to create a possible rival by making the Upper Chamber as an elected body. The conference, therefore, decided to have the members of the Senate appointed for life by the Governor-General.

And, then, the Senate was intended to be "the minor legislative partner," a revising and restraining body. Sir John MacDonald affirmed at the Quebec Conference that the Senate "must be an independent House, having a free action of its own, for it is only valuable as being a regulating body, calmly considering the legislation initiated by the popular branch, and preventing any hasty or ill-considered legislation which may come from that body, but it will never set itself in opposition against the deliberate and understood wishes of the people." The Senate was, also, intended to represent property and conservatism. In the sixties when the Constitution for the Union was being discussed, there existed much distrust of "pure democracy." MacDonald and his associates were anxious to preserve minority rights and to erect bulwarks against the unheeded democratic tide. They desired to establish a constitutional system wherein "naked popular majorities" would not solely dominate and "the sudden gusts of popular passion" would be controlled. "The right of minority," remarked Sir John, "must be protected, and the rich are always fewer in number than the less rich."¹

The Fathers of the Canadian Constitution, therefore, sought to establish a Second Chamber which should reflect the will, not of more numbers, but of those with special position. Sir John MacDonald claimed that all colonial leaders at the Quebec conference believed that the basic principles of the British Constitution should be conserved, "namely that classes and property should be represented as well as numbers." And in accepting an appointed Chamber with distinct property qualification, the Senate was brought closer to the House of Lords and ensured, as Brady remarks, "the nineteenth century Whig ideal of a balanced representation of social interests."²

Composition and term. From an original membership of 72, the Senate, through the new addition of new provinces, now has 102 members, the latest change in representation having been made on the admission of New Foundland in 1949. The break-up is 24 members from each of the four regions and six from New Foundland appointed for life. The division into four regions is: (1) Ontario; (2) Quebec; (3) the Maritime Provinces (10 Senators are allotted to Nova Scotia, 10 to New Brunswick and 4 to Prince Edward Island); and (4) the Western Provinces (6 Senators being allotted to each of the four provinces of Manitoba, British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan). If at any time on the recommendation of the Governor-General the Queen thinks fit that four or eight members be added to the Senate, the Governor-General may appoint them, but the number of Senators must not at any time exceed 110. That is the legal maximum limit.

Section 23 of the British North America Act provides that a Senator must be at least thirty years of age, a natural-born or naturalised subject of the Queen, resident within the Province in which he is appointed and possesses property, real or personal, to the value of four thousand dollars. In the case of Quebec, he must be a resident of the electoral district for which he is appointed. A Senator, though appointed for life, loses his seat for any of the following reasons: (i) if for two consecutive sessions of Parliament, he fails to attend the Senate; (ii) if he takes an oath of allegiance or makes a declaration of allegiance to a foreign power or does an act whereby he becomes a subject or a citizen of a foreign power; (iii) if he becomes bankrupt or insolvent or a public defaulter; (iv) if he is attainted of treason or convicted of felony or of any infamous crime; (v) if he ceases to be a resident of that Province by shifting to some other; and (vi) if he resigns his seat in the Senate.

The salary of the Senator now is $8,000 with $2,000 allowance. The Speaker of the Senator is appointed by the Governor-General and he receives a salary of $23,000. 15 members constitute a quorum. The Speaker always has a vote. In case of equality of votes the decision is considered to be in the negative. The Speaker, accordingly, does not have a casting vote to decide the issue.

1. Refer to Alexander Brady's Democracy in the Dominions, p. 71.

2. Ibid., p. 72.

"Senatorship has been invariably regarded," writes Dawson, "as the choicest plums in the patronage basket, and they have been used without compunction as rewards for faithful party service." Appointments are made, as a rule, purely on party lines, although every Prime Minister admits that the system is unsatisfactory as it promotes narrow party interests. And yet every Prime Minister continues with it. There is only one solitary example when Sir John A. Macdonald appointed an opponent, John Macdonald, a Liberal. Party appointments undermine the efficiency of the Senate. Summing up the system of appointments, Dawson says, "There is no doubt that many of those appointed are a credit to the Senate; there is no doubt that the system is most useful as an instrument of party discipline and service; but there is equally no doubt that the chief purpose underlying these appointments is not the public good, but party patronage and advantage, and that this is reflected in the general low regard in which the Senate is popularly held."

Powers of the Senate. The British North America Act, 1867, does not define or limit the powers of the Senate excepting that the House of Commons has the sole power to originate all Bills for the raising or spending of money. The absence of any specific provision gives to the Senate co-equal legislative powers with the Commons. But taking into consideration the intentions of the Fathers of the Constitution that the Senate was to act as a revising and restraining body to deal with possible errors or impulses of the Commons, and the fact that the Ministry is responsible to the Lower House as the prime guardian of expenditure, and survives only as long as it commands support from that House, the Ministry introduces all important legislation and defends its policies in the House of Commons. There is another important reason for the exclusion of the Senate. Since the twenties of the present century and as a result of the precedents set by Mr. Mackenzie King, only one Minister and that too without Portfolio sits in the Senate. This fact reduces the significance of the Senate in the enactment of laws and in the control of policy. Ministers introduce all important legislation in the Commons where they sit as members and are able to defend such legislation.

The tendency of Ministers to introduce all their measures in the House of Commons has, thus, deprived the Senate of any major part in the initiation of legislation. During recent years there has been an extraordinary change and between 1946-53, 138 Bills were introduced in the Senate as compared with 36 between 1924-45. The explanation of this increase lies in the fact that between 1946-53, "Parliament has been overhauling and consolidating the bulk of the Canadian Statutes, and the Cabinet has generously allowed the Senate to participate in this very arduous labour." But this practice, Prof. Dawson observes, "cannot be extended indefinitely, if for no other reason than that the really able, energetic, and willing Senators are relatively few." Private Bills usually originate in the Senate.

But once Bills reach the Senate, after they have passed the Commons, its effective participation ensues by proposing amendments or rejecting the entire Bill if the Senators desire. The Senate has never taken the position that its powers of rejection and amendment are absolute and independent of public opinion, "but it has ventured to oppose the Commons on the ground that the measure was not only inadvisable but that the Lower House had no popular mandate for this particular proposal." It rejected the Old Age Pensions Bill in 1926, but accepted it next year because the Bill had received the mandate of the electorate at the new general elections and the government initiating it had been returned to office. There has, thus, established a sort of 'mandatory convention' as in Britain. Both the Senate and the Lords do not reject a Bill on which the mandate of the electorate has been obtained.

In revising Bills the Senate does really useful work. Bills are often sent from the Commons badly drafted, hastily assembled, and, in some instances, almost unworkable. Senators have more leisure and fewer distractions than the members of the House of Commons. The talent and wider experience of some Senators make it possible for them to improve the Bills in a logical shape and draftsmanship. Then, they have no specific electorate to placate and they speak less to the gallery, for in truth there is seldom a gallery in the Senate. The investigatory work of the Senate's Standing Committees and Special Committees is also often distinguished. Detailed examination of the measures before the Senate is done in the Standing Committees at which the public may be invited to present their views and even members of the Cabinet may appear to give information and explain a particular proposal.

With regard to financial measures the British North America Act definitely states that Money Bills originate in the House of Commons.⁴ The Senate's power to amend them is a matter of dispute between the two Chambers. The Act itself is silent on this point. The House of Commons, taking precedent from its counterpart in Britain, asserts that the Senate has no power to amend Money Bills. The Standing Rules of the Commons clearly state that "All aids and supplies granted to His Majesty by Parliament of Canada, are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all Bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the House, as it is the undoubted right of the House to direct, limit, and appoint in all such Bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, limitations and qualifications of such grants which are not alterable by the Senate."⁵ The Senate has "indignantly rejected" this right of the House of Commons. It has been maintained that such a power to be exclusively exercised by the Commons is an addition to the Constitution. The Senate argues that when the British North America Act explicitly refers to the origination of the Money Bills in the Commons, the omission of the Act with regard to amendment or rejection of Money Bills by the Senate is conclusive evidence that no restriction on its power was ever intended. The Senate also has urged that if it is to earnestly act as the guardian of the Provincial rights, it must have the power to interfere in financial legislation.

These are only theoretical arguments. In practice the Senate has repeatedly amended Money Bills. "At such times," writes Professor Dawson, "it has not been at all uncommon for the Lower House to acquiesce in the Senate's amendments while adding the quite futile clause that the incident was not to be considered as precedent"⁶. The Senate does not openly reject a pure Money Bill. It amends it, but when it puts amendments which are not acceptable to the Commons, it is tantamount to its power of rejection. And here the power of the Senate is superior to that of the House of Lords, which functions under constitutional limitations, as provided in the Act of 1911.

4. Section 53.

5. House of Commons Standing Orders and Rules, No. 61.

Apart from its legislative and financial functions, the Senate has successfully conducted investigations at different times into current political and social problems. A Special Committee of the Senate held an inquiry in 1946, into the operation of the War Income-Tax Act and Excess Profits Tax Act and it did the job admirably well. Such inquiries can most fruitfully be conducted by the Senate, and every year there are innumerable inquiries which demand some scrutiny and drastic overhauling, and the Senate has the leisure, ability and freedom to investigate them.

Senate, a Weaker Chamber. The Senate was intended to be the "minor legislative partner" and this intention of the Fathers finds expression in the two Constitutional provisions. One relates to the composition of the House of Commons which provides that it will be an elected Chamber. Whatever be the reasons for an appointive Senate, this single provision gives to the Commons the unquestioned position of eminence and authority as a representative Chamber. An elected Chamber is the mirror of public opinion and it must translate into practice the policy which has been endorsed by the people at the general elections. This is the first principle of a democratic government. Secondly, representation and taxation go together. Section 53 of the British North America Act gives powers to the House of Commons by providing that all Bills for the raising or spending of money shall originate in the House of Commons.

Apart from these two Constitutional provisions, the eminence and the authority of the House of Commons, and consequently weakness of the Senate, depends upon the practices of the parliamentary system of government. The essential feature of such a system of government is the responsibility of the Cabinet to the representative Chamber and the Constitution ordains that the representative Chamber is the House of Commons. Once these three fundamental propositions are put in their proper context the position of the Senate becomes permanently settled, although there may be still room for development and adjustment of the functions which fall within the areas of the two Chambers.

There are certain functional weaknesses of the Senate too. Critics regard it as a sleeping beauty which neither acts as an effective brake to the hasty and ill-considered legislation passed by the Commons, nor does it properly serve the purpose of revision. Sir George E. Foster in the course of a debate remarked, "Who on the street asks to know what is the opinion of the Senate upon this or that question? Who in the press really takes any trouble to know whether the Senate has any ideas, and if so, what they are upon any branch of legislative concern or upon conditions which require the best and most united work of all in order to arrive at a successful conclusion." There are others who regard the Senate merely as a House of echoes. Sir J.A. Marriot writes, "It will be observed that the Canadian Senate attempts to combine several principles, which if not absolutely contradictory, are clearly distinct. Consequently, it has never possessed either the glamour of an aristocratic and hereditary Chamber, or the strength of an elected assembly, or the utility of a Senate representing the federal as opposed to the national idea. Devised with the notion of giving some sort of representation to provincial interests, it has, from the first, been manipulated by party leaders to subserve the interests of central executive."

6. Government of Canada, op. cit., p. 349.

But Professor Dawson is of the opinion that despite the severe handicaps from which the Senate suffers, it has been able to do some genuinely useful work. "It revises and checks legislation sent up from the Commons and it takes by far the greater part of the load of private Bill legislation from overworked Commons. It has, however, not been a conspicuous success in guarding the rights of provincial or other minorities, although this was one of the chief reasons for its creation. Its attitude on social legislation has often been criticised as reactionary, but the evidence on this point is conflicting. The Senate, in short, has its merits, although they fall far short of justifying its continuance in its present form." Professor Alexander Brady says that the relative success or failure of the Senate is a matter of opinion. "Its virtues," he further adds, "have usually been unhonoured or even unrecognised; its defects well publicized. It has failed to rivet on itself wide popular attention and esteem. It is commonly neglected by newspapers, and seldom does it influence profoundly policies and legislation." The Senate, as it is, is a weak Chamber and stands no comparison to the eminence, authority and importance of the House of Commons.

Causes of the weakness of Senate. The first great handicap placed on the Senate was the system of appointment of its members. "The founders of the Dominion," says Professor Dawson, "accepted as inevitable the fact that if the Cabinet appointed the Senators, it would be for party reasons: but even they could scarcely have expected party gratitude to become so dominant a motive." Except for the original appointments made in 1867, which represented all political groups, the Senatorship has always been a party spoils and it had gone to the orthodox members of the party in office who had served it long and with a meritorious credit. Former members of the House of Commons who had been defeated at the general elections or are "too old to battle further for office," moneyed persons who had liberally contributed to party campaigns, and others who had aided their party receive their reward and they constitute a considerable number of the appointees.

The result is, as Professor Brady remarks, "Whatever the zeal and

7. Democratic Government in Canada, pp. 412-13.

8. Democracy in the Dominions, p. 72.

9. Government of Canada, p. 332.

ability of appointees or the depth of their experience—often they are men of distinguished achievement—they can seldom escape in the public mind from the stigma of receiving a reward rather than a call to service.” Leftist parties have been highly critical of such party appointments and have never failed to emphasise the high percentage of Senators who sit on the boards of powerful commercial corporations. Here the Canadian Senate loosely resembles the House of Lords. It has become a fortress of wealth and consequently the Senators are predominantly an economic interest who cannot and do not look to proposals for radical, social and economic reforms with any desirable sympathy. The composition of the Senate, therefore, is fundamentally responsible for the general low regard in which the Chamber is popularly held.

Another result of the composition of the Senate is the “air of superannuated indolence” which Lord Bryce discerned in the House of Lords. Life term of office inevitably leads to a larger number of Senators remaining in the Chamber long after they have passed the age of genuine usefulness. The great bulk of these superannuated members cannot perform their duties with the same energy, zeal and effectiveness as youngmen, and the youngmen have no reason to go to the Senate as it gives them no hope to a future career. The old men go there with the sense of opening up the last chapter of their career. Sir George E. Foster, after his appointment as a Senator, commented in his diary: “How colourless the Senate—the entering gate coming to extinction.”

The Senatorship is, thus, a refuge for those whose active life is almost over,¹⁰ and who are primarily concerned with a pleasant, secure and not very strenuous old age. Gratten O’ Leary succinctly put the issue when he said, “the Senatorship isn’t a job. It’s a title. Also it’s a blessing, a stroke of good fate; something like drawing a royal straight flush in the biggest pot of the evening, or winning the Calcutta sweep: That’s why we think it wrong to think of a Senatorship as a job; and wrong to think of the Senate as a place where people are supposed to work. Pensions aren’t given for work.”

Here is an obituary, quoted verbatim, of Senator Dessaulles who died in 1930, in his 103rd year, and it bears eloquent testimony on the usefulness or uselessness of the Senate:—

“Senator Dessaulles, dead at St. Hyacinthe, who held a seat in the Senate of Canada since 1907, had a remarkable record. So far is recalled by those around the Senate since he was there, he never once participated in any debate or gave expression to an opinion; but he followed the discussions closely and was there when the division bells rang. He was a kindly old man, held by all parties in venerable respect because of his great age.”

The result is clear. The Senate may supply the opportunities to do useful work, but it does not supply at all adequate incentive for work.

10. In the 1945 Senate thirty-three out of the ninety-five had been over sixty years of age at the time of their appointment and this proportion more or less still continues.

Political ambition is there dead. But there is the assurance of a secure existence and the salary is ample. There is, thus, "a general sense of futility in the red Chamber; few people listen to the speeches, the usual drama and excitement of politics are lacking, no vital issues hang on the Senate's votes, there are no reputations to be made, there are no fresh, aggressive, stimulating young minds to satisfy."

More fundamental than the above factors is the fact that despite the formal equality of powers of the two Chambers, the Ministry is responsible to the House of Commons and it survives only as long as it commands support from that House. Before the twenties usually one and occasionally two and even three Senators were included in the Cabinet and they were assigned definite portfolios. But Mackenzie King set a precedent and since then there is only one single Minister from the Senate and that, too, without a portfolio. This reduces the importance of the Senate in the enactment of laws and in the control of policy. Ministers introduce legislation in the House to which they belong and where they can explain and defend their policies and it is in the House of Commons that explanation and defence really matters. The Minister without Portfolio has no portfolio to look after, no policy to defend and no work to account for. It is a sinecure assignment. The Senate and the House of Commons enjoy equal legislative powers, but Money Bills must originate in the House of Commons and its voice is decisive. In case of a deadlock between the two, the Governor-General may appoint four to eight Senators to resolve the deadlock. Since Senate appointments are party appointments, the party in power will naturally make appointments to facilitate its triumph. The opposition of the Senate to the House of Commons matters nothing in the final analysis.

When all legislation originates in the House of Commons in the early part of a session of Parliament, the Senate has no business to transact. It must either wait or adjourn until the legislation of the session comes before it. "Year after year," complained Senator Arthur Meighen, "the services of this House are allowed to slumber for a good portion of the session." It is not uncommon for the Senate to adjourn for long periods immediately after the passage of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. And when it meets, it functions leisurely and the debates are short. In 1938, for example, the Senate sat for 61 days and in 1939 for only 47 days. The debates generally cover less than 10 pages per day of the Hansard. "While the value of the contributions made by the members of the Canadian Parliament," remarks Professor Dawson, "can scarcely be measured by the convenient method of totalling pages of debate, it is difficult to believe that the Senators have achieved so remarkable a brevity without losing much of the content in the prodigious effects of concentration. A perusal of their remarks amply confirms the accuracy of this observation."

The Senate has also not succeeded in protecting property, provincial, and minority rights, although these were the original aims for creating the Upper Chamber in Canada. Professor Mackay has specially gone into this aspect and his conclusions are that the Senate "has no consistent record as an upholder of the rights of the provinces, and the party lines have usually proved stronger than those of the section and province affected." Quebec is the only Province which reposes confidence in the Senate as the protector of its position and culture against encroachment or abuse. Other Provinces are much less concerned with representation in the Senate. They are really concerned with representation in the Cabinet, which in Canada is a truly federalised institution. In the maintenance of rights of other minorities, "the Senate has proved," says Prof. Dawson, "to be of moderate but no exceptional service, although its alertness in Private Bill legislation has been of considerable help in protecting private property rights and public interests against the attacks of predatory corporations."

Abolition or reform of the Senate. The Senate, thus, suffers from its own handicaps and disabilities. It has been characterised as the weakest second Chamber in the world. All the same, it has been by no means a useless body and the Senators have performed a creditable service in revising and amending legislation. The Senators are frequently charged with partisanship, especially when a majority is hostile to the party then in office. "Yet ordinarily," says Professor Brady, "they are less motivated by party loyalty and less regimented by party discipline than members of the Commons. They are not without partisan spirit, and divide into the Government group and the opposition, seated to the right and left of the Speaker. But they are more impartial in discussing Bills, and in committees pursue their task with impressive care." With no specific electorate to placate, they are less inclined to oppose merely for the sake of partisan ends, and speak less to the gallery, for in truth there is seldom a gallery. Being secure in their positions and not being subject to dissolution, like the Lords in Britain, the Senators do not speak with one eye on the reactions of their voters to their speeches. They are responsible to no one, but, then, no one is responsible to them. The result is that although the debates in the Senate are usually brief, yet they are based upon ability and experience and often set a high standard of discussion. The Commons take due cognisance of what the Senators say. Even in financial legislation their voice counts. The question of its abolition, accordingly, does not arise. And democracy needs a second Chamber. Unless it is acceptably proved that democracy does not need a second Chamber, it is not democratic to abolish one in Canada.

But there has been from early times a demand for reforming the Senate, as no one has desired to maintain it in its present unsatisfactory condition. The difficulty of devising a second Chamber is no less acute in Canada than in other countries with parliamentary system of governments. In fact, there are certain special difficulties inherent in the Canadian structure of government. The population of the Maritime Provinces is more generously represented in the Senate than any other main section of Canada and they would be unfriendly to any scheme of reform which would tend to reduce the number of its representatives. Quebec will be no less hostile to any consideration of senatorial reform and it has always been suspicious "of every constitutional innovation, traditionally on the defensive, guarding its culture and institutions against interference from English-speaking Canada."

The Inter-Provincial Conference held in 1927, to discuss senatorial reform decisively rejected the proposal for an elective Chamber and accordingly, it continues to be nominated. "Thus, the Senate," Brady remarks, "remains as it is because no strong interests seek, and many would oppose, its reform and the indifference of the multitude gives it security." As a matter of fact, the question of Senate abolition or reform tends to become an issue with the Opposition or Government when the party balance in the Chamber swings the other way. Senate appointments are frequently used to give not only Provincial representation, but also representation to economic, racial and religious groups in the Provinces and Prime Ministers have very often placated the temporary irritations of minorities.

Some measures of reform, however, may not be impossible within the given framework. The Senate could be utilised to better advantage by initiating more Bills in it. At the same time, the powers of the Senate should be limited, like the House of Lords, so that it could exercise only suspensive veto over ordinary legislation and exercise no control over Money Bills. Ministers should be permitted to introduce Bills and speak in either Chamber, although they would vote only in the Chamber to which they belong, or the practice, as in Britain, may be utilised by placing a number of junior ministers in the Senate, or if more ministers were re-admitted in the Senate their junior ministers may be placed in the Commons.

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Importance of the Commons. "The Canadian House of Commons, although it is not the oldest among the legislative Chambers patterned upon Westminster, is the first wherein representatives from federated colonies convened the inheritor of parliamentary tradition from the colonial legislatures which attained responsible government in the nineteenth century, and the forum for some eighty years where men of French and British descent have discussed their common affairs and achieved that delicate balance of interest on which the Canadian national states rests." The House of Commons is the great democratic organ of State government where public will finds expression and exercises its ultimate political power. It is the "grand inquest of the nation" where policies are discussed and legislative measures are hammered and to which body the executive must turn to justify its public acts and get approval.

Composition and organisation. The fundamental importance of the House of Commons is derived from its representative character. Canada has today full adult suffrage and, generally speaking, every man and every woman enjoys the right to vote if he or she is twenty-one years of age, is a Canadian citizen, has been ordinarily resident in Canada for twelve months preceding the election and has been ordinarily resident in the electoral district at the date of issuing the writ authorising the election. Qualifications for representatives are not given in the British North America Act, but are determined by statute. The present statutory qualifications are simple; the members of the House of Commons must be Canadian citizens and at least twenty-one years of age. Property qualifications disappeared in 1874. All but four of the members are elected from single member constituencies. Two constituencies—Halifax and Queens—elect two members each. The maximum term of the members is five years and the actual duration of membership depends upon the dissolution of Parliament. According to the British North America Act as amended in 1949, the maximum term may now be extended “in time of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection... by the Parliament of Canada if such continuation is not opposed by the votes of more than one-third of the members of the House of Commons.” The usual term is four years. “It has, indeed, become a tradition of Canadian political life that no Prime Minister will allow a term to run for the full five years if it can possibly be avoided.” This is based on experience as well as on other practical considerations.

Section 37 of the British North America Act, 1867, had provided that the House of Commons shall consist of 181 members. Further, under Section 51, it was enacted that, after the completion of the census of 1871 and each of subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four Provinces should be readjusted. Membership of the House of Commons was accordingly increased from time to time until it reached 255. In 1949, as a result of the Union of New Foundland, provision was made for its representation by seven members. This increased the membership of the House to 262. By Chapter 15 of the Statutes of 1952, the Parliament of Canada amended Section 51 of the British North America Act, providing for a new method of readjustment of representation of the House of Commons. Pursuant to this amendment a new Representation Act was passed, providing for a total of 265 members of the House of Commons.

A member of the Canadian House of Commons, unlike his fellow member in Britain, is allowed to resign his seat. A member receives $10,000 a year, $2,000 of which represents a tax exemption allowance. Absence from the sitting of the Houses is penalized. A member is allowed 21 days unexcused absence and for every day missed over that number, $60 is deducted from his total payment.

The Opposition. The Opposition occupies an essential place in Constitutions based on the British Parliamentary system. Like many other institutions in Canada, such as the Prime Minister and Cabinet, the Opposition, too, is founded on unwritten customs.

The choice of the Canadian electorate not only determines who shall govern Canada, but by deciding which Party receives the second largest number of seats in the House of Commons, it designates which of the major parties becomes the official Opposition. The function of the Leader of the Opposition is to offer intelligent and constructive criticism of the Government and its policies. If it succeeds in overthrowing the Government, the Leader of Opposition might form the Government. If Parliament is dissolved on the advice of the Prime Minister and electorate approves the policy of the Opposition by returning it in majority at elections, its leader becomes the Prime Minister.

Although the position of the Leader of the Opposition is not recognized in the British North America Act, it received statutory acknowledgment in Canada in 1927. The Senate and the House of Commons Act of the year provided for an annual salary to be paid to the Leader of the Opposition in addition to the indemnity as a Member of the House. In 1963, the Senate and the House of Commons Act was further amended to provide for an annual allowance to each member of the House of Commons (other than the Prime Minister or the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons) who is the leader of the party that has a recognised membership of 12 or more persons in the House.

Similarity between the British and Canadian procedure. In structure, Rules and Procedure the Canadian House of Commons inherits the British parliamentary customs and usage. The general principle is that whenever a matter of legislative practice or procedure is not modified or replaced by the Canadian House, the usages and the customs of the British House of Commons will be followed.

Immediately after the general elections the Governor-General-in-Council summons the House of Commons and after taking the oath the members proceed to elect their Speaker. The name of the candidate for Speakership is conventionally proposed by the Prime Minister and seconded by a member of the Cabinet and almost invariably the Opposition parties express their approval. In Britain, a Speaker of the last Parliament is always re-elected irrespective of party changes or his own party affiliation. In Canada, on the other hand, a new Speaker is usually chosen for each Parliament, and he must belong to the Government Party. This practice enables the House to alternate more frequently the Speakers from English and French Canada; the convention being that if the Speaker of one Parliament is of British origin, the Speaker of the next Parliament must be a French Canadian, and both the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker must not come from the same race.

The duties of the Speaker are as onerous as that of his prototype in Britain. He presides over the deliberations of the House, maintains decorum, puts questions to the House, reads any motion or resolution and protects the person of the members from insult. He maintains the conduct of debate in accordance with the rules and practices of the House and is the guardian of the power, the dignities, the liberties and the privileges of the House. The Speaker votes only in case of a tie.

After the election of the Speaker the House breaks, but it reassembles shortly before the time appointed by the Governor-General when the Usher of the Black Rod announces that the Governor-General desires the attendance of the House in the Senate. The Governor-General then reads Speech from the Throne outlining the policy of the Government and the legislation which it intends to bring in Parliament in the coming session. After the Speech had been delivered, the commons return to their Chamber. The Speech comes before the House for discussion on a Motion of Thanks from the Treasury Benches. It gives an opportunity to the Opposition to offer criticism against the policy of the Government and the Leader of the House—the Prime Minister—gives his explanation for pursuing such a policy. When the House adopts the Motion of Thanks, it expresses the confidence in the Government.

The basic procedure in the passage of public Bills is the same, and here, again, Canada follows Britain in making distinction between Government Bills, Private Members' Bills, and Private Bills. The procedure is that Bills receive three readings in the House, three in the Senate, and then go to the Governor-General for his assent. In case of differences between the two Houses, a conference is held between representatives of each House to discuss and if possible to reconcile differences. If agreement is not reached, the Governor-General may nominate four to eight Senators to resolve the deadlock; the position similar to one available in Britain to create more peers to resolve the deadlock between the Lords and Commons prior to 1911. The Canadian Committee system also resembles the British Committee system; the Committee of the Whole, the Select Committees, and the Standing Committees. The procedure followed herein is also similar.

Functions of the Commons. Theoretically both the Houses, Commons and the Senate, possess co-equal legislative powers. But with the stabilization of the parliamentary government and because of two specific provisions in the British North America Act, 1867, i.e., the Senate is appointive whereas the House is popularly elected and that all Money Bills must originate in the Commons, the House of Commons has become the pivot of all legislation and the Senate is lost in oblivion. Bills may be introduced in either House, but Bills imposing any charge on the people or making any grant for the services must originate in the House of Commons. The Rules of Procedure lay down that "all aids and supplies granted to His Majesty by the Parliament of Canada are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all Bills for granting such aid and supplies ought to begin with the House, as it is the undoubted right of the House to direct, limit and appoint in all such Bills the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants, which are not alterable by the Senate." Money Bills must be introduced by the Ministers.

The House of Commons must invariably ratify all the measures which the Cabinet submits, but in the process of making laws it provides an opportunity to discuss and criticise. In fact, the deliberative function is a part of the legislative function of Parliament wherever the parliamentary system of government exists. The most important function of the Opposition is to criticise matters of administration and policy-making and, thereby, to make the Government to defend its intentions and practices. Even the opinion expressed by members of the majority party may carry enough weight to bring about substantial modifications in the Cabinet's proposals. The Opposition may also be able to secure a few modest concessions. No government, whatever be its majority, can remain oblivious of the criticism of the Opposition. A government which neglects the Opposition does so at its own peril, because the lapses of the Government are the opportunities of the Opposition and it uses them to appeal to the public opinion. Nor is the Government insensitive to the reactions of its own followers. Signs of unrest against its policy in the constituencies, amongst interest groups or on the part of a sufficient number of back-benchers may lead to changes in the Government's plans and proposals.

A vital aspect of the critical function of the House of Commons is its power of controlling the executive, or its power of general supervision. The responsibility of the Ministry to the House of Commons involves a constant control of the House over the Government. Indeed, control and responsibility go hand in hand. The House of Commons exercises its control in two ways. The first is the constant demand in the House for information about the actions of the Government and this is done through the medium of oral or written questions. The members of the House are given opportunity normally on three days in a week to address questions to Cabinet Ministers concerning various phases of public affairs. Supplementary oral questions are sometimes allowed, but they are not very common, and are definitely not encouraged. The House may conduct investigations into the administration of departments and, thus, bring out the activities of the Government into the light of publicity.

The second is the criticism that is regularly aimed at the Government. This is done when Laws are made and the policy of the Government is under review. The best opportunity for the Opposition to criticise the policy of the Government as a whole is when it debates the Speech from the Throne. Discussion of public finance, more especially of proposals for expenditure, offers a very real opportunity for discussion and criticism. If the Opposition, for example, disapproves the Government's foreign policy, it uses the debate on appropriations for the Foreign Office as an occasion for criticism.

In addition to these regularly scheduled debates, the normal occasion for criticism of the executive is the debate on a motion of adjournment. A member may ask leave to move the adjournment of the House "for purposes of discussing a matter of urgent public importance." If the Speaker decides that the matter is urgent and at least twenty members support him the motion is allowed. If less than twenty but more than five support him, the question of leave is at once referred to the House for a decision. The most direct method of launching an attack on the Cabinet is the motion of no confidence. Motion for a vote of no confidence is really a crucial occasion in the life of the Cabinet, because it decides its fate. So long as a Government can command a comfortable majority, it is not possible for such a motion to get through, still it creates embarrassments in the ranks of the Ministry. Amendment to a Government's motion of an immediate attack on a Government measure inferentially becomes an issue of "no confidence." There are times when a Cabinet may itself take the initiative and demand a vote of confidence from the House as it was done in January, 1926.

The House of Commons is a selective body. It is here that the national talent is exhibited and the members make their mark. The House does not actually pick the Cabinet, but the fact that the Cabinet must always be able to retain the support of a majority of the House gives the Chamber a negative power of choice. The House selects ministers indirectly in yet another way. "It provides the rigorous environment in which ministerial talent must prove its worth and establish its right of office. The prospective ministers usually serve an arduous apprenticeship in the House; and while many cease to be serious contenders long before their party comes to power or vacancies occur in the Cabinet, the few able survivors have had ample opportunity to develop their capacity before they are called upon to assume office."

And, as Professor Laski observes, there is "no alternative method that in any degree approaches it."¹¹

The House of Commons educates and leads public opinion on many questions. All that comes before the House of Commons had not been before the people at the time of the general elections and their mandate could not be obtained thereupon. Many matters are new and many problems emerge out of the national and international movement of events which could not be anticipated. The House talks, argues, investigates, opposes, decides, and very often postpones action on various matters, and while doing so it arouses interest and helps to create a more enlightened opinion throughout the country. Referring to this process in Britain, and it is equally applicable in Canada, Professor Ivor Jennings says, "So the discussion radiates from Westminster in waves of ever-decreasing elasticity. Arguments are transmitted, prevented, simplified, perhaps distorted. A "Common opinion" develops, and creates new waves which find their way back to Westminster. They set going new arguments in the smokeroom and more formally in the House. In their turn these arguments produce new rays which go back to the ordinary people. In this way there is a constant interchange between Parliament and people which does produce a constant assimilation of opinion. . . . The purpose of Parliament is to keep them (the Cabinet) in touch with the public opinion, and to keep public opinion in touch with the problems of government."¹²

Finally, the House of Commons is a unique institution of national importance "which present in condensed form the different interests, races, religions, classes, and occupations, whose ideas and wishes it embodies with approximate exactness." In the land of diversity it brings unity. The representatives of the people of all shades and opinions, languages and religions, territories and occupations meet together, talk and discuss their viewpoints, hammer the issues and reconcile the differences in order to present to the people one single united policy. The House is, thus, to use Mill's phrase, "the nation's committee of grievances and its Congress of opinions," the members of which, with their varied experiences and diverse samplings, are genuinely and actively concerned with the promotion of the national welfare. This gives a strength to the government of the time and enables the Cabinet to proceed with far more assurance and certainty to work which lies before it. Mr. Mackenzie King declared in the gloomy days of 1940, "I can say frankly to honourable members that it is a source of comfort rather than the opposite to have Parliament in session at a time such as this. I say that quite sincerely. There is comfort in the sense of knowing that where the situation is as serious as it is, the body of the people's representatives are here and can express freely their views, as can the Government its views and what it is doing, in a manner which it is not possible to do through the press. . . . I would not wish a long period to elapse, with the country and the World in the state in which it now is, without having an opportunity of consulting with members of Parliament and having them fully informed with respect to what the Government is doing."

11. A Grammar of Politics, p. 300.

12. Parliamentary Reforms, pp. 18-19.

CHAPTER IV

THE JUDICIARY

The system of Courts. The system of Courts obtainable in Canada possesses certain characteristics which are due to the federal nature of the Dominion. But it has not followed the American idea of what a system of Courts should be under a federation. In the United States there are two sets of Courts, Federal and State, distinctly constituted and with well demarcated jurisdiction. Within their own field of jurisdiction the Supreme Court of the United States and the Supreme Courts of Appeal in the States are the final Courts of Appeal. In certain circumstances a dispute may be transferred from one to the other. For example, if a case involves the interpretation of the Constitution or a federal statute, it may be transferred from the jurisdiction of a State Court to that of a Federal Court. Such transfers, however, do not make the rule and a case will normally finish in the system in which it originated.

The British North America Act establishes two systems of Courts, Federal and Provincial, but the dividing line between them is horizontal rather than vertical. The Dominion is empowered to create a general court of appeal and may establish "any additional courts for the better administration of laws of Canada."¹ The Provinces exercise jurisdiction over "the administration of justice in the organisation of provincial courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matter in those courts."² Procedure in criminal matters is within the competence of the Dominion. The Dominion also controls the appointments, the remunerations and the removal of judges of the Dominion and Provincial Courts (with a few minor expectations).³ The great majority of cases will originate in one of the Provincial Courts and can go up to the Supreme Court of Canada on Appeal, and until 1929 from there to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Britain. The Exchequer Court of Canada, which is a Dominion Court, has been given a specialised jurisdiction, and is, accordingly, not like a Federal Court on the American model.

Under Section 99 of the British North America Act, 1867, the Judges of the superior courts hold office during good behaviour but are removable by the Governor-General on address of the Senate and the House of Commons. By virtue of the British North America Act, 1960, Judges of superior courts now cease to hold office upon attaining 75 years of age. The tenure of office of county court judges is fixed by the Judges Act as being during good behaviour, and their residence is required to be within the county or union of counties for which the court is generally established.

1. Section 101.

2. Section 92, Sub-section 14.

3. Sections 96—100.

The Federal Judiciary. The Parliament is empowered under Section 101 of the British North America Act to provide, from time to time, for the Constitution and organization of a general Court of Appeal for Canada and for the establishment of any additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada. Under this provision, Parliament has established the Supreme Court of Canada, the Exchequer Court of Canada and certain miscellaneous courts.

The Supreme Court of Canada. At the apex of the Canadian system of Courts is now the Supreme Court. It was established in 1875, under the express authority of the British North America Act, to exercise appellate civil and criminal jurisdiction for the Dominion of Canada. Originally, it consisted of a Chief Justice and five judges. The number of judges was raised to six in 1927, and, then, to eight in 1949. The Court is now governed by the Supreme Court Act, 1962. The Chief Justice is now designated as the Chief Justice of Canada. It is a Bench of nine judges appointed by the Governor-General-in-Council and they hold office during good behaviour with compulsory retirement at seventy-five. The judges can be removed from office by the Governor-General-in-Council following an address of the Senate and the House of Commons. The Chief Justice receives a salary of $25,000 a year, and the other members of the Court $20,000. The Court sits at Ottawa and exercises general appellate jurisdiction throughout Canada in civil and criminal cases. The Court is also required to consider and advise upon questions referred to it by the Governor-General-in-Council and it may also advise the Senate and the House of Commons on Private Bills referred to the Court under any rules or orders of the Senate or the House of Commons.

Appeals may be brought to the Supreme Court from any final judgment of the highest Court of final resort in a Province in any case where the amount or value of the matter in dispute exceeds the sum of $10,000. An appeal may be brought from any other final judgment with leave of the highest Court of final resort in the Province. If such court refuses to grant leave, the Supreme Court may grant leave to appeal from any judgment, whether final or not. Appeals in respect of indictable offences are regulated by the criminal code. Appeals from the Federal Courts are regulated by the statute establishing such courts.

The Supreme Court is also a final Court of Appeal and its judgment is conclusive in matters of constitutional interpretation, and in cases, where validity of a Dominion and Provincial statutes is in dispute.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was until very recently the final court of appeal for Canada for all but criminal cases. This had eclipsed the position of the Canadian Supreme Court. For a very long time, therefore, it had been a growing feeling in Canada that to send appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in London was below the dignity of a nation marching towards statehood. Attempts were made on various occasions to abolish it, but this could not be accomplished. When the Statute of Westminster, 1931, removed the limitations on the competency of the Canadian Parliament, criminal appeals were abolished in 1933. An amendment to the British North America Act passed in 1949 provided an authority for the Parliament of Canada to legislate in respect to constitutional matters and in the same year a Canadian Statute abolished all appeals to the Privy Council and made the Supreme Court a court of final appeal in all cases. Its judgments in all matters are conclusive.

The Exchequer Court. The Exchequer court was originally closely associated with the Supreme Court of Canada, but the two were separated in 1887. It now consists of the President and five other Judges appointed by the Governor-General-in-Council. They hold office during good behaviour, with compulsory retirement at seventy-five, and are removable by the Governor-General-in-Council on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

The Court has original jurisdiction with the Provincial Courts in cases involving the revenues of the Crown, and exclusive jurisdiction over suits brought against the Crown in federal affairs. It also deals with claims against the Crown for property taken for any public purpose or injuriously affected by the construction of any public work, and claims against the Crown arising out of any death or injury to person or property resulting from the negligence of any officer or servant of the Crown while acting in the discharge of his duties upon any public work. It hears cases regarding patents, copyrights, trade marks, and industrial designs. It also exercises jurisdiction over certain classes of railway cases. The Exchequer Court also acts as a Court of Admiralty and in this capacity has original jurisdiction as well as jurisdiction in appeal.

The Provincial Supreme Court. Each of the Provinces has its own Supreme Court or Courts of Appeal with jurisdiction over all cases within the Province, subject to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. The judges are appointed by the Governor-General-in-Council and they hold office during good behaviour. These Courts, like the other major Provincial Courts, are, as already stated, under both Dominion and Provincial control. The Province constitutes, organises and controls the Courts, and determines the procedure in civil matters, while the Dominion appoints, pays, and removes judges.

County Courts. There is a County Court in every county, although one County Court Judge may be given the assignment of another county. The county judges are appointed by the Governor-General-in-Council during good behaviour. As in the case of the Provincial Supreme Court, the Province has control in the constitution, organisation and maintenance of the County Courts while the Dominion appoints, pays and removes the judges. The County Courts have jurisdiction over civil cases involving small amounts and matters relating thereto, such as, actions arising out of contract, personal actions, cases regarding trespass, rights of way, partnership, etc. If the parties agree, however, the jurisdiction may be extended to cover any amount. They have also authority to try cases involving major criminal offences and here the judge may sit with a jury.

Minor Provincial Courts. These Courts may be of different kinds and are entirely under Provincial control as to organisation, maintenance, and also to appointment, pay, and the conditions of service. Unlike the higher Courts, the tenure of these officers is at pleasure. Minor Courts deal with the estates of deceased persons, civil cases relating to minor personal actions, breaches of contract, debts, etc., involving small amounts. Magistrates' courts are set up under the Magistrates Act for the trial of designated minor criminal offences and a few civil cases under special statutes. Finally, there are other minor courts such as Juvenile Courts and Family Courts in large towns and cities, coroners' courts and courts of arbitration.

CHAPTER V

POLITICAL PARTIES

The Party System in Canada. The democratic government as it is understood and practised in Canada simply cannot function without well organised political parties. Like various other institutions inherited from the mother country, the Canadian statesmen in the early days of federation adopted the same pattern of political parties and even gave them the same names, the Conservatives and the Liberals. It does not, however, mean that there had been no other political party beyond the two. Third parties have frequently arisen, but none of them has yet been in a position to challenge effectively the predominance of the Liberals and Conservatives. But the main items in the party programmes were included by a "sheer chance of the cards." Thus, the Conservatives became protectionists and the Liberals opposed such a policy. It is really surprising that in a country inhabited by two races of different languages and religions these differences have not accounted for the division of the parties, although they have occasionally been assisted in the climb to power by skilfully exploiting sectarian and racial jealousies, especially on the issues of bilingualism and denominational schools.

The most important characteristics of the political party system in Canada are, therefore: (1) there is no clear-cut line of division of affinities among the people. Each party commands allegiance from the people in different walks of life. The rich and the less rich, for one can hardly talk of the poor in Canada, the farmers, merchants, manufacturers, shopkeepers, professional men have been found in both the major parties. The Canadian party system is, accordingly, not based upon any distinct ideology. Party membership is the result of chance. (2) The party feelings in Canada do not introduce bitterness in society. No party in Canada can go very far unless it derives support from two or more regional areas in the Dominion and as a consequence of this a national party must take as its primary purpose the reconciliation of the widely scattered aims and interests of a number of these areas and bring together people possessing divergent interests and beliefs. The differences within the parties are, thus, frequently more acute than between the parties themselves. (3) Canada has consistently followed the two-party system and it is only within the past thirty years or so that the third parties have emerged. The political parties in Canada have acquired a prominence hitherto unknown. The emergence of the Labour Party and the organisation of the farmers into a separate party with definite objects are threatening to the two-party system, as they challenge claims of the other association to represent adequately the diverse interests within the nation.

Canada has now four political parties: the Conservative Party, the Liberal Party, the Labour Party and the Farmers' Party.

The Conservative Party. The origin of the Conservative Party may be traced back in 1857, when a number of separate groups in the Province of Canada brought together a temporary coalition, which proved afterwards to be permanent, under the name of Liberal-Conservative. It was composed of extreme Tories, moderate Liberals from Upper Canada, together with French moderates, and some English-speaking members from Lower Canada. The coalition soon fell under the leadership of John A. MacDonald, who, by dint of his domineering personality and afterwards prompted by a dogged desire to see confederation established in Canada, was able to weld the members together. He drew members from other groups and Provinces and, thus, formed a genuine political party. So strong a hold it afterwards exercised on the people that the party was able to retain office, with but one five-year interval, until 1896.

The role and outlook of John A. MacDonald and the Conservative Party have been compared to those of Hamilton and the Federalists in the United States. This is correct, and MacDonald and his successors in the leadership of the Conservative Party often paid genuine tributes to Hamiltonian doctrines. Like the Federalists, the Conservatives stood for centralisation, identified themselves with the propertied, commercial and industrial interests, and above all with these interests succeeded in solving the practical task of nation-making. The centralising influences and the policy of unifying the people of diverse interests, origins and beliefs into one single whole found expression in the national policy of a protective tariff, in the construction of the trans-continental railway, and in many other policies which were directed towards that end. Economic nationalism was, therefore, considered the best means of welding the people in a community of different interests and aspirations. And this continues to be the policy of the party even now and its programme includes schemes of social insurance, abolition of child labour, fixing of minimum wages and maximum hours of work.

The Liberal Party. The origin of the Liberal Party remains hazy, but it, undoubtedly, goes back to the early reformers who fought for responsible government. After the establishment of the Confederation, however, the separate elements in the Provinces did not put any energetic effort to combine themselves and constitute a genuine political party. Many of the Liberals had opposed the confederation and when it came into being, they became lukewarm. But the centralizing policy of the Conservative Government prompted them to defend the rights of the Provinces. The Liberals, or the Clear Grits, as they were called in Upper Canada, were inspired by Jeffersonian ideas and his Anti-Federalist Party. There was another close resemblance between the Liberals and the Anti-Federalists. Both were based on a frontier agrarian democracy with distinct radical tendencies. "The Clear Grits were indeed," writes Prof. Dawson, "definitely influenced by the successors to the Jeffersonians, the Jacksonian Democrats. They were opposed to wealth and privilege in any form, and they favoured soft money, universal suffrage, frequent elections, and various other 'republican' measures well known south of the border." Another group which was affiliated with the Liberals was the Rouge party from Quebec. It was anti-clerical and had aroused the opposition of the Roman Catholic Church and after Confederation it had definitely declined in size and importance. To these two elements were joined some reformers, secessionists and independents from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

The first Liberal Government came into power in 1873, after the Pacific Scandal, when all the three groups, the Clear Grits, Quebec Rogue, and the Progressive Liberals, combined together under the leadership of Alexander Mackenzie, although the groups acknowledged also a separate allegiance to their own leaders. Various factors were responsible for the defeat of the disunited Liberals and their remaining in the wilderness for about almost two decades. When Laurier became the Liberal leader in 1887, he welded the different groups and made a genuine national party. Laurier had realized the urgent need for national unity. "Brilliant in speech, masterly in tactics, Laurier warned his countrymen from the Conservative loyalty, attached them to his own Gladstonian Liberalism, and sought no less skillfully than MacDonald to win support throughout the whole country by emphasizing the policies of material expansion. He exalted the spirit of compromise whereby alone a national leader in Canada could survive. Above all, he purged the Liberal creed of anti-clericalism of the Rouge Group, and, thus securely anchored his party in the French Province." Laurier's successor was Mackenzie King and he followed the high ideals and traditions set by his leader with strict fidelity with the result that Mackenzie King could command in Quebec even more unqualified support. And from 1887 to 1948, for full sixty-one years, the Liberal Party had two leaders to twist its destiny whereas the Conservative Party had ten during this period. "From this unbroken continuity of political strategy it derived great prestige and formidable weight." It continues to retain its strength in Quebec and obtains enough support in other regions and is the most truly national party in Canada. It was ousted from office by the Conservatives in the elections of 1957. The Liberals returned to power in the next elections.

The Liberal Party stands for low tariffs and does not advocate the interference of the State in the economic life of the country. It still champions the rights of the Provinces and the Sovereign status of Canada within the British Empire. It stands for making trade agreements not only with the members of the British Empire, but also with the foreign countries. The analysis of the programmes of the Conservative Party and the Liberal Party will reveal that the former stands for economic nationalism whereas the latter for political nationalism and the truth is that political and economic nationalism are merely twin sisters with little difference.

The Farmers' Party. Since the consolidation of the national parties in the eighties and the nineties to the commencement of the Second World War third parties have periodically arisen and jeopardized the position of the dual party system. One of the serious threats came from the agrarian interests which had always commanded substantial electoral weight and at intervals assailed the privileges enjoyed by the urban areas. The Grange was the first extensive agrarian organisation in Canada to express an agrarian interest and the fertile parent of others. Since then there appeared many agrarian parties in the Provinces extending their activities to the unification of agrarian interests all over the country. The Farmers' Party proposed the immediate abolition of tariff on many raw materials, on all foodstuffs, and on certain machinery, increase in the Imperial Preferences, graduated taxation on personal and corporation income and large estates, assisted land settlement for veterans, public ownership of coal mines and all public utilities, and numerous public reforms, such as abolition of patronage, Senate reforms, proportional representation, and the initiative, referendum and recall.

The movement made its great advance in Ontario in the Provincial election in 1919, which resulted in the formation of a Farmer-Labour Government. Two years later the United Farmers of Alberta came to power. In the Dominion election in the same year the Farmers, or Progressives, carried 65 seats in the House of Commons. But soon they petered out. The most important reason for their failure was the un-remitting efforts of the Liberals to absorb them both by direct attack and infiltration. By 1926 they dwindled into 25 and were divided into three different groups. Today, the Farmers' party remains only a provincial party.

Labour Party. Organised labour has played a much less active and creative role than the farmers. Prior to 1939 the labour movement was industrially and politically weak, and produced no party with sufficient electoral strength to achieve more than a meagre representation in some legislatures. This is due to the socio-economic causes. In 1932, however, the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation was formed in order to pool together their political interests. The C.C.F. was able to make some general appeal to members of all occupations. It has a socialist programme and contemplates a new social order based upon sweeping economic changes. It advocates socialisation of all financial agencies, transportation, communication, and public utilities, social insurance—covering old age, illness, accident and unemployment—freedom of association, socialised health services, crop insurance, encouragement of co-operatives, abolition of the Senate, etc.

CHAPTER VI

CONSTITUTIONAL DEVELOPMENT IN THE COMMONWEALTH

The British Empire. In recent years a great deal has happened to the British Empire. By 1921 it had expanded to its greatest size, embracing an area of about 13,600,000 square miles with its population about 448,000,000. This computation is made by totalling the homeland of the United Kingdom, the Dominions, the Crown Colonies, the Empire of India, and the enemy-occupied territory to become mandates. The rule since then of its peaceful losses is also spectacular. The Dominions of Eire and Burma have become Republics; the mandate of Iran and Jordan Kingdoms; the mandate of Palestine, the Republic of Israel; the protectorate of Egypt, a Republic. British Somaliland joined with its neighbour the Trust Territory of Somaliland to form an enlarged and independent Somalia in 1960. In 1961 the Southern Cameroons ceased to be a British dependency and moving out of the Commonwealth, formed with the neighbouring Republic of Cameroon, the Federal Republic of Cameroon. South Africa ceased to be a member of the Commonwealth on becoming a Republic on 31st May, 1961. Since then many more colonies in Africa have become Sovereign and independent States. The changes made in the nomenclature of the group of countries and territories now generally known as the Commonwealth of Nations bear witness to constitutional developments in those countries and to alterations in their relationship with each other. In the Balfour Declaration of 1926, the Prime Ministers agreed that their countries were "autonomous communities within the British Empire.... freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations," and in the Commonwealth Declaration of 1949, their successors agreed that the countries "united as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations" would "remain united as free and equal members of the Commonwealth of Nations." Thus, the British Empire "glided quietly and decorously into the 'British Commonwealth of Nations' and the 'British Commonwealth of Nations' slipped unobtrusively into the 'Commonwealth of Nations' without anybody precisely saying so or depriving anybody else of the pleasure of belonging to the Empire, or the British Commonwealth, or the Commonwealth, or even the British Commonwealth and Empire."¹

From Colonies to self-governing Dominions. The unique international position and powers of the self-governing Dominions had their origin with the earliest colonial settlements. The immigrants from the United Kingdom not only brought with them English language, but also the Anglo-Saxon traditions of civil liberty and self-government reinforced as they were by the Magna-Carta, the Bill of Rights and the Habeas Corpus Act. They transplanted all these traditions, in fact, the whole fabric of the Common Law in their new homelands. The actual control over the overseas acquisitions of the Crown in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries was often slight and the colonists of Massachusetts almost at once denied the authority of Parliament over them, yet they were not prepared to claim absolute independence from the Crown and establish their international status. The revolt of the thirteen colonies and the final recognition in 1782-83 of their independence was followed by a strong reaction on the part of the British Government, "which felt that the disaster had been due to failure to exercise due control over the potential republics of the west, and a regime of strict supervision replaced that of laissez-faire." Many measures were enacted which completely reversed the principle of representative government and political self-expression, that had hitherto marked out British colonies as distinct from those of any other nation. The autocratic government so established could not fail to arouse the resentment of the people, particularly in Canada, who had grown up in an atmosphere of political freedom and had long enjoyed representative institutions. They insisted on their right to enjoy the British civil law, habeas corpus, trial by jury, and, above all, representative government.

1. Jennings, I., and Young, C.M., Constitutional Laws of the Commonwealth, p. 1.

The first half of the nineteenth century witnessed the steady economic and political development of British North America, and "as the colonies increased in importance and virility so that dissatisfaction with their government increased also." Many predicted that no effort on the part of the British Government to hold the colonies could in the nature of the things be successful and in a few years "the inherent centrifugal forces would gain control and the colonies would once again declare their independence."

When Lord Durham came to Canada as Governor-in-Chief of all the five Provinces he "found two nations warring in the bosom of a single State." The two major recommendations which he made in his Report (popularly known as the Durham Report) to the British Government in order to restore order and tranquillity were: (1) the re-union of Upper and Lower Canada, and (2) the immediate grant of responsible government. He thought that responsible government was the most efficacious cure for most of the ills of the colonies. He suggested the division of subjects between the Imperial and Colonial Governments. The Governor as head of the colonial administration would follow the advice of his Council in matters of colonial concern, but, as the agent of the British Government, he would follow the policy and instructions of that Government and see that his Colonial Ministers and Assembly did not interfere and encroach upon matters concerning the Imperial Government. "The matters which so concern us," wrote Lord Durham in his despatch, "are very few. The constitution of the form of government—the regulation of foreign relations, and of trade with the mother country, the other British colonies, and foreign nations—and the disposal of the public lands, are the only points on which the mother country requires a control." The first major recommendation of the Durham Report as well as a number of other minor ones were implemented by the Union Act of 1840. But the Act made no mention of responsible government.

A change of government in England in 1846 brought Earl of Grey to the Colonial office and Grey was prepared to give to Durham's proposal of responsible government, a fair trial. The way was paved for him when Sir John Harvey and Lord Elgin were appointed Governors of Nova Scotia and the Province of Canada respectively. In his despatches from the Colonial office Grey laid down the lines on which he felt the change to responsible government should be made. The first opportunity came in Nova Scotia when, following a general election, a direct vote of want of confidence in the administration was carried by the Assembly on January 25, 1848. The Governor's Executive Council resigned two days later and the new Premier, J.B. Unaike, was asked to form a government the same day. In March of the same year the government of the Province of Canada was similarly defeated and immediately a new government came into office in its place. The same principle was asserted almost simultaneously in New Brunswick, and three years later it was conceded in Prince Edward Island. New Foundland achieved responsible government in 1855. In this way responsible government came to be established without being given any statutory recognition. It was found entirely in custom and usage.

Lord Durham and others had clearly realized that responsible government could only function there successfully by judiciously separating the Imperial from local affairs. But the line of demarcation between the Imperial and local affairs had never been clear and obvious and the Governors very often exercised their discretionary powers and overruled their responsible ministers in order to protect the paramount Imperial or external interests. In fact, the broad division made by Durham himself was a limit, upon the area of colonial jurisdiction, and, therefore, a limit upon self-government. But as "the general right of Dominion self-government," observes Dr. Evatt, "became more fully recognized, the question of dispute between Governor and Ministers came to relate to such questions as the true extent of the Governor's discretionary authority, and the nature of the reserve power of the Crown exercised by the Governor."² This was, however, a gradual process, covering nearabout seventy years, till they reached their logical destination in 1926 and 1931 when the full equality of Great Britain and the Dominions was formally declared. The Colonies became the self-governing Dominions.

From Colonial to Imperial Conferences, 1887-1914. The Imperial Conferences, known before 1907, the Colonial Conferences, constituted an important landmark in the development of the self-governing colonies and in establishing co-operation between Great Britain and her overseas possessions. The first Colonial Conference was held in London in 1887, at the time of Queen Victoria's Jubilee. Representatives of all Colonies participated in this conference and exchanged views with the members of the British Government on matters of common interest. The second Colonial Conference met after ten years in 1897, and was attended by the Prime Ministers of Canada, New South Wales, Victoria, New Zealand, Queensland, Cape Colony, South Australia, New Foundland, Tasmania, Western Australia and Natal. The main purpose of this conference was to exchange views with the representatives of the Colonies, in an informal and friendly manner without coming to any binding decisions which the Colonial Governments might feel reluctant to carry out. In fact, the conference usually avoided putting controversial measures to a vote, but it did discuss important matters like the Imperial federation, Empire defence, and reciprocal tariff preferences.

2. Evatt, H.V., The King and His Dominion Governors, p. 29.

The conference of 1897 definitely ruled out the idea of Imperial federation, but it did make useful suggestions with regard to inter-Imperial co-operation in defence, commercial and immigration matters. The general attitude of the representatives of all the Colonies was as a rule opposed to any decided centralizing movements, and in favour of maintaining the separate powers of each self-governing unit.

In 1902, at the time of the coronation of King Edward VII, the third Colonial Conference was held. It was, then, decided to create some permanent body to keep up the spirit of mutual co-operation. The conference of 1907 was very important for various reasons. In the first place, it changed its style from Colonial to Imperial conference. Secondly, the conference "paying a graceful compliment to Canada, formally adopted the style Dominion to denote those parts of the royal possessions, other than the United Kingdom, which had attained the full measure of responsible government, and had ceased to be dependencies."³ Thirdly, the conference gradually moved on from discussions of defence to foreign policy. Although the British Government was quite explicit in asserting that it alone could be held responsible for that policy, yet the earlier ban on such discussions was being slowly removed.

The 1911 Imperial Conference listened to the Foreign Secretary submit a long and careful exposition of the Empire foreign policy. In the years immediately before the outbreak of the World War, Dominion Governments were given additional information from time to time concerning defences and allied matters. Summing up the position of the Dominions up to the breaking of War, Dawson writes, "thus by 1914 Canada and other Dominions were completely self-governing in all their internal affairs, and they were also beginning to acquire substantial powers in external relations. So far as commercial treaties were concerned, the realities of power had already passed over to the Dominions, and with political treaties there had been some progress in the same directions. The Dominions had even made a modest debut at international gatherings of a minor nature. In Empire matters affecting one another, each self-governing part tended to follow its own course, subject, however, to fairly continuous informal consultation with the United Kingdom and a general consultation from time to time through the Imperial Conference. But in formulating foreign policy the Dominions had virtually no share; and in the more vital matters of declaring war, making peace, appointing diplomatic agents, and participating in major international gatherings the Dominions had no share whatever."⁴

3. Keith, A.B., Dominion Autonomy in Practice, p. 1.

4. Dawson, R.M., The Government of Canada, p. 58.

Imperial Conference of 1917. The First World War began a new chapter on the development of the Dominion status. "The drive behind this movement was the Dominions' conspicuous war effort, which gradually built up in each a strong national consciousness of its individuality, its power, and its importance. For a year or two of the War this feeling grew slowly, but it then rapidly mounted and remained at a high level. It found expression in a general conviction throughout the Dominions that their efforts and sacrifices should be recognised as a fair measure of their maturity, and that they were therefore entitled to a far greater control of their destinies than heretofore." The Imperial Conference of 1917, accordingly, resolved that any readjustment of constitutional relations (between the Dominions and Britain), "while thoroughly preserving all existing powers of self-government and complete control of domestic affairs, should be based upon a full recognition of the Dominions as autonomous of an Imperial Commonwealth, should recognise their right to an adequate voice in foreign policy and in foreign relations, and should provide effective arrangements for continuous consultation in all important matters of common Imperial concern and for such necessary concerted action founded on consultation as the several governments may determine."

In pursuance of this resolution of the conference all Dominion Prime Ministers were summoned to meet with the British War Cabinet as an Empire Cabinet, which proceeded to discuss and decide questions of high policy and the general conduct of the War. Dominion representatives in the following months held other meetings of the same nature with the British Cabinet. Later they took part in the deliberations of the Paris Peace Conference, and signed the peace treaties. When the League of Nations was established, the Dominions became its original members and were given seats in their own right on the governing bodies of the League.

Imperial Conference of 1926 and Balfour Declaration. The Imperial Conference of 1926 appointed a Committee, with Lord Balfour as Chairman, to investigate all matters of inter-Imperial relations. The Balfour committee explicitly defined the political status of the self-governing Dominions and stated that in their position and mutual relations Great Britain and the Dominions "are autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the Crown, and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations...." The statement or the Balfour Declaration, as it is often called, recognised and accepted the complete equality in status of the United Kingdom and the Dominions, an equality which was manifest not only in international affairs but also within the Empire. The British Commonwealth was to remain united under a common King, and subordination, either in law or in practice, was to give way to association and co-operation among autonomous partners.

The Balfour Declaration further stated that it was an essential consequence of the equality of status that "the Governor-General of a Dominion is the representative of the Crown, holding in all essential respects the same position in relation to the administration of public affairs in the Dominion as is held by His Majesty the King in Great Britain, and that he is not the representative or agent of His Majesty's Government in Great Britain or of any Department of that Government." The Conference, then, proceeded to discuss a number of points implied in the Balfour Declaration and declared that:

(i) disallowance of Dominion legislation by the British authorities and reservation by the Governor-General were obsolete;

(ii) it was desirable to repeal a number of British statutes which still applied to the Dominions;

(iii) the retention of judicial appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England should rest entirely with the Dominion concerned;

(iv) each Dominion should possess complete treaty-making authority, acting through the King, but on the advice of the Dominion Cabinet;

(v) neither the United Kingdom nor any Dominion could be committed to active obligations in foreign affairs without the definite assent of its own government;

(vi) all parts would profit by exchange of information, consultation, and, at times, co-operation in foreign affairs, and new arrangements for consultation and communication between one part of the Empire and another should therefore receive special consideration.

Imperial Conference of 1930. In spite of these declarations the conference still left a number of inequalities untouched, and arrangements were made for a meeting of experts, consisting of the representatives of the United Kingdom and the Dominions, to consider how these could be removed. This body so set up is known as the Conference on the Operation of Dominion Legislation and the Merchant Shipping Legislation. The Conference submitted its Report in 1929 which was considered at the Imperial Conference of 1930. The Imperial Conference concurred with the Report and advised necessary legislation by the Imperial Parliament to give legal recognition to the status of equality contained and defined in the Balfour Declaration, and to remove the constitutional restriction in the path of the Dominions to achieve that status.

STATUTE OF WESTMINSTER

Main provisions of the Statute. The Statute of Westminster Bill was introduced in the House of Commons on November 12, 1930, and after covering the various stages there and in the House of Lords, it received the Royal assent on December 11, 1931. The Africa Statute of Westminster was entitled "an act to give effect to certain resolutions passed by Imperial Conferences held in the years 1926 and 1930." The Preamble to the Statute of Westminster recognised that "the Crown is the symbol of free association of the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations" and declared that as "they are united by a common allegiance to the Crown, it would be in accord with the established constitutional position of all the members of the Commonwealth in relation to one another that any alteration in the law touching the succession to the Throne or the Royal Style and Titles shall hereafter require the assent as well of the Parliaments of all the Dominions as of the Parliament of the United Kingdom." It was, thus, admitted that no Parliament in the British Commonwealth ought to amend the succession to the Throne or the Royal Style and Titles, except in agreement with the others. The position of the King acquired a new meaning. He was the King of Canada and Australia not because he was the King of the United Kingdom, but because he was the King of Canada, and the King of Australia separately from the King of the United Kingdom; several monarchs wrapped up in one person, but each was completely divorced from the rest.

The third paragraph in the Preamble declared that "whereas it is in accord with the established constitutional position that no law hereafter made by the Parliament of the United Kingdom shall extend to any of the said Dominions as part of the law of that Dominion otherwise than at the request and with the consent of that Dominion." Section 4 of the Statute also provided that no law of the United Kingdom should in future extend to any Dominion as part of the law of that Dominion, otherwise than at the request of that Dominion. The identical provision in the Preamble was interpretative of Section 4 of the Statute. Section 4 was not considered adequate due to the possibility that judges might hold that Parliament of the United Kingdom was Sovereign and no Parliament could enact a law limiting its powers for ever and thereby bound its successors. The third paragraph of the Preamble was, accordingly, put in order to strengthen the provisions of Section 4. What the Preamble declared in a constitutional convention and this "particular convention is formally stated in order that it may be quite clear that legislation which is perfectly legal may, nevertheless, be a breach of convention."⁵

Section 2 of the Statute repealed the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, and enabled the Parliament of a Dominion to repeal Imperial legislation applying to the Dominion as part of the law of the Dominion. Three questions were raised by this provision. The first was that it enabled the Dominion to repeal its own Constituent Statute and, thus, the Dominion Parliament was empowered to amend or repeal its Constitution Act, though it was an Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom. The Union of South Africa and the Irish Free State, accordingly, used this section of the Statute of Westminster to amend their Constituent Acts. It was decided by the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of South Africa in Ndlwana v. Hofmeyr that the Union Parliament was competent to do so. The Irish Free State went further by providing itself with a new Constitution, becoming Eire, and finally legislating for itself out of the Commonwealth. In Canada the Provinces urged that the Dominion Parliament should not have the power to amend the British North America Acts and, accordingly, Section 7 was inserted in the Statute of Westminster to prevent the conferment of any such power by Section 2. Thus, the Parliament of the United Kingdom amended the British North America Acts.

5. Jennings and Young, Constitutional Law of the Commonwealth, p. 125.

The second question was whether a Dominion Parliament had power to amend the royal prerogative, especially in relation to appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which were governed partly by legislation and partly by prerogative. This question was answered in the affirmative by the Privy Council itself in Morre v. Attorney General for the Irish Free State, British Coal Corporation v. The King, and Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for Canada. Thus, in consequence of the powers conferred by the Statute of Westminster, the Parliament of Canada was enabled in 1933 to abolish criminal appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

In the third place the question was raised whether the power to repeal or amend "any existing or future Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom" included a power to repeal or amend the Statute of Westminster itself. Though none of the Dominions had done so in express words, in substance the Statute was amended by South Africa in the Status of the Union Act, 1934, and by New Zealand in the Statute of Westminster Adoption Act, 1947; and it was in effect repealed either by the Irish Free State in the Constitution of Eire or by the Republic of Ireland Act, 1948. "It must, however, be emphasised," observe Jennings and Young, "that such amendments and repeals take effect only in the law of the Dominion: a Dominion Parliament has no power to amend or repeal the Statute as part of the law of the United Kingdom. Thus the secession of Eire had to be effected in the law of the United Kingdom (but not the law of the Eire) by an Act of its own Parliament, the Ireland Act, 1949." But South Africa seceded by its own law on May 31, 1961.

The Statute also declared, vide Section 3, that a Dominion Parliament had the power to enact laws having extra-territorial operation. The Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890, and the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, were no longer to apply to the Dominions.

Dominion Status in Application. The Statute of Westminster, thus, gave legal recognition to the principle of equality of status defined in the Balfour Declaration and reinforced by the Imperial Conference of 1930. It came to be statutorily established that the Dominions enjoyed complete autonomy in their internal and external affairs and the ties which bound them together with Great Britain were of equality and not of subordination. The allegiance of the Dominions to the reigning monarch of Great Britain did not assign to them a place of inferiority so far as their relations with the British Government were concerned. He was as much their King as he was of Great Britain, several monarchs wrapped up in one person completely distinct from one another. The King acted on the advice of the Dominion Ministers in all matters relating to the administration of the Dominion. In South Africa, the Union Parliament passed in 1934 the Royal Executive Functions and Seals Act, a companion Act to the Status of the Union Act, which made it possible for all the executive functions of the Union to be exercised, whether by the King or the Governor-General, upon the advice of the Union Ministers. When in 1939, the King was to visit Canada in person, and it was desired that he should participate personally in some of the formal functions of government, a difficulty arose, because, by law, he could perform those functions only through the use of British Seals and these Seals were under the control of his British Ministers and they could not be taken away from Britain. The Dominion Parliament, accordingly, passed the Seals Acts of 1939 to make it possible for the King to take part personally in Canadian Government.

This change in the position of the King, ipso facto, brought change in the position of the Dominion Governor-General. He represents now not the King of the United Kingdom, but the King of the Dominion concerned. The Governor-General is, no doubt, appointed by the King, by letters patent issued under the Royal Sign Manual, but in the selection His Majesty is guided by the advice of the Dominion Ministry. The Dominion Ministry recommends the appointment to the King and the advice so tendered is invariably accepted. Britain simply checks up the availability of the person so advised to be appointed if he happens to be her national. The Governor-General occupies a position in relation to the conduct of public affairs in the Dominion similar to that which the King occupies in relation to the conduct of public affairs in Great Britain. He is a constitutional head and the actual exercise of powers and rights associated with the office of the representative of the King belongs to His Majesty's responsible ministers in the Dominion.

The Dominions are free to make any law they like, even amend or repeal their Constituent Acts,⁶ and there is no limit on their legislative powers. No Dominion statute can be declared void because it is repugnant to the law of the United Kingdom, and that no act of Parliament in Britain is to extend to a Dominion unless it declares that the Dominion has requested and consented to its enactment. The Governor-General cannot veto any law passed by the Dominion Parliament or reserve it for the assent of the King. The Dominions are also free to administer their own laws and have them interpreted by their own courts without interference from or subordination to Great Britain. There are some laws and conventions which may appear to impose certain limitations over the legislative sovereignty of the Dominions, but if at all there are limitations they are not real limitations since the Dominions possess full liberty to abolish, repeal, or amend them.

According to law, appeals may be taken from the Dominions to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in London. But this is hardly a restriction. It is open to the Dominion Parliament to abolish such a provision. Canada abolished criminal appeals in 1933, and in 1949, a Canadian statute abolished all appeals to the Privy Council and made her own Supreme Court the final Court of Appeal in all cases. The King has the prerogative of mercy, but it is, again, open to the Dominion Parliament to regulate or cancel such a prerogative.

The principle of equality of status can be discerned more in the conduct of the external affairs and the mutual relations of the Dominions. In this context equality of status means that each Commonwealth government is the final judge of what its policy in any matter should be and of the extent to which it should co-operate with the other governments in the conduct of external affairs. This follows naturally from the fact that each government is responsible to its Parliament for the policies that it pursues and for the manner in which it applies them. The membership of the Dominions as original members to the defunct League of Nations and to the United Nations now are important to establish their independent status. Then, every Dominion has the right of being represented in foreign States through its own ministers. They can and have carried on independent negotiations with foreign States on commercial and allied subjects and concluded treaties through their own ministers consistent with their own respective policies and programmes. The Dominions also possess the right to renounce obligations in respect of treaties to which they had not been parties. For example, none of the Dominions accepted the obligations imposed by the Locarno Pact of 1925, which was negotiated and signed by Great Britain without the consent of the Dominions.

6. Constitutional Laws of the Commonwealth, p. 132.

The Dominions have the right to join or abstain from war in which Great Britain may be engaged.—It is now a settled doctrine that no Dominion need take steps to aid the Commonwealth in any war which has not been brought about by its own action. The action of the Dominions on the outbreak of the Second World War in 1939, furnished an instructive contrast to the practice of 1914. Australia and New Zealand considered that the British declaration of war included them as well. Eire declared her neutrality. The South African Government of General Hertzog moved a motion of neutrality in the Union Parliament which was, however, defeated by 80 votes against 67. The Hertzog Government resigned and the new Government under General Smuts came into power and South Africa declared war on September 6, 1939 whereas England had declared it on September 3. Canada did the same after a lapse of seven days. Mr. Mackenzie King, the Prime Minister, in his speech to Parliament on September 7, 1939 maintained, "...; and may I add the further statement, that such action as this government is taking today it is taking in the name of Canada as a nation possessing in its own right all the power and authority of a nation in the fullest sense. The action we are taking today, and such further action as this Parliament may authorize, is being and will be taken by this country voluntarily, not because of any colonial or inferior status vis-a-vis Great Britain, but because of an equality of status. We are a nation in the fullest sense, a member of the British Commonwealth of Nations, sharing like freedom with Britain herself, a freedom which we believe we must all combine to save."

Subsequent developments have flowed steadily in the one direction. The War itself, the formation of the activities of United Nations, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, the Australia-New Zealand-United

7. Mansergh, Nicholas, Documents and Speeches of British Commonwealth Affairs, Vol. 1, p. 468.

States Pacific Security Council, the Korean War, and so forth, have all furnished irrefutable evidence that the Dominions are now independent nations in the fullest sense of the word. Finally, the Dominions are independent to recognise or refuse recognition to a particular State. Recognition by Great Britain does not mean a recognition by the Dominions or a similar action by one Dominion is binding on the rest.

Intra-Commonwealth relations. The mutual understanding and sympathy and the close co-operation which for so long characterised the relations of different members of the Commonwealth are nevertheless still maintained, though now they arise between autonomous powers dealing with one another as equals. Every day there is a race of confidential communications passing from one capital to another, special missions and delegations are sent from one country to another to gather information on schemes of development or to discuss matters and projects of common interest and benefit, officials are exchanged on subjects of common concern, meetings and consultations occur at different levels with an occasional conference of Prime Ministers to settle matters of great moment, as on the European Common Market. The Commonwealth, today, can still be best explained in the often overlooked part of the Balfour Declaration of 1926, where it was said, "Free institutions are its life blood. Free co-operation is its instrument." Mr. Lester Pearson, the Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs, explained on June 18, 1953, the relations between Canada and the other nations of the Commonwealth. He observed, "Outwardly and inwardly Canada has come of age, but she has no desire to leave the Commonwealth family in which she has grown up. The last war and its aftermath have seen my country accept responsibilities in the international field which we would hardly have contemplated before 1939. We are no longer much concerned with the assertion of a nationhood which we can take now for granted. We are more concerned with the search for ways by which, without jeopardizing what is essential to our own national freedom, we may share the international responsibilities which all free peoples will accept if liberty is to be maintained and security established....The Commonwealth....is capable of significant co-operation and collective action. Furthermore, there is in the Commonwealth always the desire to work together, to see each other's point of view, even when that desire does not express itself in immediate agreement....When divisions rack the world, plain friendship between nation and nation is worth more than we often realize."

Secession. Some authorities on constitutional law are of the opinion that the Dominions have acquired, under the provisions of the Statute of Westminster, the right to secede from the Commonwealth. Dr. Keith holds a contrary view and says that "the Union of the parts of the Commonwealth is one which cannot be dissolved by unilateral action." Jennings and Young consider the position from the point of view of the law of that country and according to the laws of the other parts of the Commonwealth including the United Kingdom. They maintain, "The conclusion is, therefore, that a Dominion (other than Canada and Australia) can secede under its own law, but that an Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom would be necessary in order that the secession might have effect by the law of the United Kingdom."⁸⁰ But this is hardly necessary. Status in international law depends on the recognition of the community of nations. If any one of the Dominions were to secede, it would most certainly receive international recognition and the fact that the United Kingdom law was not altered by such a secession would be of small importance.

Secession is so fundamental a change that it could not have been the intention of the Parliament of the United Kingdom to authorize it. There is nothing about it in the Reports of the Imperial Conferences, though a good deal had been said about it. The Constitution of Eire, 1937, was passed by the Oireachtas under the amending power of the Constitution of 1922 (as amended by the Statute of Westminster). It declared that the Eire was a "sovereign, independent, democratic State." But the Constitution of Eire did not repeal the Executive Authority (External Relations) Act, 1936, which recognised the King as the symbol of co-operation between the countries of the British Commonwealth. Eire, accordingly, did not secede from the Commonwealth, though it had become a sovereign, independent, democratic State. But on Easter Monday, 1949, it ceased to be a Dominion, seceding from the British Commonwealth of Nations, when the Republic of Ireland Act, 1948, replaced the Executive Authority (External Relations) Act, 1936 and declared that Eire was an independent republic under the name of the Republic of Ireland. South Africa seceded in 1961.

India became a Dominion under the Indian Independence Act, 1947, and consequently it conferred on it all the powers conferred on the Parliaments of the older Dominions by the Statute of Westminster. It, therefore, had power to repeal all legislation of the United Kingdom applying to India and it was expressly provided that it had power to repeal the Indian Independence Act itself. Except that the jurisdiction of the Privy Council was abolished by the Abolition of Privy Council Jurisdiction Act, 1949, the Constituent Assembly did not in any way regulate the relations between India and the United Kingdom until the new Constitution of India came into operation on January 26, 1950. The Constitution declared India "a Sovereign Democratic Republic" and Article 395 of the Constitution repealed the Indian Independence Act, 1947, and the Government of India Act, 1935 and thereby seceded from the British Commonwealth "united by a common allegiance to the Crown." But India agreed to remain a member of the Commonwealth by "accepting King as the symbol of the free association of its independent member nations and as such the Head of the Commonwealth." Thus, allegiance to the Crown ceased to be regarded as the essential pre-requisite of membership of the Commonwealth. The Crown's position now is that of the symbol of association. If a nation wishes to be a member of the Commonwealth it must accept the Crown as the symbol of its free association with other Commonwealth countries.

This nature of the Commonwealth brings the question of secession into still more prominence. Though the chances may be remote at this juncture of world tension for any Commonwealth country to secede, yet legal prohibitions, if any, altogether disappear. Prime Minister Nehru made the point clear in his speech to the Constituent Assembly of India on May 16, 1949. He said, "we join the Commonwealth obviously because we think it is beneficial to us and to other causes in the world that we wish to advance. Other countries of the Commonwealth want us to remain there because they think it is beneficial to them. It is mutually understood that it is to the advantage of the nations in the Commonwealth, and therefore, they join. At the same time, it is made perfectly clear that each country is completely free to go its own way; it may be that they may go, sometimes go so far as to break away from the Commonwealth." South Africa's example typifies Prime Minister Nehru's contention.

8. Constitutional Laws of the Commonwealth, op. cit., p. 146.

The changing Concept of the Commonwealth. The Commonwealth has, thus, changed in composition since the Second World War, and in doing so has again demonstrated its extraordinary ability to adapt itself to a changing environment. Ireland and South Africa have seceded, so have India and Pakistan as Dominions. Both India and Pakistan are in the Commonwealth and though both do not owe allegiance to the Crown, they accept it "as the symbol of the free association of its independent member nations and as such Head of the Commonwealth." Referring to the position of the King as the symbol of free association... and head of the Commonwealth, the Prime Minister of India maintained in his broadcast on May 10, 1949: "It must be remembered that the Commonwealth is not super-State in any sense of the term. We have agreed to consider the King as the symbolic head of this free association. But the King has no function attached to that status in the Commonwealth. So far as the Constitution of India is concerned, the King has no place and we shall owe no allegiance to him." Sardar Patel, too, expressed exactly the same opinion in the course of his address to a Press Conference, held at New Delhi on April 28, 1949. When Sardar Patel was asked by one of the correspondents what the functions of the King would be as the head of the Commonwealth, he replied, "so far his functions are concerned, they are hardly any. But he gets a status."

Winston Churchill said in the House of Commons on February 11, 1952, in moving address of sympathy on the death of George VI that "The House will observe in the Royal Proclamation the importance and significance assigned to the word 'Realm'. There was a time—and not so long ago—when the word 'Dominion' was greatly esteemed. But now, almost instinctively and certainly spontaneously, the many states, nations and races included in the British Commonwealth and Empire have found in the word 'Realm' the expression of their sense of unity, combined in most cases with a positive allegiance to the Crown or a proud or respectful association with them." The dropping of the word 'Dominion' in the Association Proclamation appeared to many students of Commonwealth Relations to be one more step towards what is sometimes spoken of as "The end of the Dominion Status." It may be submitted that there is no decline in the status of Dominion when the word 'Dominion' is dropped therefrom. The use of the word 'Dominion' itself is conventional. It was used by the Imperial Conference of 1907 to distinguish the more or less self-governing parts of the Empire from the non-self-governing parts. The phrase 'self-governing Dominions' was soon shortened to the 'Dominions' with the word 'self-governing' understood, but undefined. In the years intervening 1907 and 1926, 'self-governing' became more and more to mean free from control from the United Kingdom or by any other government and in 1926 equality of status was declared to be the true criterion of the Dominions and, thus, the use of the word Dominion Status. The legal consequences of the equality of status of the Dominions or Dominion status were carried some stages farther in the Statute of Westminster.

Thus, the terminology in the Commonwealth relations is changing and it has to change with the changing composition of the Commonwealth. It would be appropriate to replace it by 'Member Status' or 'Realm Status,' because of the change in the Royal Style and Titles which has been brought about since the accession of Queen Elizabeth and is in accord with current constitutional practice. In a way, it is happy to end the use of the term 'Dominion' or 'Dominion Status.' The popular opinion attached to 'Dominion Status' carries with it some notion of inferiority to the United Kingdom, "some historical memory of subordinate status, of adolescence, of the mother Country's apron-strings." The use of the term 'Member Status' or 'Realm Status' has no such association, and as Dr. Wheare points out, "It contains no embarrassing reminders of past subjection." It applies to all self-governing, independent nations, who are members of the Commonwealth, no matter whether they owe allegiance to the King or not. Independence and equality were the essential characteristics of the Dominion Status and this is precisely the meaning and implication of the 'Member Status' or 'Realm Status.' This is the importance and significance assigned to the word 'Realm' as Churchill declared in the House of Commons on February 11, 1952. The Commonwealth is, thus, not a static organism. As the product of evolution, it is capable of adapting itself; as it has done so successfully in the past, to changing circumstances and needs.

SUGGESTED READINGS

- | | |
|----------------------------------|---|
| Baurinot, John | : Canada. |
| Borden, R.L. | : Canadian Constitutional Studies. |
| Bradley, A.G. | : Canada. |
| Brady, Alexander | : Democracy in the Dominions. |
| Bryce, J. | : Modern Democracies , Vol. I, Chaps. XXIII—XXVII. |
| Clement, W.H.P. | : The Law of the Canadian Constitution. |
| Dawson, R.M. | : Constitutional Issues in Canada. |
| Dawson, R.M. | : The Government of Canada. |
| Durham, Lord | : Report on the Affairs of British North America. |
| Evatt, H.V. | : The King and His Dominion Governors. |
| Jennings, I., and Young, C.M. | : Constitutional Law of the Commonwealth. |
| Keith, A.B. | : The Constitution, Administration and Laws of the Empire. |
| Keith, A.B. | : Dominion Autonomy in Practice. |
| Keith, A.B. | : The Dominions As Sovereign States. |

The Government of Switzerland

CHAPTER I

THE COUNTRY AND ITS PEOPLE

Special interest in Swiss democracy. Switzerland is the ethnological as well as the geographical centre of Europe. It is a landlocked country situated in the heart of Western Europe covering an area of 15,976 square miles with a population numbering about four and a half million. It borders for over a thousand miles upon three large neighbours—Italy, Germany and France—as well as on smaller Austria and tiny Liechtenstein. No natural boundary marks it off from the Germans to the north and east, from the French to the west and from the Italians to the south. Its central Alpine position has made it the source of several international rivers: the Rhine, flowing northward into the North Sea, the Danube and the Po flowing south-eastward into the Black Sea and into the Adriatic, and the Rhone flowing south-westward into the Mediterranean. All these rivers spring or receive affluents springing from the Swiss Alps and pass through or touch upon the territory of ten foreign countries.

The Swiss people are not a homogeneous whole. They sharply differ in race, language, religion, and even to a certain extent in civilisation. Yet in this diversity is to be found the unity of the Swiss nation, and Switzerland presents to the world the most striking example of not only a united people, "but one of the most united, and certainly the most patriotic, among the people of Europe." Secondly, as a result of her geographical position and her small size, Switzerland has succeeded in remaining aloof from the wars of Europe and in becoming a centre of world activity by virtue of an internationally guaranteed neutrality. The neutrality of Switzerland was guaranteed by the Congress of Vienna in 1815 and reaffirmed by the League of Nations in 1920 and it formed the anchor of the nation's foreign policy during both World Wars.

Switzerland was the first in the world to experiment with republican institutions, and the only one State in Europe which has always been a republic. When the United States was born as an independent nation, Switzerland had behind it a republican tradition of some five hundred years. The impact of these republican institutions has been profound on the United States and other countries adopting the democratic way of political life. It is a government, moreover, under which the principles of direct democracy have been extensively applied. These devices of direct democracy were first adopted by the State of South Dakota in the United States in 1898, and set the ball rolling to vindicate the doctrine of popular sovereignty. Finally, Switzerland has worked out a system of government unique in character, but which in certain respects combines the stability of the American Presidential system with the responsibility of the Parliamentary system.

Physical Characteristics. Switzerland is the "country of a thousand valleys" and the Swiss people dwell on both sides of a gigantic mass separated from one another by craggy heights and wide-spreading snow fields. Vast mountainous areas render about a quarter of the territory unproductive. The major portion of the remaining area is suitable only for pastures or for woodland, and only about 35 per cent is actually devoted to agriculture production. Agriculture on the whole supports 22.2 per cent of the entire population.

Nor has nature been bountiful in her mineral resources. Oil and coal do not exist and raw materials are almost entirely lacking too. There is almost nothing of value which is exportable. The broken terrain of the country makes transportation and communications difficult. The only natural advantages are important sources of hydro-electric power.

The hostility of nature in Switzerland, however, has been "mastered by man, civilised by him and stamped everywhere by his presence, his labour and activities. Nature only permitted Switzerland to exist, but man has made it a fairly prosperous country with a reasonably stable economy. Agriculture has been maintained at a very high level and the Wahlen Plan, carried out in the Second World War, represented the country's determined food policy to diminish her dependence on imported food stuffs. She has admirably succeeded in it and today Switzerland produces no less than 80 per cent of her own needs and imports only 20 per cent.

Paradoxical as it may seem, Switzerland is primarily an industrial country and 45 per cent of her population is dependent upon manufacturing industries. She balances her otherwise deficit economy by the excess of exports of manufactured goods and in normal times Switzerland is among the nations of the world whose foreign trade per head of the population is the greatest. By virtue of her water power and skilled workmanship, she has developed highly specialised manufactures such as machinery, electro-technical supplies, watches and textiles. The natural beauty of her landscape lures hundreds and thousands of foreign tourists, summer and winter, and the Swiss hotel industry remains one of the best equipped and most intelligently directed in the world. The tourist trade, in fact, is one of the essential credit items in the Swiss balance of payments. All told, the Swiss are now a prosperous population and the striking feature of their prosperity is a significant degree of equality. There "is no proletariat, no misery and no hovels" in Switzerland. Material anxiety exists nowhere and prosperity extends to everyone and everywhere. The standard of living of the people in general is comparatively higher than in many of her neighbouring countries. This astonishing success, the Swiss people owe primarily to their own labour "reinforced by a practical intelligence of quite an exceptional quality."

Linguistic differences. Linguistically Switzerland is heterogeneous and the Swiss nation defies all nationalistic canons of demographic and cultural unity. Almost three-fourths of her people speak German, one-fifth French, the remainder Italian, except for a few who speak Romanche, an ancient language of Latin origin. It must, however, be remembered that the linguistic groups are geographically sharply separated from each other by the cantonal boundaries. Thus, the Ticino is almost exclusively (90.3 per cent) an Italian-speaking Canton. Geneva (80.6 per cent), Vaud (86.1 per cent), and Neuchâtel (86.9 per cent) are solidly French-speaking; and all the remaining Cantons, except Berne and Fribourg, are almost exclusively German. Even in Berne "the German population predominates over the French in the ratio of five to one; and in Fribourg the French population predominates over the German in the ratio of two to one." Romanche is the prevailing language in the Grisons.

Since the adoption of the Constitution of 1848, the three main languages have been recognised official languages of the Confederation. The various Cantons choose their own official language or languages. A noticeable feature of the present-day Swiss life is the "linguistic interpenetration" among the various Cantons. Almost all educated people in Switzerland use two or even three languages. Nevertheless it is a trilingual country and nothing whatever is done, officially or privately, to lessen the linguistic differences among the Swiss. Nor is there the slightest suggestion of any linguistic propaganda. In fact, linguistic peace reigns in this happy land of the Swiss and differences of language are regarded as a stabilising factor to their national unity.

Religious differences. Switzerland's religious diversity presented some grave problems in the past and it led to civil war and foreign strife. But fortunately for the national unity of the country, the religious and linguistic areas do not coincide, but overlap. The Protestants outnumber the Catholics in twelve Cantons of which nine are German and three French-speaking. The Catholics, on the other hand, outnumber the Protestants in ten Cantons, of which seven are German, two are French and one is Italian-speaking. Moreover, in most of the Protestant Cantons there are strong Catholic minorities whereas in eight out of the ten Catholic Cantons the Catholics cover 80 per cent of the total population. "This geographical and statistical distribution," observes Rappard, "of the two rival faiths, even if it has not always prevented oppression, obviously makes for mutual toleration." The population as a whole is 57 per cent Protestant and 41 per cent Catholic.

The attitude of the Swiss to their religious differences is exactly the same as their attitude to their language differences. Religious minorities are highly respected and, as said earlier, they do not coincide with linguistic minorities. One of the main purposes of the federal Constitution set up in 1848 and amended in 1874 was to break the barriers created between Protestants and Catholics due to religious differences and, thus, to create a spirit of truly Swiss citizenship and guarantee certain fundamental rights to all Swiss people no matter to which confession they had faith and to which part of the country they belonged. When the Constitution placed absolute reliance on matters of economic prosperity of the people and inculcated in them the spirit of national consciousness, it promoted and facilitated the growth of national loyalties. Today, there is complete religious toleration and the Swiss recognise the right of every one to profess the religion he prefers. The idea of oppressing religious minorities is foreign to the Swiss mentality and there is not a single Swiss who imagines that national unity can be furthered by confession in any particular religion. "Quite the contrary; here too," emphasises Andre Siegfried, "diversity is accepted as a condition of federal harmony for Swiss patriotism consolidates itself on a very different ground."

1. Rappard, W.E., The Government of Switzerland (1936), p. 11.

The Swiss a united nation. Switzerland is, thus, a land of paradoxes. It affords a striking example of a federal experiment which tends to overcome conflicting State interests without annihilating their identity. It also mocks the principle of political "self-determination" for racial and linguistic groups and offers a splendid example of how statehood and national patriotism can be fostered in utter defiance of such a principle. Woodrow Wilson wrote in 1896, "The Cantons...having allied themselves...went on to show the world how Germans, Frenchmen, and Italians, if they only respect each other's liberties as they would have their own respected, may by mutual helpfulness and forbearance build up a union at once stable and free."² Woodrow Wilson himself was the father of the principle of self-determination.

But Swiss diversity is not confined only to language and religion. There are differences in the occupations of inhabitants, in the external conditions of their life, in their ideas and habits of thought. Then, there is the local pride which clings to time honoured ways and customs and resists the tendencies, strong as they have become, that make for uniformity. Despite these differences, Swiss legal and moral unity has grown firmer with each passing generation. They are an exceptionally united and an exceptionally national nation. There is no people in Europe, nay all the world over, among whom a sense of a national unity and of patriotic devotion is more firmly fixed than among the Swiss. Bryce, while analysing the salient features of the Swiss nation, says: "A strenuous patriotism bracing up the sense of national unity, an abounding variety in the details of social, of economic and of political life, coupled with an attachment of local self-government, which having been the life-breath of the original Cantons, passed into the minds and heart of others also, making them wish to share in the ancient traditions, and contributing to the overthrow of the oligarchy in the cities even where, as in Berne, it had been strongest." Thus, members of three races, even four languages, and two religions have become one people.

THE STRUGGLE FOR UNITY

Early history. Switzerland, as Andre Siegfried says, was not formed by unification but by aggregation. Originally, Switzerland consisted of a number of Sovereign States without any co-ordinating central authority. These States comprised residents of different populations dwelling around the Alps. The inhabitants of these mountain valleys did not possess a common race or a common history or speak a common language, though they shared a common mode of life.

Towards the end of thirteenth century, however, three small Teutonic communities entered into a league of mutual defence to protect their common rights and privileges against the existing encroachments of their feudal lords; the most important being the Hapsburg rulers of Austria, themselves of Swiss origin and then also Emperors of the Holy Roman Empire. The Hapsburg rulers made an attempt to reassert their feudal authority, but were met with successful resistance of the three confederated Cantons at the battle of Morgarten in 1315. During the next forty years, five more Cantons joined the confederacy of the original three. The confederation won its second victory over Austria in 1386 and thereby vindicated its de facto independence. For two and a half centuries thereafter the confederation maintained its existence, though the alliance was very often threatened by secessionist movements prompted by inter-cantonal strife.

2. The State, p. 301.

The religious dissensions of the Reformation period, once again, brought into prominence the secessionist tendencies. Half the Cantons embraced Protestantism and the other half adhered to the old faith. The confederation, however, survived, for the supreme interest of common defence held its members together. In 1648, the Treaty of Westphalia finally released the confederation from the suzerainty of the Holy Roman Empire and recognised its independent existence. By this time the number of the confederating Cantons had gone up to thirteen.

Nature of the Ancient Confederation. The authority of the confederation, thus, gradually extended over the greater part of the present Swiss territory. Although the Cantons proved unified enough to throw off outside control, they soon began to quarrel among themselves. In the management of their domestic affairs, the Cantons acted as completely Sovereign entities. Their political institutions, too, varied greatly; the rural Cantons were pure democracies and governed themselves by meetings of the people; some, like Berne, were close oligarchies of nobles; and in others oligarchy was "more or less tempered by a popular element."

Switzerland remained all through this period an alliance bound together only for offensive and defensive purposes. The Confederation, accordingly, had jurisdiction only over foreign relations, matters relating to peace and war, and inter-cantonal disputes. These affairs were managed by a Diet which met at irregular intervals in one of the Cantons. The delegates who sat in the Diet were the agents of their Cantons and they acted according to their specific instructions. In the Diet a certain formal precedence was given to the larger Cantons, such as Berne and Zurich, but it was a constant source of irritation for others who insisted on the substance of their equality "and behaved in a manner not unlike that of a Sovereign State participating in an international conference." The decisions of this assembly were not regarded legally binding unless they were unanimous. In fact the Cantons looked at the Diet with suspicion and as a consequence of this strong local affinities had come to be firmly established.

It is interesting to note in this context that some of the Cantons had by conquests acquired new territories and they regarded their acquisitions like subject areas denying to their inhabitants all rights and privileges which the Cantons claimed for themselves and their citizens.

French Revolution and Restoration. Then, came the French Revolution sweeping away all the local institutions. The armies of the French Revolution foisted the Helvetic Republic in 1798 upon the weak and dis-united confederacy, but the Swiss reacted so strongly against the French-imposed Constitution that Napoleon was forced to restore the Constitution of the Cantons by the Act of Mediation of 1803. Under this Act six new Cantons were formed chiefly out of allied and subject territories, speaking French and Italian. After the fall of Napoleon, the Congress of Vienna gave to Switzerland the old Confederate and cantonal institutions of the eighteenth century and added three more Cantons to it. The total number of the Cantons thus forming the confederacy came to be 22.

Although the New Constitution did not establish any central authority as such, it did establish a Diet containing a representative of each Canton, voting on instructions. The Diet was competent to declare war, conclude peace, name ambassadors, and to levy troops in accordance with a system of cantonal contingents. It could also send troops into any part of Switzerland threatened by disorder. The Cantons, however, maintained their complete internal autonomy which many of them now used to restore aristocratic regimes. They could, moreover, conclude treaties provided they were not prejudicial to the Confederation or to the rights of other Cantons.

Birth of modern Switzerland. The French suzerainty proved, indeed, a blessing in disguise for it was between 1798 and 1815 that the basis of modern Switzerland had been firmly laid. The Act of Mediation added 6 more Cantons to the already 13. Three more, all French-speaking, were added in 1815, thus, giving to Switzerland its present configuration. It was during this period that the trilingual status of the country, as it is today, was officially recognised. Finally, the French, liberal democratic and centralising influences began to manifest themselves into the Swiss political institutions. The "Federal Agreement" of 1815, therefore, achieved unity in diversity.

Partly as a result of the liberal revolution of 1830 in France, a movement arose to revise the cantonal Constitutions in Switzerland in conformity with the democratic principles. In 1832, the Diet appointed a Commission to prepare anew or revise the federal pact. But it made no progress due to the serious religious differences. In 1845 the seven Catholic Cantons formed a separate league called the Sonderbund. The formation of this league led to a Civil War which was suppressed within a month.

The defeat of the seven Catholic Cantons was, in fact, the triumph for the movement of national unity. Influenced by the internal dissensions and motivated by the European liberal movement of 1848, the Swiss Diet now approved a new Constitution which aimed to bring about a stronger and more highly organised government. Inspired to a certain extent by the example of the United States the Constitution of September 1848 transformed Switzerland into a Federal Government.

Constitution of 1848. The Constitution of 1848 was the child of compromise and it reflected the growth of new ideas with an attempt to retain ancient practices. The federating Cantons insisted on their retaining a sovereign character. A compromise was, accordingly, reached and the twenty-two Cantons remained sovereign "so far as their sovereignty is not limited by the Federal Constitution." The powers of the Federal Government extended to diplomatic and military affairs as well as to certain economic matters, such as posts, customs, weights and measures and such other matters in which concerted action was deemed necessary with a view to achieving national unity. The executive power was vested in a Federal Council consisting of seven members elected by the Federal Assembly.

The legislative power was vested in a Federal Assembly, divided into two Chambers, the Council of States equally representing the Cantons, and the National Council representing the population. The judicial power was vested in the Federal Tribunal, but it had no jurisdiction to declare laws unconstitutional. The Constitution guaranteed the sovereignty of the territories of the Cantons and authorised the Federal Government to intervene in Cantonal affairs without awaiting a request from the Cantonal authority in case of internal disturbance or threatened conflict between several Cantons.

The Constitution of 1874. The Constitution of 1848 remained in force for twenty-six years. In the meantime, the tendency towards greater centralisation became powerful, although the Federalists still advocated certain social and municipal privileges of the Cantons. The Radicalists, on the other hand, persisted in their demands for the abolition of such rights and privileges. They, indeed, pleaded for certain inalienable rights and liberties for all the Swiss people alike under the protection of a unified and centralised law. They also desired for the nationalisation of railways under federal ownership, and that legislation should be referred to the referendum of the entire Swiss population, not as inhabitants of Cantons but as a single and unified nation.

The Radical movement carried with it a considerable majority of the public opinion necessitating thereby the revision of the Constitution of 1848. The Federal Assembly drew up a new Constitution and referred it to the people for their approval. It was adopted in April by a vote of 340,000 and 14½ Cantons against 198,000 and 7½ Cantons.

The new Constitution, which came into operation on May 29, 1874, is now the working Constitution of Switzerland. It gave to the Federal Government centralised control over military matters and the initiative in unifying certain matters of commercial law. Since 1874, the Constitution has been amended a number of times. These amendments have still further centralised the powers of the Federal Government, have imposed upon the new Government new task in the realm of economic regulation and social insurance, and have increased the direct participation of the people in the process of legislation. In 1935, complete revision of the Constitution by popular initiative was requested by those groups who advocated strengthening the powers of the Cantons, and those who believed in the principle of occupational representation and its evolution into the corporative State. But it was rejected by the people.

CHAPTER II

BASIC FEATURES OF THE SWISS CONFEDERATION

The Swiss Confederation. The Republic of Switzerland, known by the formal title of Swiss Confederation, is composed of twenty-two Sovereign Cantons, namely Zurich, Berne,¹ Lucerne, Uri, Schywyz Unterwalden, Glaris, Zug, Freiburg, Solothurn, Basel, Schaffhausen, Appenzell, St. Gall Grisons, Aargau, Thurgaw, Ticino, Vaud, Valais, Neuchatel, and Geneva. The three Cantons, Unterwalden, Basel,² and Appenzell are further split up into half Cantons and each half Canton is entirely independent of its twin and differs from a whole Canton only in two respects. In the first place, a half Canton sends only one member to the Council of States, or the Federal Upper Chamber, instead of two as the full Cantons do. Secondly, a half Canton is entitled to cast a half vote on all questions entailing amendment of the Constitution.³ The subdivision of these three Cantons was necessitated because of religious, historical and other local causes. It would, therefore, be more accurate to say that the Swiss Confederation consists of twenty-five Cantons, each with its own Constitution, its own citizenship, its own laws, customs, traditions, history and habits of thought.

Switzerland is really a Federation. Switzerland is really a federation, though Article I of the Constitution describes it as the Swiss Confederation. But it is a misnomer to designate it a confederation, in spite of the constitutional use of the term. A Confederation implies a loose league of States without a strong Central Government and it has chances of dissolution. The Swiss Confederation, on the other hand, came into being, as the Preamble of the Constitution says, to strengthen the alliance of the confederates, and to maintain and further "the unity, strength and honour of the Swiss nation." The Preamble further adds that in order to achieve the solidarity of the Swiss nation a "Federal Constitution" has been adopted. Even if it be accepted that the Preamble has no juristic meaning, it, no doubt, clarifies the intention of the framers of the Constitution and the express will of the people and the Cantons who adopted it at a referendum. The Cantons of Switzerland, in fact, agreed to modify, like

1. Some of the French-speaking citizens of the Bernese Jura wish to be separated from the German-speaking Bernese of the rest of the Canton. A cantonal initiative for the division of the Berne was rejected in July 1959. But the demand for separation is still there.

2. There had been a demand for the unity of Basle. A Constitutional Commission, consisting of representatives of the two Cantons, met on November 28, 1960 for drafting a new unified Constitution.

3. The constitutional position of the half-Canton becomes clear vide Article 123 of the Constitution. It specifies: "To reckon the majority of States the vote of a half-Canton is counted as a half vote."

the original 13 States of the United States, their erstwhile sovereignty in such a way as to grant adequate authority for national purposes to the Central Government of the Confederation. The powers of the Central Government are epitomised in the objects of the Confederation. Article 2 of the Constitution reads, "The aim of the Confederation is to preserve the outward independence of the fatherland, to maintain internal peace and order, to protect the freedom and the rights of the Confederates and to promote their common prosperity. The authority of the Central Government, accordingly, extends over all matters in respect of foreign affairs, questions of peace and war, conclusion of alliances and treaties, management and control of currency, communications, commerce, weights and measures, naturalisation and expatriation, higher education, conservation of natural resources and all other fiscal matters concerning the prosperity of Switzerland.

Here is a parallelism between the Constitution of Switzerland and that of the United States. The Swiss Constitution expressly declares that the Cantons are "sovereign in so far as their sovereignty is not limited by the Federal Constitution, and as such, they exercise all rights which are not transferred to the Federal power."⁴ The Constitution of the United States ordains that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited to it by the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people."⁵ In each instance the constituent units have transferred specific powers to the Federal Government and reserved all residual powers to themselves. In both instances, in any case of conflict, over which authority has been transferred to the Central Government, the federal authority is supreme, and in case of conflict between the two it is the will of the Federal Government that prevails. That is the spirit of union which aims to give prestige and strength to the national government. If the constituent units are to toy with it, federalism in its essence disappears.

There are, however, two major differences between the American and the Swiss systems. In the first place, the Constitution, both in Switzerland and in the United States, is supreme, but the means of protecting that supremacy in Switzerland are juridically imperfect. Switzerland does not have any judicial review of the constitutionality of federal legislation. Her legislative branch is supreme; its own interpretation of its constitutional powers is binding and final. Secondly, in the United States the federal administration is usually in a position to administer its laws. In Switzerland the obligation to carry out federal legislation frequently devolves upon the Cantonal governments. It has no organization of its own and possesses scanty means to have its laws enforced. All depends upon the goodwill and co-operation of the Cantonal governments. Of course, it goes to their credit that they have never left the national government to hold the baby.

In the course of time, however, the growth of federal power became more and more pronounced. As the need for national unity increased and as problems calling for governmental regulation or assistance emerged, they overstepped Cantonal boundaries and assumed nation-wide importance. Among these were military training, banking, patents, transportation, traffic in arms and alcoholic beverages, production and marketing of grains and railroads and radios both of which were nationalised. Agriculture, manufacturing, and the tourist traffic were subsidised, industry was protected, import quotas were fixed, unemployment relief and compulsory insurance were initiated. When the Federal Government took to direct and excise duties, it offered Cantons share in the new revenues which hitherto were the exclusive monopoly of the Cantons.

4. Article 3.

5. Tenth Amendment.

Four important factors have contributed to the process of centralisation; war, economic depression, the demand for ever-increasing social services, and the mechanical and technological revolution in transport and industry. These factors are not peculiar to Switzerland. They are as much in the Swiss as in other federations. But the fact that Switzerland remains surrounded by three powerful neighbours, viz., France, Italy and Germany, accelerated the pace of centralisation. In 1914 and especially in 1939 the Federal Assembly granted the government exceptional and unlimited powers to protect the security, integrity and neutrality of the country, and to safeguard its credit, economic interests and food supply. These plenary powers involved restrictions on the liberties and the rights of the Swiss to a staggering extent but the people readily accepted them as necessary for preserving their independence and sovereignty. Both pro-Nazi and Communist organisations were suppressed. In August 1935, Professor Prozig of the Berne University was dismissed, because he had taken, as a leader of the Swiss National Socialist Party, oath of allegiance to Hitler. In October 1936 the Federal Council suppressed by law an irredentistic movement in Ticino, the Italian-speaking Canton. Likewise, the activities of the Communist Party were banned in the country and in 1935, Communist propaganda was prohibited by law. The extent of Swiss nationalism can be examined from the fact that in April 1937, the Canton of Neuchatel decided by a plebiscite, and for the first time in Switzerland's history, to suppress Communist organisations "for their super, and anti-national activities."⁶ After the army had been transferred to the Central Government, civil and criminal law became federal instead of cantonal. The motto "one law and one army" was an endeavour to strengthen the cohesion of Switzerland.

Federal status of the Cantons. These developments in the extension of the powers of the Federal Government have been viewed by many writers as alarming. When the War emergency was over or the country had been freed from the economic depression, it was expected that the range of federal action would decrease. But it has not happened so. Swiss economic life continues to be strictly controlled in its various aspects and with it there is a corresponding growth of the federal bureaucracy and consequently a grumbling about its expense. "The danger of this tendency," says Andre, "is that to the extent they suffer the encroachments of the central power the Cantons will gradually cease to be sovereign States at all and become simple district administrations carrying out the behests of the Central authority." This is, however, an exaggerated view. The spirit of the Swiss Confederation, since its inception and particularly since 1848 when it became a really federal State, has always been to ensure and protect the autonomy of the Cantons, and to preserve their individual and separate entity. The Cantons remain the more genuine and more living democracies and the federative structure of the State, as Hans Huber says, "comes to complete both the idea of freedom and the idea of democracy."

6. As quoted in Ramesh Chandra Ghosh's The Government of the Swiss Republic (1953), p. 43. Geneva banned the Communist Party on 13th June 1937. Vaud did the same by plebiscite on January 30, 1938 by 34,603 votes against 12,700 votes. Ibid., f.n.

The Cantons are the constituent and pre-existing members of the federal State. In fact, the federal State was formed to unite and protect its constituent members. The powers of the Cantons are original and they exercise all rights which are not delegated to the Federal Government.

Although the 'sovereignty' of the Cantons has steadily diminished in favour of the Confederation, nonetheless it is from the Cantons that the Confederation draws its authority and derives its constitutional usages. The Cantons are the original parts of the federal system of government and they retain their essential prerogatives. Maintenance of internal peace and security is their concern. Construction of public works and highways, provision for a system of public education, care of the social dependents, control of elections and local government are all their responsibility. It is only by being a citizen of a Canton that one acquires the citizenship of Switzerland and Cantonal laws still determine many of the citizen's civil rights. Many affairs of the Central Government are managed by Cantonal governments. Civil and criminal laws, federal subjects, are administered by the Courts which are exclusively cantonal. The federal government simply makes military regulations and appoints superior officers, but enforcement of those regulations, raising of certain contingents for the national army and provision of the personal equipment of each soldier, are the concern of the Cantons. The Federal Tribunal has no officers of its own. It depends upon Cantonal governments for the execution of its judgments.

To sum up, the Swiss Constitution expressly recognises the juridical personality of the Cantons in the composition of all federal organs. The Council of States represents the Cantons on the basis of equality and corresponds to the American Senate. The National Council represents the people in proportion to the number of electors in each Canton with the proviso that each Canton, no matter how small, shall have at least one deputy. The personality of the Cantons is also recognised in the process of amending the Federal Constitution. No change in the constitutions can be considered legally adopted unless it is approved by a majority of votes of the citizens and also by a majority of the Cantons.

A comparatively longer document. The Swiss Constitution is rather a lengthy document, much longer than the Constitution of the United States on which it is generally modelled. It goes into a good many details dealing with matters as fishing and hunting, qualifications of the members of the liberal professions, sickness and burial of the indigent, cattle diseases, gambling houses, and lotteries. All these matters in reality belong to the sphere of ordinary rather than to that of constitutional legislation. Behind this plethora of details was perhaps the desire for sharp division of authority between the Cantons and the Federal Government.

Spirit of Republicanism. All through the Swiss Constitution there is in evidence a strong spirit of republicanism. This is, in fact, the very breath of the Swiss way of life. Article 6 of the Constitution requires the Confederation to guarantee the Canonical Constitutions, provided that the latter ensure the exercise of political rights according to republican (representative or democratic) forms. The meaning of this provision becomes more clear when it is read along with Article 4. It says, "All Swiss citizens are equal before the law. In Switzerland, there shall be no subjects, nor privileges of place, birth, person or family." This provision, according to Christopher Hughes, "is now a rule of law and incontestably the most active rule of law of the whole Constitution."⁷ The founders of modern Switzerland were animated "by the desire to emancipate the individual from the shackles of the aristocratic, mercantilistic and clerical traditions which had for centuries limited"⁸ the individual's freedom. They, accordingly, abolished all aristocratic and oligarchic privileges and guaranteed to the Swiss people equality before law. Every Swiss who has reached the age of twenty years and who is not excluded from the rights of active citizenship, has the rights to determine his government, and the acceptance of the Constitution by the majority of the people, and its amendment at any time on popular demand.

There are, thus, in Switzerland no subjects, nor any privileges of rank, birth, person or family. All political institutions of the country—federal, cantonal and communal—are elective in character, and the direct participation of the people in the affairs of government, and for making changes in the Constitution are the basic principles of the nation's political practices. The principle of republicanism and direct sovereignty of the nation is, indeed, the bulwark of Swiss democracy and the people have accepted it in a religious spirit.

Does not contain a Bill of Rights. The Swiss Constitution contains no formal Bill of Rights. Nevertheless a score or more articles scattered throughout the document guarantee the right of conscience and creed, liberty of the press, the right to form associations, the right to petition, the right to property and equality before the law. The intention of the framers of the Constitution was probably to confine the expression "the constitutional rights of citizens"⁹ in the narrower sense and to include only freedom-rights, i.e., equality, freedom of trade, religion, and association. But, as Hughes observes, "of the pack of constitutional rights, Equality before the Law is the Joker"¹⁰ and the Federal Tribunal has interpreted Article 4 so as to cover the political rights as well as the freedom rights.¹¹ It also covers the political and freedom rights guaranteed either expressly

7. The Federal Constitution of Switzerland (1954), pp. 6-7.

8. Rappard, D.E., The Government of Switzerland, op. cit., pp. 108-09.

9. Article 113, Clause 3, "The Federal Tribunal takes cognisance also of appeals against violation of constitutional rights of citizens...."

10. The Federal Constitution of Switzerland, op. cit., p. 7.

11. Ibid., p. 123.

or implicitly in the Cantonal Constitutions.¹² This protection of the citizen, according to Hans Huber, "is in no wise inferior to that guaranteed by the American Constitution with its clauses of Due Process of Law and equal Protection of the Law."

Provisions relating to Religion. To safeguard against all possibilities of religious conflicts which for long had distracted Switzerland, the constitution suggests various provisions. Freedom of belief and free exercise of worship within the limits of morality and public order are guaranteed throughout every Canton. No person can be compelled to become a member of any religious society, or take part in any religious act, or to submit to any religious instruction. Nor can his civil or political rights be abridged by any ecclesiastical or religious provisions. At the same time, no person can refuse to fulfil, on the ground of the religious opinion, any obligation which citizenship of Switzerland may demand. Moreover, no person can be compelled to pay taxes the proceeds of which go to finance a religious body to which he does not belong. No bishopric can be created within the Swiss territory without the consent of the Federal Government. Ecclesiastical jurisdiction has been abolished; burial places belong to civil authorities; the right of marriage cannot be limited either on religious or economic grounds. The order of Jesuits and the societies affiliated to it are prohibited to exist. The Federal Government can extend this prohibition to other religious orders whose activities may be deemed to endanger the existence of the State or disturb the peace between different religions. The founding of new religious houses or religious orders, and the re-establishment of those which have been suppressed is forbidden.

Democracy and Switzerland are almost synonymous. "Among the modern democracies," writes James Bryce in the opening Chapter on the Government of Switzerland, "which are true democracies, Switzerland has the highest claim to be studied. It is the oldest, for it contains communities in which popular government dates further back than it does anywhere else in the world; and it has pushed democratic doctrines further, and worked them out more consistently than any other European States."¹³ The principle of Swiss democracy "is in fact, to be communal before being cantonal, and to be cantonal before being federal." The basis of political authority is that of local autonomy and the popular will is formed from the bottom upward. Switzerland is a land of small communities, rural and urban, and commune was from the earliest times a potent factor in accustoming the people to control their own affairs. It is still the political unit of the nation and the focus of its public life. It is a means of educating citizens in public affairs and instilling in them the sense of civil duty. Both the commune and the Canton appear to them the living realities of a direct or quasi-direct consultation of the people in all matters which concern their immediate administrative problems.

This democratic sense runs all through the federal Constitution and

12. The Federal Tribunal considers that certain rights are necessarily by implication guaranteed by a Cantonal Constitution, even if it is silent on the point.

13. Modern Democracies, Vol. I, 367.

it may be safely said that Switzerland and democracy have now become almost synonymous. In spite of the tendency towards centralization, the introduction of the constitutional initiative in 1891, proportional representation for the election of the National Council in 1919, and of the optional referendum on international treaties in 1921, sufficiently prove that the democratic purpose of the people which had created the present Swiss Republic in 1848, still remains intact. The Forty-seventh Amendment of September 11, 1949 was in favour of a "Return to Democracy" and it is now no longer possible for the Federal Government to levy direct federal taxes. Neither can the Federal Assembly issue an emergency decree for more than one year without the approval of the people. Rappard has correctly maintained that "The forms of democracy have undoubtedly undergone a change under the impact of irresistible economic influences, but the spirit has remained the same."¹⁴

In spite of this democratic sense Switzerland can be described as one of the least democratic systems. This contradiction arises from the fact that Switzerland refuses her women the right to vote on national affairs and on most local questions. The old prejudices still continue and Switzerland is the only important nation in Europe and one of the few remaining in the world, that does not place at par her womanhood with men in the enjoyment of political rights and this is a negation of the basic principle of democracy, which accepts man as a man on a footing of equality.

Instruments of Direct Democracy. The Swiss faith in democracy as a political principle is most characteristically revealed in the people's extensive use of the instruments of direct popular government. The most ancient of these is Landsgemeinde or open town meetings in which every male adult can speak, make his own laws and elect offices. This over five hundred years old tradition of government still obtains in the five Landsgemeinde Cantons, Glarus, Appenzell Outer Rhodes, Appenzell Inner Rhodes, Obwalden and Nidwalden. In all other Cantons a representative republican form of government exists where a frequent use is made of the modern instruments of direct democracy, namely, the popular referendum and the popular initiative. The use of these instruments is also made for matters affecting the Confederation.

Liberalism. Still another principle of the Swiss Constitution is its liberalism. The authors of the Constitution were profoundly influenced by the liberal philosophy of the nineteenth century and the constitutional phraseology used by them stresses the impact of that philosophy at every point. The Constitution aimed to emancipate the individual from all guiding and restraining influences of the Church and of all other paternalistic agencies. All political privileges have been done with. The freedom of petition, of belief, of speech, of the press, of assembly, equality before the law, etc., have been guaranteed. Economic liberty of the individual has been fully secured. The Constitution also recognises the duty of the State to provide free and compulsory instruction and public schools have, accordingly, been kept open to the adherents of all religious faiths. It is further provided that instruction in public schools should be managed in such a way as not to infringe upon anyone's liberty of conscience or belief.

14. The Government of Switzerland, p. 111.

A Dynamic Constitution. All the same, the Constitution is a living document and it presents a singular example of adaptability within the extent of a written Constitution. The Constitution has been so amended from time to time as to represent the popular aspirations consistent with the exigencies of time. The policy of nationalisation and the advancement of various State projects are clear indications of the country's drift towards the welfare State. In fact, the emphasis in Switzerland, immediately after the Constitution of 1874 came into operation, had been on the protection of the individual rather than on the will to emancipate him. He has, thus, been protected against industrial exploitation by labour legislation in 1877, 1908 and 1920, against epidemics and other dangers to his health by various sanitary measures in 1897, 1905 and 1913 as well as against himself by the sundry forms of temperance and anti-alcoholic legislation in 1885, 1908 and 1930 and by anti-gambling measure in 1920.

But the great change was necessitated by the economic depression of 1930 when the workers, the farmers, and the middle-class all demanded State intervention to extricate them from the baneful results of their economic frustration, and to introduce schemes for their economic security. In order to protect her political independence and to save the country from the subversive elements, either from the Right or the Left, and to safeguard her traditional neutrality during the two World Wars some restrictions were imposed on the liberty of speech and association of the citizens. The Swiss people have, however, always shown their love of personal liberty and whenever the government has unduly interfered with it, they have consistently rejected at the polls even the most reasonable protective measures. In 1884, 1896, 1903, 1922, 1923, 1929, 1935, 1937, 1939 referenda on Bills intended to protect the community at the expense of the freedom of the individual gave expression to the liberal attitude of the people and the way in which they protected their most cherished liberties.

Federal Executive. The Constitution vests the executive power in the Federal Council composed of seven members and elected by the Federal Assembly for four years. There is no single man in Switzerland who can be said to occupy the august office of the chief executive head of the State. The executive power is entrusted to a Council instead of to a man. The officer, whose title is the 'President of the Confederation,' is just one out of the seven who make the Federal Council and is elected by the Federal Assembly for a single year. The office of the President passes by rotation among the members of the Council and he is, therefore, just one like them. He is in no sense the chief of administration, has no more power than his other colleagues in the Council, and is in no way more responsible than others for the conduct of the government. He is simply the Chairman of the Executive Committee of the nation and, as such, performs certain ceremonial duties of a titular head of the State. The executive in Switzerland is, thus, a collegium fulfilling simultaneously the functions of a government and of a chief of the State.

Federal Legislature. The federal legislature is bicameral. The Council of States represents the Cantons and corresponds to the American Senate. The National Council is a representative Chamber of the people. The mode of election and the terms of office of the representatives vary from Canton to Canton. The two Chambers are co-ordinate in all respects and their equality of powers induces Dr. Strong to maintain that the "Swiss legislature, like the Swiss executive, is unique. It is the only legislature in the world the functions of whose Upper House are in no way differentiated from the Lower."

Two important features of the Swiss legislature may, however, be noted. First, the framers of the Constitution did not pay much attention to the doctrine of the Separation of Powers, and, accordingly, vested the Federal Assembly with all kinds of authority, legislative, executive, judicial and constituent. Second, legislation in Switzerland requires the final verdict of the people through the instrument of the referendum. The people can also initiate legislation.

Federal Judiciary. The Constitution provides for a Federal Tribunal and although it is very often described as a Supreme Court of Switzerland, yet it hardly possesses powers which can entitle it to be so. It is not, like the Supreme Court of the United States, the custodian of the Constitution, for it cannot declare invalid legislation passed by the Federal Assembly or the Cantonal legislatures or any executive action. The Constitution expressly assigns to the Federal Assembly itself the power of interpreting the Constitution. It can, however, annul any law passed by the Cantons which is held to violate the provisions of the Constitution. Second, the Federal Tribunal stands alone instead of being at the head of a great national judicial system. The Federal Tribunal, accordingly, does not possess the exalted dignity of a Federal Court.

A Rigid Constitution. The Swiss Constitution is rigid and the procedure adopted to amend it is complicated. But it is by no means so difficult to put it in practice as in the United States. The method of revision is precisely stated in Chapter III of the Constitution of 1874, as amended on July 5, 1891. The revision of the Constitution may mean either a total revision or a partial revision. The former refers to the substitution of a new Constitution for the old one and the latter is only in relation to a specific provision of the Constitution.

The Swiss Constitution introduces the instruments of Constitutional Referendum and the Constitutional Initiative in the process of amending the Constitution. The Constitutional Referendum implies submission to popular vote all constitutional amendments for their final approval or disapproval. There are two aspects of popular vote. One is that all constitutional amendments must be ratified by a majority of the Swiss citizens, and by a majority of the Cantons. If the necessary majority cannot be obtained at both the levels, then, the amendment cannot become operative. Secondly, the constitutional initiative empowers the people themselves to propose either a total or partial revision of the Constitution.

AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION

The proposed revision of the Constitution may be partial or total.

But all changes in the Constitution must be approved at a national referendum by a majority of the votes cast and by a majority of the Cantons. Referenda can be initiated by the federal legislature or by the people through a petition. The procedure provided for amending the Constitution is as follows:—

(1) As said above, Constitutional amendments may be total or partial. The legislature may initiate either type by the ordinary process of legislative action. The Federal Council may draw up a proposal which is then submitted to the two Houses, the Council of States and the National Council, for independent deliberation or one of the two Houses may start the process. If both the Houses agree it is submitted to the people on the next convenient date. If a majority of the citizens voting at a referendum, and majority of the Cantons approve it, then, the revision is deemed to have been adopted. In determining the will of the Cantons, each Canton possesses one vote and each half-Canton half a vote.

(2) If, however, only one House of the Federal Legislature agrees to the proposed revision and the other does not agree, then,

(i) it becomes first necessary to decide whether the proposed revision is necessary or not. This is decided by the people at a referendum;

(ii) if the people approve the proposed revision by a majority vote, new elections to the Federal Assembly are held. Approval of the Cantons here is not required;

(iii) after the elections have been held, the newly elected Council of States and the National Council proceed to consider the proposed revision;

(iv) if both the Houses of the Assembly approve it, which is a foregone conclusion, the revision is submitted to the referendum of the people and the Cantons;

(v) if passed by a majority of the people voting as also by a majority of the Cantons, the revision comes into force

Constitutional Initiative. A complete revision of the Constitution or specific amendments thereto may also be made by popular initiative, that is, on a petition of at least 50,000 Swiss citizens. If a complete revision is required, the subsequent procedure remains the same when one House of the Federal Assembly agrees to the revision and the other opposes it, i.e.,

(i) the question whether there should be a revision of the Constitution or not is referred to the people for their verdict;

(ii) if a majority of the citizens voting at a referendum are in its favour, then, fresh elections to the Federal Assembly are held;

(iii) the newly elected Assembly drafts the new Constitution and if it is approved;

(iv) it is submitted to a referendum of the people and the Cantons;

(v) if passed by a majority of the people voting as also by a majority of the Cantons, the revised Constitution comes into force.

When the popular petition proposes only a partial revision, the procedure, thereafter, depends upon whether the amendment has been formulated in specific or merely in general terms. A demand in general terms for revision is just an indication of a desire by at least 50,000 citizens urging the need of a particular amendment. A specific demand, on the other hand, is in the form of a Bill complete in all details.

When the demand for amendment is in general terms, the Federal Assembly, if it agrees to such an amendment, proceeds at once to draw up the amendment in accordance with the wishes of the people proposing it. Then, it is submitted to the vote of the people and the Cantons. If it is not approved by the Federal Assembly, the Federal Council is required to submit the question whether there shall be a partial revision or not to the vote of the people. If the majority of the citizens vote in favour of the revision, the Federal Assembly shall draft the proposed amendment in accordance with the initiative and, then, submit, it to a regular referendum of the people and the Cantons.

When the proposal for a partial revision is in the form of a complete Bill, the Federal Assembly after giving its approval must submit it to a referendum of the people and the Cantons. If the Federal Assembly does not approve the Bill, it may recommend its rejection at a referendum of the people, or frame its own counter proposal and submit the same along with the proposal for revision as initiated to the usual process of referendum. In both the cases the majority of the citizens voting and the majority of the Cantons are necessary.

To be clear, the whole procedure accepted for partial revision on the initiative of the people may be summarised as follows:

1. If the demand for partial revision is unformulated, i.e., it is couched in general terms, the Federal Assembly, if it approves it, frames the amendment and, then, submits it for the ratification of the people and the Cantons.

2. If the Federal Assembly does not approve the amendment, then,

- (i) the question whether there shall be a partial revision or not is submitted to the people for their decision. No reference need be made to the Cantons;

- (ii) if majority of the citizens voting favour the revision, the existing Federal Assembly, although it had already expressed its disapproval of the proposed revision, is required to draft the amendment in conformity to the popularly initiated proposal and submit it to a referendum of the people and the Cantons.

3. If it is a formulated proposal, the Federal Assembly is first required to approve it and, then, it is referred to a referendum of the people and the Cantons. If the Federal Assembly does not approve of the revision, it may recommend to a referendum:

- (i) that the proposed revision may be rejected, or

- (ii) may frame its own counter proposals and submit them along with the original popularly initiated proposal for the decision of the people and the Cantons.

Estimate of the Method of Amendment. There have been two proposals since 1874 for total revision—in 1880 when partial revision by petition of 50,000 was not recognised, and a project of Swiss Nazis, right-wing Catholics, and others in 1935. Both were rejected. There is a fair possibility that the total revision of the Constitution may be attempted again. There seems to be a growing feeling in Switzerland that the Constitution should be entirely "redrafted in order to eliminate the confusion that exists as a result of the numerous partial amendments (some articles, have up to four additions), to eliminate certain articles that no longer have any real validity, and in general to create a basic instrument more adapted to the times."¹⁵ But a really piquant situation would arise if the decision for total revision were at any time accepted. It is difficult to see how under the stress of modern conditions the Assembly could neglect its own normal business for the long period necessary to work out the text of a new Constitution. It has, accordingly, been suggested that a separate Constituent Assembly be elected, if total revision was ever decided upon.

In general, constitutional amendments proposed by the legislature have been frequent and successful. In 112 years from 1848 to 1960, the legislature proposed seventy-six amendments, of which fifty-one were accepted by the people and the Cantons.¹⁶ From 1874 to 1960, some forty-five initiatives were submitted, seven of which the people accepted. The legislature has used its power to submit counter proposals nine times and for six times these were accepted by the people. "There has been a steady increase in the use of the initiative, although no corresponding increase in acceptances."¹⁷

But just a few of the partial revisions effected have altered the constitutive parts of the Constitution. The vast majority of them have extended the competence of the Central Government, particularly in restriction of the freedom of trade and industry. Other amendments impose upon the citizens the exacting standards of morality in matters of drink, gambling, etc. Amendments to constitutive parts of the Constitution include popular Constitutional Initiative 1891, Administrative Jurisdiction, and Delegation to Departments 1914, Proportional Representation 1918, Treaty Referendum 1921, altering the number of inhabitants per National Councillor 1931 and 1950, raising the term of office of National Councillor, and hence of Federal Councillor and Chancellor to four years in 1931, rules for declaring arrete,¹⁸ 'urgent' amending Article 89 in 1939 and 1949. Among the amendments which extend Federal competence may be particularly noted the Federal Civil and Penal Code Articles of 1898 and the Economic Articles of 1947.

The notable feature of the Swiss Constitution is its development through formal constitutional amendments alone. There is no growth

15. Cooding, G.A., The Federal Government of Switzerland, p. 61.

16. Ibid.

17. Ibid., p. 63.

18. In Swiss practice there is a little difference in either form or substance between a law and an arrete. The major difference, in practice, is that arrete can, under certain circumstances, be exempt from legislative referenda.

through judicial decisions and precedents, because of the absence of the system of judicial review. The Federal Tribunal cannot declare ultra vires a law of the Federal Assembly. The Swiss theory is that the sovereign power should remain in the hands of the people or their representatives in the legislature. An initiative proposal to invest the Federal Tribunal with power to review legislation was rejected at a referendum in 1939. Hans Huber, who himself was a judge of the Federal Tribunal, remarked that the Swiss people "saw in the judicial examination of constitutional law an infringement of democratic principles."¹⁹

Another fact to be noted in this connection is that it is "easier for the Swiss people to amend their fundamental law than their ordinary statutes against the will of a hostile Parliament."²⁰ This is due to the reason that the Swiss people have no power of initiative in the matter of ordinary legislation. They can, on a petition of 30,000 citizens, demand a referendum on any federal law or decree, but they can never "directly provoke the adoption, repeal or amendment of a law by the Federal authorities." The proposals for constitutional amendments in Switzerland have been made by the people frequently.

CIVIL RIGHTS

As mentioned above, the Constitution does not include a separate chapter on Bill of Rights, although it contains some two dozen scattered Articles dealing with the rights of the individuals. Not only are they defined as well as asserted, but in many cases corresponding duties of the individuals are also prescribed. All these rights are protected by the courts against infringement by any Cantonal authority. "This protection can include an appeal to the Federal Tribunal which is the highest court in the land. In practice such appeals are numerous," especially concerned with a violation of the general right of "equality before the law." Here is a summary of the rights of the Swiss citizen.

Swiss citizenship. Citizenship in Switzerland has threefold bases: communal, cantonal and federal. A person cannot be a Swiss citizen without being a citizen of a Canton and a person cannot be a cantonal citizen without being a citizen of a commune. The Constitution itself does not define Swiss citizenship. Article 43 simply provides that "Every citizen of a Canton is a Swiss citizen." Cantonal Constitutions provide that every citizen must also be a citizen of a commune, thus, establishing the threefold basis of citizenship. Switzerland does not recognise the principle of jus soli. According to the principle of jus sanguinis a child whose father is a Swiss citizen becomes a Swiss citizen and a citizen of his father's commune and Canton. A woman who marries a Swiss from another commune becomes a citizen of her husband's commune. Swiss citizenship is inalienable and the Constitution provides that the government cannot expel a Swiss citizen from the country, except under a few rules.

Freedom of Movement. In general every Swiss national has the right to live anywhere he pleases within his country. But there are certain exceptions to the right of freedom of movement. The Canton to which an individual may wish to settle can require that he should produce a "certificate of origin." The commune of his origin may decline to issue such a certificate. Even with a certificate of origin the right to reside may be limited. Permission may be refused if the person in question has been deprived of his civil rights. The right to reside may be withdrawn if an individual has been "repeatedly sentenced for grave misdemeanour" or "has become a permanent burden on public charity" and to whom the commune of origin or Canton refused adequate assistance after having been officially requested to render it. In no case, however, the Canton of origin is permitted to refuse a Swiss citizen the right to return. The responsibility for the care of the indigent Swiss citizens falls ultimately on the Cantons of their origin.

19. How Switzerland is Governed, p. 10.

20. Rappard, W.E., The Government of Switzerland, op. cit., p. 60.

Equality before the Law. Article 4 of the Constitution guarantees to all Swiss citizens equality before the law. The same Article further provides that "In Switzerland there are neither subjects nor privileges of rank, birth, person, or family." Article 60 further provides that "Every Canton is obliged to accord to citizens of other Confederate States the same treatment it accords to its own citizens as regards legislation and all that concerns judicial proceedings."

The Constitution also provides that no person may be deprived of the "lawful judge" and abolishes ecclesiastical courts. The Constitution-makers deemed these provisions necessary in order to eliminate the creation of "ad hoc Courts such as those used for the persecution of the Liberals during the Sonderbund war and to keep ecclesiastical courts out of civil affairs."²¹ The Constitution prohibits corporal punishment and death penalty for a political crime. Originally the Constitution had provided for the abolition of death penalty for other causes, but it was re-introduced in 1878 by amending the Constitution. The Federal Criminal Code, which came into force in 1942, re-established the prohibition on capital punishment, except for serious crimes committed in times of war and during active military service.

Freedom of Press, Association and Petition. The freedom of press is guaranteed throughout Switzerland, subject to the provision that the Cantons may exact legislation "necessary for the repression of abuses." It is further provided that the Federal Government "has the right to prescribe penalties in order to suppress abuses directed against itself or its authorities." All laws enacted by the Cantons for the suppression of abuses are required to be submitted to the Federal Council for its approval. In practice, in peace time there is seldom any necessity to use legislation restricting the freedom of the press. "The Swiss press is highly responsible and conservative, rarely engaged in the "sensationalism" that is characteristic of many newspapers in the United States."

The Swiss are also guaranteed the freedom of association and petition. The freedom of association embraces the formation of organized groups for religious, social, economic and political purposes and includes the right to assembly. But this right is subject to the provision that neither the purpose of such associations nor the means it employs are in any way "unlawful or dangerous to the State." Then, there is the right to petition. This right, however, does not carry much practical utility now as a result of the adoption of Constitutional initiative.

21. Cooding, G.A., The Federal Government of Switzerland, p. 50.

Freedom of Religion. Freedom to religion is guaranteed by Article 49 which reads "Liberty of conscience and belief is inviolable." Article 50 States, "The free exercise of forms of worship is guaranteed within the limits compatible with public order and decency." No person can be compelled to become a member of any religious body, to submit to any religious instruction, to perform any religious act, or to incur any punishment of any sort by reason of religious opinion. No person can be compelled to pay taxes the proceeds of which are devoted specifically to pay the expenses of the rituals of any religious community of which he is not a member. Finally, the exercise of civil or political rights cannot be limited by religious or ecclesiastical requirements or conditions of any nature.

CHAPTER III

THE CANTONAL AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT

The Communes and the Cantons. The principle of Swiss democracy, as said before, is "to be communal before being cantonal, and to be cantonal before being federal." Switzerland is a union of highly developed autonomous communities within the federal State, and in the political life of the Swiss citizen the Canton looms larger than the federal State. The commune is essentially the initial cell of Swiss democracy, it is the first basis of the administrative fabric, and a place which educates citizens in public affairs and instils in them a sense of civic duty. Then, come the Cantons, constituents of the Confederation.

"In the eyes of the citizen," write Andre Siegfried, "the Canton is the living reality much more so than the Confederation which may well appear to him as little more than a cold administrative mechanism. Each citizen feels himself a Swiss as a matter of course, but before being Swiss he is a native of Zurich or Glarus or Valais." He is the citizen of a Canton before being a Swiss citizen. Although, the present trend towards the nationalisation of political power and political loyalty have reduced their historic individuality and cantonal feeling is slowly diminishing, yet the Constitution still recognises their sovereignty in so far as it "is not limited by the Federal Constitution, and, as such, they exercise all rights which are not transferred to the General power."¹ Cantons are still in fact the real centres of the political life of the nation. "It is to his Canton and to his city or village," writes Rappard, that a Swiss citizen "pays most of his direct taxes. It is to vote for and against cantonal and communal measures, for or against candidates to cantonal or communal office, that he is most frequently called to the polls. It was, until a generation ago, exclusively, and it still is mainly, on cantonal issues that political parties were and are formed and that many of the most important political battles are won and lost. Most constitutional changes were . . . , wrought in the Cantons before they become ripe for consideration by the federal legislature."² We, accordingly, give precedence to cantonal and communal political institutions before we actually consider those of the federal State. Really Swiss politics are only half understood without a knowledge of local institutions.

Constitutional position of the Cantons. The Cantons twenty-two in number—or rather twenty-five, for three are divided into half Cantons with their own separate governments—are very unequal in size and population. Their rights and powers correspond generally to those of the States in the American Union and the Australian Federal Commonwealth. Article 3 of the Swiss Constitution definitely specifies that residuary powers belong to the Cantons and that they are 'sovereign' within their sphere of competence. To the Federal Government are assigned specified powers. Each Canton possesses its own Constitution and its own machinery of government—executive, legislative and judicial organs, a fiscal system and a civil service. And the Cantons control all forms of local self-government.

1. Article 3.

2. The Government of Switzerland, op. cit., p. 31.

The Constitutions of the twenty-five Cantons and half Cantons must comply with the provisions of the Federal Constitution. The Confederation guarantees the Cantonal Constitutions, provided that they: (a) do not contain anything contrary to the provisions of the Federal Constitution; (b) provide for the exercise of political rights in conformity with Republican representative or democratic forms of government; and (c) have been accepted by the people and may be amended on the demand of the absolute majority of the citizens. Within these limitations, the Cantons are free to construct their Constitutions and alter them as they please. In the beginning, the Cantonal Constitutions had been amended quite frequently and in some cases entailed a total revision. The net result of these amendments was that now all the Constitutions, more or less, prescribe identical political institutions, except the four half Cantons and one full Canton, five in all, where there is pure democracy.

Two types of Cantons. Cantons are of two types—those ruled by primary, and those ruled by representative assemblies. To the first category belong the five pure democracies of Obwalden, Nidwalden, Appenzell Interior; Appenzell Exterior and Glarus. The first two are half Cantons and they collectively make the Canton of Unterwalden. The third and the fourth, too, are half Cantons making together the Canton of Appenzell, Glarus is a full Canton. The origin of the curious institution of a half Canton usually goes back to the simple fact that internal dissensions could not be settled except by territorial division. Obwalden and Nidwalden dissolved their common Landsgemeinde as early as 1432. Appenzell fell apart in 1592 as an outcome of the Reformation, which resulted in a half-catholic, half-protestant Canton. The remaining nineteen Cantons are representative democracies.

The Landsgemeinde. The Canton of Glarus and the four half Cantons into which Appenzell and Unterwalden are divided still centre political authority in their over five hundred years old Landsgemeinde or annual assembly of all citizens which makes laws and elects officers, executive and administrative. In other words, the people directly exercise their superior power in an annual open air meeting, instead of through elected representatives.

The open air meeting, called a Landsgemeinde, is held annually on a Sunday morning in April or May in the public square of the capital city or in a nearby meadow. Attendance is compulsory for all adult male citizens, but in practice all do not attend. The meeting is presided over by the head of the Cantonal government in an atmosphere marked by solemnity, prayers, hymns and sometimes collective oaths. No turbulence and unusual activity or practice is ever in evidence. The proceedings are orderly and dignified and are usually witnessed by children from other parts of Switzerland.

The Landsgemeinde elects by show of hands the head of the government, members of the Executive Council, the Cantonal representatives in the Council of States, judges and officials. The tradition is to re-elect the incumbents so long as they wish. The meeting further approves the accounts, votes the budget, and other legislative Bills submitted to it. The Landsgemeinde has also the power to change the Cantonal Constitution.

The constitutional structure of a Canton consists of a Parliament, Landrat or a Cantonal Council, and an executive body, Regierungsrat or Council of State. The Landrat or the Cantonal Council is elected for a period of four years not by the Landsgemeinde but by separate electoral districts. This Cantonal Council is, in fact, a subsidiary legislature and attends to all the details that cannot be brought before the people in the open meeting, passes ordinances, votes the smaller appropriations, examines the accounts, and elects the minor officials. It also prepares the legislative work to be presented to the Landsgemeinde. This procedure is adopted obviously to prevent hasty and ill-considered action by the large public meeting. At one time the Cantonal Council tried to draw the whole control of legislative affairs into their own hands and no question could be brought in the Landsgemeinde without their approval. But after a good deal of struggle the people reasserted their right of private initiative. It is now the rule that one or more citizens can in some form propose any measure, provided notice had been given to the Cantonal authorities beforehand.

The Regierungsrat, or the Administrative Council, is usually composed of seven members elected by the Landsgemeinde. This is the Cantonal Executive Council and is presided over by the Landamman or the Head of the Government. The Landamman also presides over the Landsgemeinde.

REPRESENTATIVE CANTONS

In all other Cantons representative Republican form of Government prevails.

The Great Council. The legislative power and the supervision of administration is vested in a unicameral representative assembly of the Canton, variously named, Great Council or Cantonal Council. All Cantonal legislatures are unicameral as a matter of tradition. As the instruments of initiative and referendum provide for popular control over legislation consequently no need is felt for the check provided by a second Chamber.

The membership of the Cantonal legislatures tends to be large in comparison with the size of the population it represents. In some Cantons the number is fixed by the Constitution. For example, the Constitution of Zurich calls for as many as 180 representatives. Generally speaking, the proportion between inhabitants and representatives varies ranging from 1 to 250 to 1 to 4,000. The term of office of the legislators also varies. In most Cantons, it is four years; in the remainder it is from one to six years. The general tendency, however, is towards longer terms, because they are reluctant to go in for elections so frequently. There must be at least one annual session to pass the budget. In some Cantons the legislature may be dissolved by popular vote. But with the general introduction of referendum the necessity of dissolving the legislature does no longer exist. Legislators in the Cantons receive no fixed salaries, but only a nominal sum per diem.

The powers of the Cantonal legislature include control and supervision of administration; control over the annual budget, loans, and taxation; power to declare a state of emergency and to call up Cantonal troops if necessary; to grant amnesty and pardon; ratification of inter-Cantonal treaties; naturalisation; election of superior judges in most of the Cantons and of the members of Cantonal authorities dealing with education, church affairs and banking.

Referendum and Initiative. Every representative Canton provides for Constitutional Initiative and a compulsory Constitutional Referendum. That is to say, every Canton is required by the Federal Constitution to submit all changes in its Constitution for the acceptance or rejection by the people.³ The Constitution can also be amended whenever the absolute majority of citizens demand it.⁴ All Cantons go further and have the legislative referendum also, and an assortment of other devices, varying from Canton to Canton, such as budget referendum, or a compulsory legislative referendum for laws entailing expenditure beyond a certain limit. Initiative on ordinary legislation is permitted. The effect of the operation of these popular instruments is that the citizens are called to the polls from four to eight, or even more times a year, and each time they are required to vote on several issues.

Cantonal Executive Power. Each Canton is governed by a collegial executive body known as the Government Council in German-speaking Switzerland, and Council of State in the French part. The collegial system of executive is in harmony with the Swiss tradition and is a universal institution throughout Switzerland, both in the Cantons and the Federal Government. It is usually composed of five or seven members, but Berne and Appenzell and Interior Rhodes have nine and Nidwalden has eleven. The executive is a representative body of all the political parties in the Canton. Sometimes deliberate effort is made to give the parties proportional representation. Broadly speaking, the executive council is a "business board" with little political colour. The councillors are elected for a term from one to five years; in most Cantons the term is four years.

The Chairman of the Council, Landamman, is rarely elected for more than one year at a time, and is not immediately eligible for re-election. In some Cantons the Chairmen are elected by the Cantonal legislatures, in others by their colleagues, and in the rest by the people. They do not enjoy any special power or authority. They are just like others in the Council.

The Councillors are usually re-elected and the Swiss tradition is that good men ought to continue in office so long as their health and ambitions permit. Consequently, although their terms are short, it is often looked upon as a life job. Their work is, just like that of the Federal Councillors, divided into various departments and a councillor is usually the head of one department. They must appear and report to the State legislature on the Cantonal administration, take part in its debates, propose measures and draft when required by the legislature to do so. They also follow the federal example of not resigning even if the legislature does not support their plans.

3. Article 6.

4. Ibid.

In spite of the obvious subordination of the executive to the Cantonal legislature, it must be admitted that the position and the knowledge which the Councillors possess, secure for them great influence with the Great or Cantonal Council. It has the strength which experience acquires by permanence in office and, as such, the Executive Council supplies the chief impulse to the legislature.

COMMUNES AND DISTRICTS

The Communes. There are now 3,118 Communes in Switzerland and they vary in size and population. They have the right of self-government within the limits prescribed by the Cantonal Constitutions and the statutory laws of the Cantons concerned. In matters assigned to them, for example, education, public health, poor relief, water supply, police, etc., they have complete autonomy and in their administration they possess the same structure as the Cantons. The general direction of local affairs, the decision of all matters connected thereto and the appointment of the principal officers of the Commune are vested in the assembly of all adult male citizens of the Commune. For the conduct of current business and for the execution of the communal laws, the assembly of all the people elects a Council. In most of the French parts of Switzerland and particularly in the large Communes, the assembly of the people does not transact business directly. On the other hand, they elect a Communal Council which transacts business on behalf of the assembly of the people. The French Communes, therefore, have two Councils: a large one which deals with questions of general policy and all matters of importance; second, a smaller executive body with the Mayor at its head and entrusted with the duty of the execution of communal laws. The decisions of the bigger Council, which may be called a municipal Parliament, are sometimes subject to referendum.

The Districts. The District is an intermediate division between the Canton and the Commune. But it does not constitute, except in a few places, a political community like the Commune. The District is merely an administrative unit. The chief district official is elected by the people and at some places he is assisted by a Council with advisory functions. The district official represents the Cantonal Government in the district and, with the assistance of his subordinates, carries out its orders, executes the laws and acts as a link between the Canton and the Commune.

Swiss local government presents some significant features unknown elsewhere. Every Swiss citizen must be a citizen of some commune before he can acquire the citizenship of a Canton and Switzerland. No foreigner can be naturalized in Switzerland who has not previously been declared acceptable as a member by a commune. Secondly, the home commune, as it is called, is ultimately responsible for him and his family. "The Federal Constitution assumes that, in case of their absolute indigence, this Commune must support them, wherever they happen to be living, although it may of course oblige them to return to their political home."⁵ Then, every Commune has an estate distinct from the one to which all residents contribute by taxation. The management of such an estate is reserved to the members of the Commune and not residents of the Commune. The law distinguishes between the local commune, in which every citizen has an equal right to vote and is liable to equal taxation after three months of residence, and the commune of origin or home commune.⁶ Then, the more important municipalities undertake and perform many economic activities which may be characterised as a socialistic tendency. The growth of this kind of municipal socialism in Switzerland has now become an important characteristic of Swiss political life in general, though no Socialist party has marked a conspicuous place for itself in the country.

While summing up the nature and importance of local self-government in Switzerland, Lord Bryce maintained that the commune is not only the basis of the administrative fabric, "but also the training which the people have received from practice in it has been a chief cause of their success in working republican institutions. Nowhere in Europe has it been so fully left to the hands of the people. The Swiss themselves lay stress upon it, as a means of educating the citizens in public work, as instilling the sense of civic duty, and as enabling governmental action to be used for the benefit of the community without either sacrificing local initiative or working the action of the central authority too strong and too pervasive."⁷

5. Rappard, W.E., The Government of Switzerland, p. 53.

6. Ibid.

7. Modern Democracies, Vol. I, p. 375.

CHAPTER IV

THE FRAME OF NATIONAL GOVERNMENT

THE FEDERAL EXECUTIVE

Organisation of the Executive. The supreme directing and executive authority of the Confederation is exercised by a commission of seven men known as the Bundesrat or Federal Council located at Berne. This commission of seven men or Federal Council is chosen every four years by Federal Assembly, that is, at the joint session of the National Council and the Council of States. One of the members of the Federal Council is annually elected by the Assembly to serve as its Chairman and is designated Federal President, while another is chosen as Vice-President.

The term of office of the Federal Council coincides with the tenure of the National Council. It is elected at the beginning of each National Council and is completely renewed after every general election. Vacancies arising within the normal period of four years are filled at the next meeting of the Assembly for the unexpired term of office. Although it is not required by the Constitution, the Federal Councillors are almost always chosen from among the members of the Assembly. When so chosen, they must resign their seats in the legislature. The Constitution, however, prescribes that "no more than one person from each Canton may be chosen for the Federal Council." Custom, on the other hand, insists one Councillor shall always come from Berne, another from Zurich and one from Vaud. This was, however, broken in the years from 1875 to 1881 and again from 1944 to 1947. The normal arrangement being that the Federal Council is composed of four German-speaking members, two from French-speaking part, and one member from Ticino, the Italian-speaking Canton. The wisdom of this distribution has been proved by long experience, because all the three language groups and both confessions are more or less fairly represented.

There have several times been proposals for direct election of the Federal Council by the people and there has twice been a referendum on the subject in 1900 and 1942. But it had been unsuccessful both times. Lowell thought that popular election of the Federal Councillors would intensify party rivalry extending its "influence over the whole range of policies, and produce a radical change in the character of public life." The national conventions which would come into existence for the nomination of the candidates, "would put an end to the low development of party which renders the permanent, business-like, non-partisan character of the Federal Council possible, which makes it possible for the Councillors to retain their places permanently even when their policy does not prevail. The Councillors would become the standard-bearers of the different groups, and could hardly maintain the mediating attitude that has made their position unique among the governments of the world."² The proposal for direct election has each time been made to secure representation on the Council for an excluded party or section of the country. It may, therefore, be said, as Hughes remarks, "that the threat of proposing a constitutional initiative for direct election is the section behind the custom of having all main parties represented on the Federal Council."³ This may be illustrated from the party representation in the Federal Council. In 1943 there were 3 Liberals, 2 Catholics, 1 Farmer and 1 Socialist. In 1951, 3 Radical Liberals, 2 Catholic Conservatives, 1 Social Democrat and 1 Peasant and Middle class were chosen. The nature of representations remains more or less similar.

Federal Council not a Partisan Body. The Federal Council, says Bryce, "stands outside party, is not chosen to do party work, does not determine party policy, yet is not wholly without some party colour."⁴ The Councillors are chosen neither from the parliamentary majority as in Britain, nor are they political leaders of different parties or groups, as in France, who coalesce to form the Government. They are a heterogeneous group of politicians belonging to four different parties who are chosen for their capacity as administrators. Speakers or tacticians are not needed in the Swiss executive. No matter how well-qualified on other accounts, no one can expect to be elected to the Federal Council unless which, above all others, the Swiss demand of those who hold public office—modesty. "In his previous Cantonal and national service, he must have left an image of a person dedicated to his work without thought of personal recognition. The office must seek the candidate, not the candidate the office." It is administrative skill, mental grasp, good sense, tact and temper, the sum total of the virtuous qualities, that recommend a candidate for selection. According to Dicey two ideas underlie the institutions of Switzerland. The first is, the universal acceptance of the sovereignty of the people, and the second is, that politics is a matter of business with the Swiss people.⁵ It is this second idea which guides the nation in the selection of their administrators and get their affairs managed by men of capacity.

Moreover, the Federal Council is not an independent or co-ordinate branch of government. It is essentially a business body subordinate to the Federal Assembly. It is not expected to frame and control the policy of the government. Its duty consists in conducting the administration and giving advice on legislation. Policy belongs to the Federal Assembly and the Federal Councillors are there to carry out its behest. They are, indeed, the servants of the policy-framing and policy-initiating body and, accordingly, they cannot be partisans. All differences among themselves, though they are chosen from different parties, are ironed out by a spirit of compromise as public opinion in Switzerland expects every one

2. Lowell, A.L., Government and Parties in Continental Europe, Vol. II, p. 320.

3. The Federal Government of Switzerland, p. 108.

4. Modern Democracies, Vol. I, p. 394.

5. Dicey, Law of the Constitution, pp. 608-09.

to subordinate his own feelings to the public good. Lowell rightly remarks that the influence of the Federal Council "depends to a great extent on the confidence in its impartiality, and hence its position is fortified by anything that tends to strengthen and perpetuate its non-partisan character."⁶

Lengthy Tenure of Federal Councillors. The obvious result is that the Federal Council is unique in its stability. It is virtually a permanent body, though chosen afresh every four years. The old members are always re-elected as long as they care to serve. If the National Council is dissolved earlier than the end of its normal four-year term, the first business of the new Assembly is to elect the Federal Council and in practice it means re-electing the old members without any consideration of the change in the complexion of the National Council. The non-partisan character of the Council and the fact that the Councillors are irremovable from office further contribute to their lengthy tenure. The average period of service is more than ten years, but persons like Signor Guiseppe Motta, a Federal Councillor from Ticino, have held office from 1911 to 1940. Dr. Phillippe Etter served for 23 years, Dr. Karl Koblet for 14 years, Dr. Max Petitpierre for 10 years and Dr. Rodolphe Rubattal for 8 years.⁷

Two important reasons may be assigned for this lengthy tenure. One, of course, is that to the Swiss it seems as irrational for the State to lose a valuable administrator on account of a difference of opinion. Dicey likens the Swiss Federal Council to a Board of Directors of a joint-stock company, and adds that there is no more reason for altering its composition if it is doing its work efficiently in the general interest than there is to alter the membership of such a board under similar circumstances. Second, when a Councillor dies or resigns, the range of candidates for the place is quite limited, for, in practice, Councillors are almost invariably selected from the members of the Federal Assembly which is by no means a numerous body. Moreover, the Constitution ordains that no more than one member from a single Canton⁸ may be chosen, and by usage the Cantons of Berne, Zurich and Vaud must be represented. This limitation narrows the choice. Finally, the office itself does not carry a fabulous salary and other amenities are also meagre. The Federal Councillor now draws a salary of 110,000 francs per annum. It is certainly an improvement over what it was in 1848 and even 1951, but a large number of Federal Councillors remain men of the people. It is told of a Federal Councillor that when he was asked why he travelled third class, he replied, "Because there isn't a fourth." The Swiss people are frugal and simple in habits and they do not want public offices to become glamorous. Their call to a public office is duty and patriotic devotion. They let those continue in office who are dedicated.

Organisation of Federal Administration. The work of federal administration is divided into seven departments, equivalent to the num-

6. Government and Parties in Continental Europe, pp. 202-03.

7. Dr. Josef Escher succeeded Dr. Errico Celio in 1950 on his appointment as Swiss Minister in Rome. Herr Von Steiger and Herr Nobles retired because of their age and were succeeded by Dr. H. Feldmann and Prof. M. Weber on December 3, 1951.

8. Article 95.

ber of the Federal Councillors. The allocation of departments is made among themselves by mutual arrangement. Each Councillor presides over a department and as his tenure of office is pretty lengthy, he retains for practical reasons of convenience and economy, the same department continuously. The assignment is, however, nominally made afresh every year. At one time there was a complaint that actual changes in the allotment were too frequent. It is no longer the case now and the complaint is that changes are not made often enough.

Although the business of the Federal Council is divided into different departments and one of the members is at the head of each department, yet the Constitution ordains that "decisions shall be under the name and by the authority of the Federal Council."⁹ This provision gives to the Federal Council a corporate personality and makes it corporately responsible. It acts as a collegiate body and, thus, its decisions always come from the body as a whole. The Constitution further prescribes that the Federal Council "can only proceed to business when at least four members are present."¹⁰ The Law of 1914 on the organization of Federal Administration also provides that the deliberations of the Federal Council shall be in private, that decisions shall normally be by count of hands, that there must be at least three votes, and a majority of the Councillors present, on the majority side, and that the President has a casting vote.¹¹ All this means that the Federal Council must meet at least once a week and its deliberations are secret. Four members of the Council constitute a quorum and decisions are taken on a majority basis, but all the decisions must be supported by at least three members.

There has been some criticism on the corporate responsibility of the Federal Council, and it has long been said that "there are seven Federal Councillors, but no Federal Council." It is true that members of four different parties can hardly hammer out a common policy. Then, the Councillors are not obliged to stand by each other, or even to pretend to hold out the same opinions and there have been occasions when members of the Council have argued against each other in Assembly, when sharply divided on policy. Decision, moreover, is by majority vote. But since the deliberations of the Federal Council are secret, and former Councillors are reluctant to recount their experiences, it is difficult to state definitely how much diversity of opinion ordinarily exists. It seems quite evident, however, that members of the Council do not carry their party principles too far. This is partly due to the Swiss habit of compromise and submission to the majority. But, as Hughes remarks, "the loneliness of the very high office and the greatness of responsibility can hardly fail to engender a corporate spirit; the essential element for obtaining genuine agreements—secrecy of discussion—is after all present."¹² The Councillors also know it that the final decision of all the most important questions rests with the Assembly, the sovereign body whose servants they all are. The most routine decisions in the ordi-

9. Article 103.

10. Article 100

11. Articles 4, 6 and 7 of the Law of 1914.

12. Hughes, C., The Federal Constitution of Switzerland, p. 116.

nary transaction of business are made by the Councillor competent in the matter and then placed before the Council for usual ratification.

The President. The officer whose constitutional title is the "President of the Confederation" is one of the seven Councillors, and is nominated, as also the Vice-President, by the Federal Assembly for a period of one year. Swiss democracy insists upon the principle of rotation and the Constitution expressly provides that the retiring President cannot be elected either as President or as Vice-President for the following year; and the same member cannot be Vice-President for two consecutive years.¹³ Usage, however, requires that the Vice-President succeeds the President and the two offices rotate among the members of the Federal Council according to seniority. New Federal Councillors serve beneath all their seniors before filling the Presidency and those who have filled the office go to the bottom of the list. It means that the Councillor can become a President for more than one term though not consecutively. M. Giuseppe Motta was five times President, Herr Muller was President in 1899, 1907 and 1913, and Dr. Phillipe Eter in 1939, 1942, 1947 and 1953. Dr. Max Petipierre has run three terms.

Although the President of the Confederation holds an office of some dignity and enjoys some precedence over his colleagues, yet his precedence over the rest is merely a formal precedence. He is in no sense the chief executive. He is not even primus inter pares, as he becomes one like others after the expiry of a year. Nor is he the chief administrator as he has no more power than his colleagues and is no more responsible than other Councillors are for the governance of the country. All decisions emanate from the Federal Council as a single authority. The President is simply a Chairman of the Federal Council and presides over its meetings. As Chairman only, he exercises a casting vote and that, too, in case of a tie. Such official authority as he may exercise comes to him as a member of the Council and as head of one of the seven administrative departments. He gets a salary equal to each of his other colleagues,¹⁴ except an additional allowance of 5,000 francs for meeting entertainment costs for the year of his office. Switzerland has no palatial Government House for its President and he is not even provided with an official car. There is no grandeur and as the Presidency confers a more or less nominal honour, Swiss citizens are apt to forget who their President is "just now", although they are likely to know by name the majority of the members of the Federal Council.

If such are the powers and authority of the Swiss President, then, it is generally asked where is the need for such an office? The answer is simple. There are certain duties, such as receiving potentates and ministers of other countries, which are impossible for seven men to perform simultaneously. Besides, there are some ceremonial national duties which must necessarily be performed by some one. The functions of the 14. Under the Federal Arrete of 1959, the annual salary of a Federal Councillor is 65,000 francs. Those who are above 55 years of age are entitled to, after 10 years in office, a pension which varies between forty and sixty per cent of salary, according to their tenure of office.

13. Article 98.

President are laid down in the Law on the Organization of Federal Administration of 1914 and it gives him certain very limited emergency powers, general supervisory powers, and the responsibility for the Federal Chancellery. It, also, states that "the President represents the Confederation at home and abroad." Formerly by virtue of the system known as the 'Presidential Department,' the President of the Confederation was also head of the Foreign Office. But as the President changed annually the Foreign Department also circulated among the members of the Federal Council. The result was that there was no continuity of direction in the management of a branch of public business, which perhaps more than any other, requires permanence. Under the influence of Councillor Numa Droz the experiment of dissociating the Presidency from the Foreign Department was tried during the years 1887-94. It was again tried in 1915-17, and was permanently adopted in 1920. At present a Federal Councillor may well remain in the department to which he was first appointed until he retires, may it be a Foreign Department or any other Department.

Functions of the Federal Council. Article 95 of the Constitution designates the Federal Council as "the supreme executive and governing authority of the Confederation." As the supreme executive of Switzerland, the Federal Council is entrusted with most of the duties that its counterparts have in other countries. In Switzerland, however, much of the responsibility is shared with other organs of government. Article 102 contains a long list of the principal functions and duties of the Federal Council.

1. It conducts the affairs of the Confederation in accordance with federal laws and decrees.

2. The Federal Council must ensure due observance of the Constitution, the law and decrees of the Confederation, and Federal Treaties. For the observance of international treaties, the Federal Government does not appoint its own officers. They are, as a rule, executed by the Cantonal authorities. The Federal Council is empowered to intervene and take necessary action, either on its own initiative or in response to an appeal against a grievance, if the Cantonal governments do not co-operate in the proper execution of federal laws, decrees and international treaties, unless the appeal is of the type which should go to the Federal Tribunal as provided for in Article 113. In the classes of cases reserved for the Federal Tribunal, the Federal Council is entitled to take measures on its own initiative to secure the observance of the Constitution, "both to prevent the unlawful action and perhaps to remedy it, but without prejudice to an eventual appeal to the Tribunal."¹⁵

The Federal Council has exercised this authority with great tact and discretion by permitting elasticity in interpretation. Even where there is a sufficient cause of trouble with a Canton, its methods of compulsion and use of force are more consistent with the Gandhian technique. The subsidies given to the Cantons are withheld and troops are sent "who accomplish their mission without bloodshed; for they do not pillage, burn or kill, but peaceably quartered there at the expense of the Canton, 15. Hughes, C., The Federal Government of Switzerland, p. 112.

and literally eat it into submission. This is certainly a novel way of enforcing obedience to the law, but with the frugal Swiss it is very effective."¹⁶

3. According to a constitutional provision the Cantons must have their Constitutions and alterations sanctioned ('guaranteed') by the Assembly. That is to say, the Federal Assembly has to pass an arrete granting or refusing the guarantee. It is the duty of the Federal Council to supervise the 'guarantee' of Cantonal Constitutions.¹⁷ The guarantee is granted provided that the Cantonal Constitution contains nothing contrary to the provisions of the Federal Constitution; that the Cantonal institutions are representative or democratic; and that such political institutions have the consent of the people.

4. The Federal Council submits projects of laws and arretes to the Federal Assembly and gives its preliminary advice upon projects which the Councils or the Cantons may send up to it. The usual procedure is that the Federal Council submits a message or report accompanied by a draft embodying the action which the Federal Council wishes the Assembly to take. This draft forms the basis of discussion in the Commission of each Chamber of the Assembly. The Federal Council may thus initiate legislation and the Federal Assembly only amends it. Legislative measures may be initiated by the people or by the dominant party in the Assembly. At the instance of any member of the Assembly a resolution may be passed requesting the Federal Council "to address itself to the subject and prepare a Bill." It also frequently advises other Chamber of the Assembly or the Canton whenever asked to give advice on the form or substance of a measure. The Assembly receives the recommendations of the Council accompanying the draft law with respect and hesitates to enact it when the Council's report is unfavourable.

The legislative responsibilities of the Federal Council do not end here. As a general rule, a Councillor is assigned to guide the Bill all the way through the legislative process. The Bill is examined in the Committee in his presence and he gives his advice and comments. When it goes to either Chamber of the Federal Assembly, the Councillor is there to introduce the Bill, to explain its objects and purposes, and to defend it, if necessary. As Prof. Codding says, the Councillor in general acts "as its shepherd before the legislative wolves."¹⁸ The result is, in the words of Professor Rappard, "one is forced to admit that the most responsible and influential work is that not of the so-called legislature, but of the executive."¹⁹

5. Deputies of both the Houses of the Federal Assembly are given the right of interpellation. It is the duty of a member of the Federal Council to reply either immediately or at a later session. After the reply has been made, the deputy who initiated the interpellation is given the opportunity to declare whether he was satisfied or not with the reply. If

16. Lowell, A.L., Government and Parties in Continental Europe, Vol. II, p. 197.

17. Article 102, Section 3.

18. Codding, G.A., The Federal Government of Switzerland, p. 93.

19. Rappard, W.E., The Government of Switzerland, p. 84.

he is not satisfied, he can have recourse to motion or postulate. If the motion passes, the Council need not resign. Since 1946, the National Council has also made use of the "question hour." A Deputy may question members of the Federal Council on any subject concerning the federal administration.

6. As a result of the growing legislation and increasingly complex nature of governmental activities the Federal Assembly delegates to the Federal Council a great deal of discretion in the administration of federal law. The Federal Council issues rules and regulations thereto which have the force of laws. Such rules and regulations are subject to the legislative referendum. There has been a steady increase in the power of issuing ordinances even in normal times. In times of emergency, the ordinance legislative power practically replaced normal legislation. It has become a custom at such times for the Federal Assembly to grant the Federal Council "full powers" to issue any ordinances it sees fit for the protection of Switzerland's neutrality and economic stability. In 1914 and 1939 the Federal Assembly conferred powers on the Federal Council which even permitted it to deviate from the Constitution.

7. The Federal Council examines the laws and ordinances of the Cantons that are required to be submitted for its approval. It also supervises the branches of Cantonal administration where such supervision is incumbent upon it.

8. It looks into the execution of judgments of the Federal Tribunal and of agreements and arbitration awards upon disputes between Cantons. The execution of the decisions of the courts and of many provisions of the Constitution, and of much federal legislation is left to the Cantons. If the Cantons fail to carry out these obligations, then, in the last resort the appeal is made to the Federal Council.

9. All federal appointments, except those entrusted to the Federal Assembly, the Federal Tribunal, or any other authority, are made by the Federal Council. The Federal Council in practice delegates its rights of appointment in very many cases to the various branches of administration and other independent authorities, like a Broadcasting Corporation.

10. It examines the treaties which the Cantons make with each other or with foreign countries and sanctions them if it thinks fit, otherwise the Federal Council lodges an appeal with the Federal Assembly for annulling the same.²⁰

11. The Federal Council conducts the foreign relations of Switzerland, safeguards the external interests of the Confederation, ensures the external safety of the country, and maintenance of her independence and her neutrality. The Federal Council also negotiates treaties and ratifies them after approval of the Federal Assembly.

12. It looks after the internal security of the Confederation, and the maintenance of peace and order. Actually the maintenance of internal peace and order is the concern of the Cantonal governments. If internal order breaks down, then only federal intervention takes place.

20. Article 85, Section 5.

The Federal Assembly determines the measures to be taken²¹ and the Federal Council looks after them. "What is presumably meant is that the Federal Council asks for an arrete, which the Federal Assembly passes and the Federal Council carries out."

13. In the case of emergency, when the Federal Assembly is not in session, the Federal Council is empowered to call out troops and employ them as it may think fit. But it must convene a session of the Assembly immediately, if the number of troops called out exceeds two thousand men or if they remain mobilised for more than three weeks.

14. The Federal Council has charge of the Federal Army and all branches of administration thereof which are vested in the Confederation.

15. It administers the Federal finances and prepares the budget and submits accounts of federal receipts and expenditure.

16. The Federal Council supervises the official conduct of all officers and employees of the Federal administration.

17. The Federal Council gives an account of its work to the Federal Assembly in each ordinary session, presents to it a report on the internal conditions in the country and foreign relations of the Confederation, and recommends for its consideration such measures which it thinks useful for promoting the general welfare. It also submits special reports when the Federal Assembly or either of its Houses demand.

18. Finally, the Federal Council has some powers of a judicial nature. It hears appeals of private individuals against decisions of the various Departments and against decisions of the Federal Railways Administration. It has also appellate jurisdiction over decisions of the Cantonal governments in cases relating to discrimination in elementary schools, differences "arising out of treaties relating to trade, patents, military taxation, questions about occupation and settlement, consumption taxes, customs, Cantonal elections, gratuitous equipment of the militia."

Executive subordination to the Legislature. The powers of the Federal Council are really enormous. But in terms of law it is the servant of the Assembly. This is essentially due to the theory of the Swiss Constitution that the executive is not an independent or co-ordinate branch of government. The Assembly elects the Federal Councillors and their term of office coincides with that of the National Council. When the National Council is dissolved for a total revision of the Constitution under Article 120, the Federal Council must also be re-elected for the remainder of the legislative period. The President and the Vice-President are also the nominees of the Assembly.

The functions of the Federal Council are only supervisory. The policy emanates originally and finally from the Assembly. Article 71 of the Constitution contains the statement that the Assembly is the "supreme power in the Confederation." And it is really so. The Federal Council has no initiative of its own, and when it exercises the prerogatives relating to foreign affairs, to the armed forces, or to the ordinary conduct of public administration, there must be either previous authority of the 21. Article 86, Section 7. Also refer to Article 16.

Assembly for all those acts or subsequent ratification. The Assembly's practice of granting full powers in an emergency to the Federal Council definitely suggests that the Assembly can claim back the powers it effectively delegates. The Assembly, moreover, frequently issues directions in the form of resolutions or motions indicating the manner in which the Council's functions shall be discharged. The Council is, also, required to submit annual report to the Assembly. The report is debated, department by department, and eventually sanctioned. The Council may also be required to make special report when the Federal Assembly or one section thereof demands it. The Councillors are not members of the Assembly and yet they attend all plenary legislative sessions, answer questions, give explanation and join in debate. If the Assembly disagrees with them or reverses their decisions in legislative or executive matters, the Councillors do not accept it a political affront and resign. On the contrary, they submit to the will of the Assembly as the final authority and try loyally to carry out its directions. The Council, as Prof. Dicey puts it, "is expected to carry out and does carry out, the policy of the Assembly, and ultimately the policy of the nation, just as a good man of business is expected to carry out the order of his employer."²² Lowell expresses the same idea a little more cogently. It is, he says, "a general maxim of public life in Switzerland that an official gives his advice, but, like a lawyer or an architect, he does not feel obliged to throw up his position because his advice is not followed." He may not resign even when the personal policy of a Councillor has been rejected by the people. The resignation of Herr Welti, who resigned in 1891, when his railway nationalisation policy having been accepted by the Assembly was afterwards rejected by the people at the referendum, was declared as "unconstitutional."²³

Not a Parliamentary type of Government. It follows, then, that the Swiss Federal Council is not a parliamentary Cabinet. In reality it is highly misleading to name the Council a Cabinet. The term Cabinet implies a degree of party solidarity which the Swiss body does not possess. Party solidarity necessitates political homogeneity as team work demands oneness of purpose and aim. The ministers, who make the Cabinet, are the real functionaries, they belong to the parliamentary majority party, and are chosen to carry out party pledges. They are responsible to the legislature, individually and collectively, for all their official acts and remain in office so long as they retain its confidence which, for all intents and purposes, means the confidence of the people who elected them in majority. The Swiss Council, no doubt, is elected by the Federal Assembly, but the Councillors are not required by the Constitution to be members of the Assembly, and if they are, as they generally are, before their nomination as Federal Councillors, they must resign their seats therefrom. They become Councillors not because that they belong to the parliamentary majority party or are the leaders of the political parties, but in their capacity as administrators and in conformity with Swiss democratic sense that they represent all interests, people and territories. It is true that they appear in both the Chambers of the Assembly, take an active part in debates, and answer to questions put to them by members,²⁴ yet they do not profess and advocate a policy. Nor do they vote. The law, no doubt, demands that the Federal Council should hold regular meetings once a week, its deliberations should be in private and its decisions reached by majority vote,²⁵ and the Constitution insists that "decisions shall be under the name and by the authority of the Federal Council."²⁶ Nonetheless the Federal Council is not a homogeneous whole and differences of opinion among the Councillors are permitted and allowed to become known. They occasionally speak on opposite sides in the legislature, although it goes to the credit of Swiss democracy that such differences rarely cause trouble. But this is not the way of Cabinet government. Differences of any kind are not permitted in the ministerial ranks.

22. The Law of the Constitution, p. 611. Also refer to Bryce, Modern Democracies, Vol. I, p. 446.

23. Encyclopaedia Britannica, 11th ed., p. 211. After the First World War, the number of such resignations has increased.

Ghosh, R.C., The Government of the Swiss Republic, p. 92.

The Constitution also permits the Federal Council to recommend to the Assembly for its consideration such legislative measures as it may think useful for promoting general welfare.²⁷ It is also very common for the Assembly to pass a resolution and request the Federal Council to prepare a Bill on some subject, and, in fact, all measures not introduced by the Council are, as a rule, referred to it before they are sent to a committee or taken up for debate. In this way, the Council exerts a great influence in shaping the actual legislation. Still, it does not give to the Federal Council a legal legislative leadership. Its role remains only advisory and here lies the fundamental difference.

But the real difference between a Cabinet and Swiss Federal Council hinges upon their relationship with the legislature. The Cabinet is created by the legislature and it exists on its confidence. In Switzerland the relations between the two are based upon an entirely different principle. While the connection between the Federal Council and the Assembly is quite close and in many aspects akin to what it is between the Cabinet and the legislature under a parliamentary system of government, yet the Federal Council neither leads nor controls the Assembly. The Assembly is the master and it possesses "the supreme power in the Confederation;"²⁸ the Federal Council is just its subordinate authority. The Constitution does not make the executive an independent or co-ordinate department of government. The Federal Council is not responsible to the Assembly in the same way as a Cabinet is to the legislature. Moreover, resignation of a Councillor is not likely to bring a crisis. The Federal Councillors must not resign collectively or individually when their measures are rejected or their policies reversed by the Assembly. They continue in office no matter what the Assembly does to their Bills or executive orders. This is so, because the Federal Councillors do not initiate or con-

24. Article 101.

25. Articles 4, 6, 7. Organization of Federal Administration and Law, 1914.

26. Article 103.

27. Article 102, Section 4.

28. Article 71.

trol the policy and they are not collectively pledged to pursue it. They have no policy of their own. Herein lies the real secret of the Federal Council's position.

Not even a Presidential System of Government. If the Swiss Federal Council is not akin to a Parliamentary Cabinet, it is not even the Presidential type of executive. There is, indeed, no semblance between the two. The Federal Council is not, like the executive in the United States, a separate branch of government. The American Presidency is a single executive and the Constitution assigns to the President independent and exclusive powers with a policy of his own. The President is, in brief, both a executive and the executive. Congress cannot encroach upon his constitutional rights, nor can it limit his action. The only contact between the executive and the legislature is through the Presidential messages, otherwise neither he nor the members of his 'Cabinet' have any access to either House of Congress. The Secretaries, who are the administrative heads of the different departments of government and are said to make the President's Cabinet, are appointed by him and they remain in office so long as he wishes them to continue. It is for the President to decide when and how to consult them. It is, again, for the President to determine whether to accept their advice or not. They are the advisers of the President and they really make his 'family'. The office of the President does not depend upon Congress. He is popularly elected for a term of four years and his office goes by calendar. In fact, the Swiss Confederation has no President as the Cantons have no Governors. The collegial system is the traditional form of Government and the only one in use in Switzerland.

The Swiss Federal Council is not a separate branch of government with an independent policy of its own. It has been given no veto upon laws to prevent encroachment upon its rights. Nor is it completely divorced from the legislature. The connection between the Federal Council and the Assembly is close and intimate. In fact, the Federal Council is very often described as the "Executive Committee of the Swiss Parliament." Whatever it be, it remains a fact that the Federal Council is not an independent authority at all, for its administrative acts are supervised, controlled or reversed by the Assembly.

What is it then? To sum up, the Swiss Federal executive is neither Parliamentary nor Presidential. It is unique by itself inasmuch as that it is collegial body of seven members who serve as the country's supreme executive. The framers of the Constitution rejected the American precedent of a single elected exponent of the country's executive power. They were, no doubt, not unconscious of the advantages of unity and continuity of action inherent in an elected President. But as they added, "The Committee could not think of proposing the creation of an office so contrary to the ideas and habits of the Swiss people who might see therein evidence of a monarchical or dictatorial tendency. In Switzerland one attached to councils....Our democratic feeling revolts against any exclusive personal pre-eminence."²⁹

The Constitution in 1848, accordingly, entrusted the supreme directing and executive power in the Confederation to a Federal Council consisting of seven members, and the relevant provisions are still in force today.³⁰ Having created a collegial executive, it was made to include the important features of both the Parliamentary and Presidential systems of government. The Swiss executive is, indeed, the mixture of the two and the architects of the Constitution were original in giving to their country an absolutely new mechanism of government which combined the merits and excluded the defects of both the parliamentary and non-parliamentary systems. Lord Bryce correctly remarks that the Federal Council is not a Cabinet like that of Britain and the countries which have imitated her Cabinet system, "for it does not lead the legislature, and is not displaceable thereby. Neither is it independent of the legislature, like the executive of the United States and of their republics which have borrowed therefrom the so-called 'Presidential system,' and though it has some of the features of both these schemes, it differs from both in having no distinctly partisan character."

29. As quoted in Brooks' The Government of Switzerland, p. 76.

This is surely the unique feature of the Swiss Constitution. In no other modern republic is executive power entrusted to a council instead of to an individual, and in no other free country has the working executive so little to do with politics. The Swiss Federal Council, to quote Bryce again, "stands outside party, is not chosen to do party work, does not determine party policy, yet is not wholly without some party colour." The practice now accepted and followed, since the election of 1959, is that the composition of the Federal Council should reflect as far as possible the strength of all the major political parties.

Advantages of the Swiss Collegial Executive System. The constitutional position and the work of the collegiate executive are really admirable, for it has some of the chief merits of the Cabinet system without the disadvantages. In Switzerland there is the same mutual confidence and co-operation between the legislature and the executive as it is obtainable under the parliamentary system of government. But a Cabinet should advantageously belong to one single majority party in the legislature or to a combination of two or more parties who agree to work out a common political programme. The Swiss Federal Council, on the other hand, is representative of all the opinions and areas in the country, and still it is pledged to no political programme. Such a representative executive does not leave an opportunity for the Opposition to grow and exist. When all the interests and opinions are given their due share of influence in the conduct of public affairs, it really means a democracy; a government of all, by all and for all—a real government by consent. Then, the Federal Council is a reputed non-partisan body and its role is not only to advise and influence the Federal Assembly, but also to mediate, "should need arise, between contending parties, adjusting difficulties and arranging compromises in a spirit of conciliation."³¹ This is not difficult in Switzerland because public opinion expects of every Swiss to subordinate his own feelings to the public good and, as such, personal ambition in Switzerland has played a smaller part than in any other free country. Lowell, accordingly, says that the Federal Council "may almost be regarded as a mainspring and is certainly the balance-wheel of the national government.³²

30. Article 95.

31. Bryce, Modern Democracies, Vol. I, p. 398.

Another advantage of the Swiss collegiate executive is its permanence and stability. As it is not dependent on the vote of the legislature for its life, the executive, in Switzerland, is stable, more or less permanent and certain to follow a coherent and consistent administrative policy. Moreover, the Swiss system enables proved administrative talent to be kept in the service of the nation, no matter what personal opinion they may hold on particular issues. Such a homogeneity in diversity, stability and continuity are inconceivable under a parliamentary system of government.

Finally, the Swiss system secures continuity in policy and permits traditions to be formed. When the members are appointed singly and at considerable intervals, it "lifts the body above the transient impulses that stir the people." There are no partisan commotions and flaring up of emotions. Both of these are really invaluable traditions in the life of a democratic nation and such traditions cement continuity in policy. It is, no doubt, often contended that continuity and traditions have the tendency to make administration "groovy," but this is hardly a danger in Switzerland where every citizen is imbued with a public spirit and where Councillors are always accessible, and in constant touch with the Assembly.

Growth in the Powers of the Federal Council. According to law the Federal Council is the servant of the Assembly, but in reality it is exactly not so. The Federal Council, observes Lord Bryce, "exerts in practice almost as much authority as do English, and more than do some French Cabinets, so that it may be said to lead as well as follow."³³ A lengthy tenure of office adds to the Councillor's official prestige, administrative skill and political judgment. The mere fact that the Federal Assembly transfers to the Council most of the legislative initiative and very often seeks its advice on all measures offer to the Councillors vast opportunities to determine the tenure and direction of public policy.³⁴ The nature of modern legislation, which requires considerable technical knowledge, has further helped to transfer the legislative initiative into the hands of an expert body like the Federal Council.

With the help of its expert staff the Federal Council drafts the Bill and presents to the Assembly, along with a well-reasoned report presenting the purpose of the proposed legislation and giving the reasons why it should or should not be enacted. Even in the case where the Federal Council drafts Bill on the direction of the Assembly, it usually does not enact the draft law when the Council's report is unfavourable. Next, the Council enjoys the delegation of legislative powers and the rules and regulations framed thereunder are as valid as the law itself. Emergency powers of the Council are as significant as its ordinance-making power. "One of the most sweeping grant of power to any democratic 32. Government and Parties in Continental Europe, Vol. I, p. 398.

33. Modern Democracies, Vol. I, p. 397.

34. Refer to Rappard's The Federal Government of Switzerland, pp. 82-executive whose country was not actually engaged in war was given in 1939 to the Federal Council."³⁵ The powers given to the Council by the Assembly both in 1914 and 1939 went very far to suspending the Constitution altogether, made the government almost the sole legislature and did much to check the interplay of democratic institutions, especially of the referendum.

In fact, a steady growth in the powers of the Federal Council had been the course of Swiss constitutional history. Since the introduction of proportional representation, the Federal Assembly has ceased to be dominated by one or two political parties. "It is increasingly turning out to be an arena of political higgling and haggling between a large number of parties" with the consequent result that the Assembly does not today enjoy its past prestige and power. The Assembly's loss is the Council's gain. Moreover, in the process of centralisation in Switzerland the authority of all the central institutions has considerably extended but by comparison with the Federal Assembly, the Federal Council has become more powerful and independent.

The contemporary tendency all the world over for strengthening the executive power has also helped to disturb the Swiss balance of power. Practically irremovable, and difficult to control by reason of the great technical complexity of its tasks, it has, according to Andre, "gradually come to wield a quasi-absolute power." The two World Wars and the economic depression of 1930, were the most important of all the causes which have contributed to the growth of the powers of the Federal Council. In their efforts to maintain Switzerland's traditional neutrality and to protect the country's economy during and after the Wars, the Federal Assembly delegated "blanket" authority over matters, hitherto regulated directly by statute, to the Federal Council. In pursuance of these powers, the Council has issued ordinances vitally affecting personal liberties and properties of the people. It has also issued decrees relating to private law in the name of public security or necessity. The power of issuing ordinances, though it is a normal feature in the Continental countries, was hitherto unknown in Switzerland. Adopted as a measure of national expediency or exigency, it has come to stay in Switzerland and has assumed a normal character of the Federal Council's executive authority. Is this new development not antagonistic to the traditional Swiss principle of legislative supremacy? The system of direct democracy has probably given the most fatal blow to the supreme power of the Assembly. On many occasions legislative measures passed by the Assembly by a heavy majority have been rejected by the people at a referendum. Then, many constitutional amendments initiated by the people but opposed by Assembly have been finally adopted by the people. Even with regard to ordinary legislation the Federal Council, in the words of Bryce, "is a guide as well as an instrument, and often suggests as well as drafts measures." When the supreme authority receives suggestions and accepts them, and allows the same suggesting authority to draft for it legislative measures, which are the expression of its supremacy, it really does not remain supreme, though legally it may continue to be so.

35. Coddington, G.A., The Federal Government of Switzerland, p. 85.

THE FEDERAL ADMINISTRATION

The Federal administration is divided into seven departments each headed by a Federal Councillor. By virtue of the law on the organization of Federal Administration of 1914, the departments are: (1) The Political Department; (2) Department of the Interior; (3) Department of Justice and Police; (4) Military Department; (5) Department of Finance and Customs; (6) Public Economy; and (7) Traffic and Power. The departments are allocated by the Federal Council itself among its members. Every Federal Councillor is also Deputy for another department.

The functions assigned to departments are constantly changing and the Law of 1914 is not a convenient document for determining the jurisdiction of each department. Moreover, Article 23 of the Law gives the Federal Council power to determine what subject-matters are to be delegated to the departments "to deal with on their own, and provides for appeals to the Federal Council itself against such departmental decisions in certain circumstances."³⁶

The Political Department embraces some minor political responsibilities, but it is essentially a foreign office and deals with foreign relations of the Confederation. Before 1914, this department was known as the Presidential Department and it always went to the President of the Confederation. But this required an annual change, with the change of President and, accordingly, there was no continuity of direction which is so essential in the conduct of foreign affairs. Now the Political Department goes to one of the Councillors and it continues under him so long as he remains a member of the Federal council, no matter whether he happens at the same time to be the President of the Confederation or not. M. Ernest Noles, the President for 1949, held charge of the Department of Finance and Customs while Dr. Max Petitpierre was in charge of the Political Department from 1945 to 1951 and continued to hold the same for another four-year term after his re-election. Since neutrality is an essential condition of Switzerland's domestic peace, the task of the Political Department is really arduous. The choice of the people in selecting a person who should shoulder this responsibility has been remarkable and it has fallen on such men as Ador (1917), Mota (1920-40), and Petitpierre.

"Neutrality has no value," writes Andre, "unless the independence it represents is defended by force of arms." Neutrality, thus, includes the defence of Switzerland's own independence by force of arms, if necessary, and the Swiss guard themselves with vigilance and suspicion against any possible aggression from her neighbours. Military Department is, accordingly, the next most important. The Confederation is not authorised to maintain a standing army,³⁷ and standing army here means a mercenary army.³⁸ The Swiss army consists of conscripts, a very small cadre of regular officers, and some maintenance troops. All Swiss young-men of an adequate physical standard must do military service, except 36. Hughes, C., The Federal Constitution of Switzerland, op. cit., p. 117.

37. Article 13.

38. Hughes, C., The Federal Constitution of Switzerland, op. cit., p. 147.

certain officials while in office and the clergy of recognised denominations. Cantons are also permitted to maintain military contingents. The Federal Government exercises control over federal army, war material, organisation of the army, and military education.

The functions of the Interior Department are miscellaneous and more or less similar to its counterpart in the United States. It is assigned the function of carrying out the Federal Government's policies with regard to education, public works, conservation, and public health. Of the remaining departments, the Departments of Posts and Railways and Public Economy require a little consideration. The Confederation owns and manages the postal, telephonic, telegraphic, wireless and railway system. The Railway Administration is a separate entity, though its functions under the control of the Department of Posts and Railways. It enjoys a considerable degree of autonomy and, inter alia, has a separate budget. The Department of Public Economy is concerned with industry, agriculture, and social insurance. It helps in the exploitation of natural resources and devises measures for accelerating Switzerland's productivity.

The Civil Service. The personnel of the Swiss Civil Service is not numerous as in other countries in spite of the increase in the Central Government's activities and a general tendency towards centralization. This is primarily due to the fact that the Federal authorities do not maintain their officers in the Cantons. All federal measures are put into execution by the local authorities. Apart from the employees of the post office, the railways, and certain exceptional branches of administration, there are no federal officials.

The two World Wars, however, have considerably added to the number of the civil servants. The magnitude of the increase can be examined from these figures. In 1939, the total number of the civil servants was 10,842 and in 1948 it increased to 29,630. After the War some reduction was brought about and the next year the number fell to 26,131. A further reduction by 8,000 was effected in the following years. In 1959, the central administration employed only about 17,554. Nonetheless, extension in the powers of the Central Government is generally deemed in Switzerland as an encroachment on the autonomy of the Cantons. The growth of bureaucracy and the creation of bureaucratic mentality in administration "must tend in the long run," remarks Andre Seigfried, "to compromise the spirit of a regime which is founded on cantonal autonomy and popular delegation, that is to say, a regime which is founded on confidence in men rather than on administrative mechanism from which the human element tends to be more and more excluded.

The Federal civil servants, except a very few of the most important which lie in the gift of the National Assembly, and others appointed by the Federal Tribunal or other federal authorities as the Federal Railway Administration, are appointed by the Federal Council and are dismissed by it for any dereliction of duty. Appointments to the higher posts are made usually for a term of four years subject to re-appointment, which is just a mere formality. These appointments may, therefore, be described as permanent. There is nothing resembling the American Spoils System. Very rarely is any one dismissed for political reasons; nor do such reasons play a great part in appointments. Moreover, meagreness of salaries does not make jobs worth struggling for in Switzerland, and public opinion, too, "would reprehend any attempt to appoint incompetent men for Party reasons." The retirement age is sixty-five years.

The Federal Chancellory. The Federal Chancellory at the head of which is the Chancellor of the Confederation, is responsible for the secretarial business of the Federal Assembly and of the Federal Council.³⁹ The Chancellory is under the superintendence of the President of the Confederation, and the ultimate superintendence of the Assembly. The Chancellor is elected by the Assembly in joint session⁴⁰ for four years but in practice he continues in office until he retires. "The election has a fairly political flavour, and regard is had to the alterations of languages and confessions."⁴¹ The Vice-Chancellors are appointed by the Federal Council, and "one of them usually acquires a sort of moral claim to the office of Chancellor before the place falls vacant."

The personality of the Chancellor is not important, for his duties are chiefly formal and mechanical. The office, however, is of considerable dignity and confers upon its holder a sort of honorary headship of the Federal Civil Services. There is no British equivalent—but the functions have a faint similarity with those of the clerk of the Country Council, while the prestige is not entirely unlike that of the Speaker of the House of Commons." His duties include:

(i) The clerkship of the Federal Council, and the "reorientation" of journalists after its meetings;

(ii) The office of clerk-at-the-table of the two councils and of the Assembly in joint session; his Deputy acts for him in the other Chamber. His functions, as such, include the supervision of the shorthand, and of the translation, and "What we should call the office of the Sergeant-At-Arms";

(iii) The supervision of the publication of the legal acts of the Federal Assembly and the Federal Council;

(iv) The counter-signing of Federal Acts, and the organization of federal elections and initiative and referendum votes;

(v) Certain duties regarding organisation and methods of federal administration.

Merit of Swiss Administration. Bryce points out two prominent merits of Swiss Government and administration in general. One is the cheapness of administration. Finances are carefully managed and current normal administrative expenses are kept appreciably down. It is true that the two World Wars meant a mounting expenditure beyond the financial capacity of Switzerland, but the people being thrifty and inquisitive, who apply to "public expenditure a vigorous standard such as that regulates a peasant household," their economy is relatively stable and the country has not to face serious financial embarrassments.

39. Article 105.

40. Articles 92 and 85, Section 4.

41. Hughes, C., The Federal Constitution of Switzerland, op. cit., p. 109.

Purity, according to Bryce, is the second prominent feature of the Swiss administration. The Federal and Cantonal Governments are practically free from corruption and public scandals are rare, but when they occur "the guilty person, however strong his position had been, must quit public life forthwith."

To this may be added the third, an efficient bureaucracy entirely responsible to democratic government. Professor C.J. Friedrichs, a special student of public administration, goes so far as to say of Switzerland: "Except to the extent to which she was helped by the example of France and Germany, she is full proof of the contention that a democracy is able to do a better job, in fact, than of other systems. For there can be little question that upon close scrutiny by unbiased investigator the Swiss appear to have a more effective responsive officialdom than any other country except Sweden (and Sweden also is very democratically governed)."

CHAPTER V

THE FRAME OF NATIONAL GOVERNMENT (Contd.)

THE FEDERAL LEGISLATURE

The Federal Assembly. The federal legislature is bicameral and is known as the Assemblée Federale or the Federal Assembly. Its two Chambers are: Conseil des états, the Council of States and Conseil national or the National Council. The Swiss Parliament is supreme and the Constitution clearly establishes so when it says "subject to the rights of the people and of the Cantons...the supreme authority of the Confederation is exercised by the Federal Assembly."¹ The Assembly passes the laws which may neither be vetoed by the President of the Confederation nor declared unconstitutional by any Swiss Court. The supremacy of the Federal Assembly further means that other organs of government are not co-ordinate and independent, but are subordinate to it, subject to the provisions of the Constitution. It not only legislates in legislative as well as constitutional matters, but it also chooses the members of the executive—the Federal Council—and elects the Judiciary as well as the Chancellor who is the permanent head of the civil service. The decisions of the Assembly are final and not subject to appeal. To put all this in the words of Rappard, the Federal Assembly is supreme "as long as it retains the confidence and performs the will of the electorate."² The electorate has the right to veto all the unpopular Bills by defeating them at a referendum and it has been done so often. "The Swiss voter," remarks Bryce, "always independent, is most independent when he has to review the action of his legislature."³ There is, thus, no possibility in Switzerland of legislative tyranny, or tyranny of a parliamentary majority and this was fully demonstrated in 1884 in connection with the four laws, called at that time, "the four-humped camel" and characterised as "the high-handed behaviour of the ruling majority of the Assembly." All these laws were rejected at a referendum.

THE COUNCIL OF STATES

Composition and Organization. The Council of States represents the component units of the Confederation on the basis of equality and corresponds to the American Senate. Every Canton, no matter what its size or population, is entitled to two representatives, and every half-

1. Article 71.

2. Rappard, W.E., The Government of Switzerland, op. cit., p. 56.

3. Bryce, Modern Democracies, Vol. I, p. 436.

Canton one representative.⁴ The total membership of Council of States is, thus, 44.

Each Canton determines by its own laws the mode of election of the deputies, the length of their terms of office, and the allowances paid to them. In certain Cantons the deputies are elected directly while in some others they are elected directly. In the Landsgemeinde Cantons they are elected by the Landsgemeinde. There is, accordingly, no uniform method of election, or a similar tenure of office, or an equal fixed salary. The terms of office vary all the way from one to four years, three years being the most common. In St. Gallen it is one year. In two Cantons the deputies may be recalled by the legislature before the expiration of their term.

The only restrictions on elections to the Council of States are contained in Articles 6, 81, and 108 of the Constitution. According to Article 6 all Cantonal elections must be democratic. Article 81 provides that members of the National Council must not at the same time be members of the National Council or the Federal Council. Article 108 makes membership in the Council of States incompatible with membership on the Federal Tribunal.

The membership of the Council of States is usually quite stable as most deputies are re-elected for as long as they wish to serve. The calibre of the Deputies is pretty high and they command sufficient experience in national and Cantonal public affairs. Only those who have proved their worth in Cantonal affairs and quite often they are drawn from the Cantonal Executive Councils or their Legislatures.

The Council of States must meet once a year in ordinary session on a day fixed by standing orders. Provision is made in the Constitution for the calling of special session either by the Federal Council, or on the request of one-quarter of the Deputies, or of five Cantons.⁵ The Council elects its own Chairman and Vice-Chairman for each ordinary and extraordinary session. But the Constitution provides that the Chairman or Vice-Chairman may not be chosen from the Deputies of the same Canton whose representative was Chairman during the ordinary session immediately preceding.⁶ The effect of this constitutional provision is that the office circulates among Cantons.⁷ The Chairman presides over the meetings and is largely responsible for the determination of the daily order of business to be transacted. He votes only in case of a tie, but in elections he votes in the same manner as other members.

The attendance of an absolute majority of the total number of the Deputies (44) is necessary for the valid transaction of business,⁸ that is 23 members, and all questions are decided by an absolute majority of

4. Article 80.

5. Article 86.

6. Article 82.

7. The position of the half-Cantons is not clear.

8. Article 87. It means that 23 out of 44 Deputies must be present. It is the duty of the Chairman of the Council to ensure this, if necessary by roll-call.

those voting.⁹ The Deputies vote without instructions from their Cantons,¹⁰ and this constitutional provision implies that the members of the Council of States do not represent separate Cantonal interests and they cannot be armed with definite instructions as to how they should vote on particular issues. "The programme which the Article implies," observes Christopher Hughes, "is that members should vote from their consciences and not from instructions"¹¹ of either the Cantonal legislatures or of their parties or other associations.

The Council of States a weaker Chamber. The Council of States possess equal rights and powers with the National Council. All legislative measures may be introduced in either of the two Houses and must be approved by both the Houses to become laws. In case of disagreement, and when second deliberation too has yielded no results, the differences are submitted to a Joint Conference Committee. If the conference committee fails in its efforts to reach an agreement, the Bill in question is dropped. Neither of the two Chambers enjoys priority even in regard to financial matters. The framers of the Constitution had really attempted to make the Council of States a close second to the American Senate, and occupy the same position of precedence in the framework of the national government. But the Council has failed, for several reasons, to fulfil the expectations of its makers. Its history has, in fact, been almost the reverse of the American Senate. The latter was in the beginning inferior, both in influence and public esteem, to the House of Representatives. It was only in the second generation of statesmen that the Senate assumed its present dominating role. The Swiss Council of States, on the other hand, began its career with high hopes and great reputation. But gradually it receded into the background and men of energy and ambition began preferring to sit in the National Council. The Swiss Council of States, unlike the Senate, is given no special functions and the tenure of office of Deputies being not uniform and in some cases even subject to recall, it provided little attraction for promising youngmen who looked on it as only a stepping stone to the other Chamber. Nor does it provide an element of continuity from which traditions might flow. When both the Chambers possess equal powers and identical functions, the one which represents the people and is elected for a fixed period is sure to attract statesmen of reputation and add to its prestige and stature. It becomes the pivot of political authority and the centre of weighted power. It is not surprising, therefore, if the Council of States enjoys less authority and influence than the National Council.

But it does not mean that the Council of States commands a distinctly subordinate position like other Upper Chambers in countries having parliamentary type of government. It enjoys equal powers, constitutional, legislative and financial, with the other Chamber. Laws may originate in either of the two and must pass through both the Councils "and therefore the Councils must agree between themselves which shall have 'priority' in any particular business." Annual business, such as the budget goes one year to one Council first, the next year to the other Council first. The Council of States is not a submissive body. It often disagrees with measures passed by the National Council and not only insists on the disagreement, of course a rare event in the Swiss political life, but it also persists which means dropping of the Bill. The National Council has no veto over its powers, legislative and financial.

9. Article 88. An absolute majority in Switzerland means 'more than half', i.e., of those voting, of those present, of the whole Council, etc. Hughes C., The Federal Constitution of Switzerland, op. cit., p. 99.

10. Article 91.

11. The Federal Constitution of Switzerland, op. cit., p. 104.

The Council of States has, thus, preserved its distinct entity. Its deliberations are, as might be expected from its smaller size, more dispassionate and more detailed than those of the National Council. In particular, the members of the official committees appointed by the Council of States take a pride in the thoroughness of their reports. Talent also flows in the Council of States. Most of them are highly educated. Almost half of the membership of the Council in 1960 had been recipients of doctorates. Moreover, of late years there has been a tendency to make the terms of office of the members of the Council of States uniform, four years as that in the case of the National Council. Yet, the National Council is ultimately the more powerful. The obvious reason, and an important one, for the weakness of the Council of States is that the House gets through its business, because of its small membership—44 only—, more rapidly than the National Council. The result is that "often having nothing to do, it has acquired an undeserved reputation for idleness."

THE NATIONAL COUNCIL

Composition and Organisation. The important and influential Chamber, then, is the National Council, a representative House of the Swiss people. The composition and organization of the National Council, unlike the Council of States, are regulated entirely by the Federal Constitution.¹² Since 1963, it has a fixed membership of 200. The Deputies are elected directly by secret ballot and since 1910 by proportional representation.¹³ Every Swiss male citizen who has completed his twentieth year, and who has not otherwise been disqualified for active citizenship by the legislation of the Canton where he has his place of residence, has the right to vote.¹⁴ Each Canton or half-Canton, as the case may be, forms an electoral constituency and seats are allotted to it at the ratio of one for every 24,000 of the total population; fractions greater than 12,000 are counted as 24,000.¹⁵ But each Canton, or half-Canton, whatever its population, must at least have one Deputy.¹⁶

The National Council is elected for four years. It is not subject to dissolution, except for total revision of the Constitution when one

12. Article 73.

13. Before 1919 elections were by a single member constituencies with a second election if an absolute majority was not obtained at the first.

14. Article 74. Manhood suffrage was introduced in Switzerland as early as 1848. Women are excluded from voting but their disqualification appears nowhere in the Constitution.

15. Article 72. The law has been changed twice to keep pace with the growing population.

16. Ibid.

House differs from the other.¹⁷ Qualifications for membership are the same as required for voting. But all clergy, executive and principal administrative servants of the Confederation, members of the Council of States, and the Federal Councillors are especially excluded and are not eligible for election.

The House elects its own Chairman and Vice-Chairman for each ordinary or extraordinary session, neither being eligible for the same office in the next consecutive regular session. The word "session" is interpreted as meaning the annual session provided for in Article 86. The Chairman of the National Council is, thus, elected for one year. And the system of compulsory rotation of office, consistent with the Swiss tradition, is designed to guard against concentration of power in one man. It is also intended that the office should not be concentrated in any one party or Canton or linguistic group. The Chairman does not have extensive powers. He has a casting vote which he exercises in case of a tie according to the established usages of the House. But when the House assembles for purposes of election, the Chairman votes in the same way as other members.

Sessions and Debates. The National Council meets in regular sessions at the beginning of December and has generally four sittings.¹⁸ The sessions are very short lasting only about three weeks apiece. The Federal Council may summon an extraordinary session should an emergency arise.¹⁹ The House meets at 8 a.m. in summer and at 9 a.m. in winter, every day except Saturday and Sunday. Attendance is regular and punctual and a member absenting himself without strong reasons is deemed neglectful of his duty. The House devotes itself strictly to the dispatch of business and the normal Swiss Deputy shows just the qualities that are associated with the Swiss character. A Swiss Deputy is "solid, shrewd, unemotional or at any rate indisposed to reveal his emotions. He takes a practical commonsense and what may be called middle-class view of questions." The Swiss Federal Assembly is, therefore, the most business-like body in the world doing its work quietly. The debates are orderly and there are few set speeches. Rhetoric is almost unknown and the usual cheers and cries of approval or dissent are rarely heard. Obstruction is unknown and divisions are much less frequent. "The sessions of the National Council," writes Andre, "are more like meetings of an administrative body affecting only indirectly

17. Article 74.

18. Article 86 provides that the Assembly is to meet at least once a year for an ordinary session. The practice is to count all the sittings of the Assembly in one year as a single session adjourned. The date of assembling for the ordinary session is fixed by law. The Law on the Relations between the Councils of 9th October, 1908 fixes the 1st Monday in December as the start of the first part of the ordinary session and the first Monday in June as the start of the second part. The Councils also regularly hold ordinary sittings in March and September.

19. Article 86 provides that both the Councils shall be convened for an extraordinary session by decision of the Federal Council or on request from one quarter of the members of the National Council or from five Cantons. Once only in 1891 both the Chambers were convened on demand of a quarter of the members of the National Council.

those who are not immediately concerned—but what an efficient administration!" Deputies may speak in any of the four national languages and every public document is published in German, French and Italian. There are no official stenographers and the debates are scantily reported even in the leading newspapers. Occasionally, the Council may order the verbatim reporting and publication of important discussions.

The Constitution provides that both the Councils conduct business only when an absolute majority of their respective members is present, that is, 101 in the case of the National Council. All decisions are made by a majority of those voting with the exception of the approval of "urgent" arretes which, being exempt from the legislative referendum, require the approval of a majority of all the members. Swiss Deputies do not receive a salary for service in the Federal Assembly. The members of the National Council receive an allowance for each day the House is in session. Deputies are exempted from military service during their tenure in office and need not pay the military exemption tax.

No Official Opposition. The role of political parties in the Swiss legislature is far inferior to that prevailing in Britain and other democratic countries. This is due to two reasons: Firstly, the National Council cannot displace the Federal Councillors. Secondly, even in the legislative sphere, the supremacy of the Assembly is qualified by the ultimate sovereign power of the people and they can at a referendum negative the decisions of the Assembly. There is neither any Treasury Bench nor one for Opposition, since neither exists. The Federal Councillors are not members of the legislature, though they can appear in any House of the Assembly. But it does not entitle them to vote. When business relating to a particular department is considered by either of the Councils, the Federal Councillor who heads the department concerned attends, answers questions, gives explanations and joins in its debates. All this, however, does not give to the Councillor the position and influence of a minister under the parliamentary government. The Councillors are assigned seats on a dias right and left of the Chairman of the House. And as they are not members of the House, they cannot be leaders of parliamentary majority party, no matter what personal influence they otherwise may wield. When there is no ministerial party there can be no Opposition. The Swiss people do not exhibit hostility. Nor do they make regular campaigns of it. They view legislation by its practical utility, no matter whether their own party or others sponsor it. The proof of such an attitude can best be illustrated from the fact that Deputies belonging to the same party do not necessarily sit together. They usually sit by Cantons irrespective of their party labels.

Joint Sitzings. Both the Councils sit separately to transact their ordinary business, but they meet in a joint session for three definite purposes:—

(1) to elect the Federal Council, the Federal Tribunal, the Federal Insurance Tribunal, the President of the Federal Council as also the Vice-President who are both President and Vice-President of the Confederation, the President and Vice-President of the Federal Tribunal and of the Federal Insurance Tribunal, the Chancellor of the Confederation, and the Commander-in-Chief of the Army;²⁰

(2) to exercise the federal power of pardon;²¹ and

(3) to resolve conflicts of jurisdiction between the major federal organs.

When the two Chambers sit together, the Chairman of the National Council presides, decisions are reached by a majority of all the Deputies voting together.²²

LEGISLATIVE PROCEDURE

The Constitution gives the right to introduce legislation to both the Houses of the Federal Assembly—the Council of States and the National Council, to each member of both the Houses, to each Canton and half-Canton, and the Federal Council. In practice, it is the Federal Council which initiates as well as introduces major portion of the legislation. When the Council feels that some new legislation is necessary or the prevailing laws need amendments, for the efficient and proper functioning of the government, or when it feels that there is a popular demand for a new law, it proceeds on its own initiative to draft a Bill with the help of its expert staff. The draft-laws, together with the Council's report detailing its own views on the proposed legislation, are submitted to the two Houses of the Assembly for their consideration.

If the Federal Assembly itself decides upon the need of some legislation, it requests the Federal Council to act through procedures known as the "motion" and the "postulate." A motion is a command of the Assembly to the Council to act and such a command must be the result of the agreement of both the Houses. "The postulate is of lesser gravity, but leads towards the same objective." Instead of "commanding" the Council to submit a draft law; a postulate merely "invites" the Federal Council to act. It may originate in any of the two Houses and does not require the agreement of both. Immediately on receipt of the "motion" or "postulate" the Federal Council proceeds to draft the Bill on the lines proposed and presents the same with its report to the Assembly. The Council may also recommend in its report rejection of the purposed legislation. The Council usually gives utmost consideration to motions and postulates, but it does not mean that it must necessarily comply with. "Motions are deemed to lapse when the signatories cease to be members of the Council, or if the motion is not discussed at all within two years, or is not answered by the Federal Council within four years."²³ Postulates have even shorter life span if not taken up by the Federal Council.²⁴

Since both Houses of the Assembly have co-equal powers and neither

20. Article 85, Section 4.

21. The difference between pardon and amnesty is that (1) the former is an individual one whereas amnesty is a mass measure, and (2) the amnesty is in advance of sentence whereas pardon is subsequent to punishment. Hughes, C., The Federal Government of Switzerland, p. 95.

22. Article 92.

23. Hughes, G., The Federal Government of Switzerland, p. 149.

24. Ibid., p. 156.

is superior to the other, the Federal Council submits its Bills and messages to the Chairmen of the Council of States and the National Council at their first session. The Chairmen decide among themselves which House will be the first to deal with each piece of business. Unless the Federal Council has designated a Bill as "urgent," the division of business must be sanctioned by each House. In case of "urgent" Bills, the decision of the two Chairmen is binding. The Bills are ordinarily sent to the appropriate committees immediately after the allotment of the business. The committees may hold their meetings in any part of the country and generally they carry their work in the interval between the sessions of the Assembly. The committees receive the secretarial assistance of the Federal Chancellory and may summon any official of the Federal Government for evidence, explanation and classification. The committees seldom change the sense of the draft-laws, but they often do make suggestions for amending the proposed laws. Minority reports frequently accompany the majority reports.

There are three stages in the discussion of a Bill in each House. After receiving the report of the Committee, the House to which it is allotted first debates "entering upon the matter." If it is agreed upon, then, the House proceeds to discuss the Bill clause by clause. After it has been fully discussed, the Bill is voted upon as a whole. If it is approved, the Bill is then sent to the other House wherein the same procedure is followed. "In exceptional cases, and in the event the draft Bill is capable of being broken up logically, each House simultaneously may take different Sections of the same Bill for debate. As soon as each Section is approved by one House, it is sent immediately to the other for consideration."²⁵

When the Bill has been passed by both the Houses, the Federal Chancellory prepares the official text which is signed by the Chairmen and Secretaries of both the Houses. The text is then submitted to the Federal Council for publication and execution. It comes into effect, unless challenged by referendum, on the date fixed in the original Bill, or if no date is mentioned within five days after publication.

Deadlock between the Councils. The possibilities of a serious deadlock between the Council of States and National Council are rare indeed. But it does happen; the Law on the Relations between Councils, 1902, as amended in 1939, sets forth the procedure to be followed. If the second House disagrees with the decision of the first, the Bill is sent to the former for another deliberation. Only the points of difference are discussed, unless the changes are of such a nature as to necessitate a debate on the Bill as a whole. This procedure continues until agreement is reached, or "until the two bodies agree to disagree." In that event, the points of difference are submitted to a Joint Conference Committee presided over by a member of the House which had originally rejected the Bill or expressed disagreement thereupon. If the Joint Conference Committee fail to reach an acceptable alternative, or if their proposals are refused, the Bill in question is dropped.

25. Coddington, G.A., The Federal Government of Switzerland, p. 83.

POWERS OF THE FEDERAL ASSEMBLY

There are few constitutional limitations on the powers of the Federal Assembly within its own sphere of jurisdiction. Article 84 distinctly specifies that the National Council and the Council of States "shall handle all business which the present Constitution places within the competence of the Confederation, and which is not allotted to another Federal authority." The framers of the Constitution did not deem it necessary to impose specific limitations on the powers of the Assembly, as the power of the people can be invoked at a referendum to overrule the Assembly. Moreover, in a small country, like Switzerland, where the strength of the legislative bodies is small and the politicians are judged by the traditionally strict standard of honesty, the need for constitutional limitations does not arise as "public opinion would at once check any attempt by the Councils to extend their powers beyond the limits the Constitution prescribes."

Another peculiarity of the Swiss legislature is that both the Chambers are co-ordinate in all respects of their powers and functions. Legislative measures can be initiated in either Chamber and neither possesses the power to veto the other. The Federal Councillors, though members of neither Chamber, are required to appear and answer questions put to them equally in both. For certain purposes, like the selection of the Federal Councillors, its President and Vice-President, for decisions on conflict of jurisdiction between the Federal authorities, and for the granting of pardon, the two Chambers sit together and vote as one Chamber. Besides, the Constitution can be amended, subject to certain other provisions, by the equal participation and agreement of the National Council and the Council of States. Finally, the makers of the Swiss Constitution did not pay much attention to the orthodox doctrine of the Separation of Powers. They vested the Assembly with all kinds of authority, legislative, executive and judicial. In Switzerland, there is a government by Assembly.

Legislative Powers. Federal Assembly is competent to enact all laws and decrees dealing with matters which the Constitution assigns to federal authorities, and make laws dealing with the organization and mode of the election of the federal authorities. It determines and enacts necessary measures to ensure the due observance of the Federal Constitution; the guarantees of Cantonal Constitutions; the fulfilment of Federal obligations; adopts measures ensuring the external safety of the country, her independence and neutrality; authorises measures to guarantee the territorial integrity of the Cantons and their Constitutions; the internal safety of Switzerland, and the maintenance of peace and good order; enacts the annual budget of the Confederation, approves State accounts and decrees authorising loans. Finally, the Assembly can demand all kinds of information, which it deems necessary, on the administration of the Confederation and directs questions to the Federal Councillors. The Federal Council presents an annual report to the Assembly upon the internal conditions and foreign relations of the Confederation. It may also be required to make special report whenever either House of the Assembly demands.

The Swiss Constitution provides that all laws passed and resolutions adopted by the Assembly must be submitted to the people for their acceptance or rejection, if a demand to that effect is made within 90 days by 30,000 Swiss citizens or eight Cantons, provided it has not been declared urgent by the Assembly. If a referendum is held and a majority of the people vote against the law, it becomes void. Before 1939, Federal decrees which were not general in character and which were declared urgent could not be submitted to referendum. The amendment of January 22, 1939 restricted the application of the urgency clause to only such decrees as were passed by a majority of all members of each of the two Chambers and had their duration definitely fixed.²⁶ Article 89 was amended again in 1949 and the present position is that 30,000 voters or 8 Cantons may demand referendum on a federal decree, whether declared urgent or not. Such a decree will become inoperative one year after its adoption by the Assembly, if it is not approved by the people within this period. Such a decree cannot be re-enacted.

The Federal Assembly is the judge and determines what laws or resolutions are urgent. Dr. Zellweger accuses the Assembly of not using this discretion impartially in order to prevent popular action upon its measures. Two points may, however, be noted in this connection. First, the referendum for ordinary laws in the Confederation is optional or facultative. Second, there does not exist popular initiative on legislative measures in the Confederation.

Executive Powers. The Council of States and the National Council, at their joint sitting, elect the seven members of the Federal Council, its President and Vice-President, appoint judges of the Federal Tribunal, the members of the Federal Insurance Court and the Commander-in-Chief. The right of election or confirmation in respect of other offices may be vested in the Assembly by federal legislation. Assembly supervises the activities of the civil service, and even decides administrative disputes and conflicts of jurisdiction between federal officials. It determines salaries and allowances of members of federal departments and of the federal chancellory, as also the establishment of permanent federal offices and the salaries in connection therewith.

The control of the federal army, too, is vested in the Assembly. It declares war and concludes peace, ratifies alliances and treaties. All treaties concluded by the Cantons between themselves or with foreign States must be confirmed by the Federal Assembly, provided that such Cantonal treaties are submitted to it only on appeal either by the Federal Council or another Canton. If the Cantons fail to execute federal laws or obligations, the Federal Assembly decides on the nature of intervention against the recalcitrant Canton or Cantons.

The Constitutional Amendment of January 30, 1931 provides that international treaties concluded for a period of indeterminate duration or for more than fifteen years should also be submitted to the people for acceptance or rejection on demand of 30,000 Swiss citizens entitled to vote or of eight Cantons. The entry of Switzerland into the League of Nations was, accordingly, decided by referendum on May 16, 1920.

Judicial Functions. The Federal Assembly grants pardon in joint session whereas amnesty is granted by two Chambers separately. It also hears appeals against the decisions of the Federal Council relating to administrative disputes.

26. Article 89, Section 3.

Constitution amending power. The method and procedure of amending the Constitution has already been discussed.²⁷ When both the Chambers agree to revise the Constitution, either wholly or partially, the proposed revision is submitted to the people for their acceptance or rejection. In case one of the Chambers does not agree to the proposed revision, the matter is then referred to the people for their decision whether they need such a revision or not. If the majority of people vote for revision, new elections of the Federal Assembly are held to effect the revision. After having passed through the Assembly, it is submitted at the referendum of the people and the Cantons.

The Swiss Constitution also provides for constitutional initiative and here, too, the Assembly plays its due part, though the final arbiters are the people.

THE DECLINE OF LEGISLATIVE SUPREMACY

The Constitution vests the supreme authority of the Confederation in the Federal Assembly subject to the rights of the people and of the Cantons. It is both a legislative and Constituent Assembly and its laws can neither be vetoed by the President of the Confederation nor can these be declared unconstitutional by any Swiss Court. Its supremacy is further established by the fact that other organs of the Federal Government are subordinate to its authority. The performance of the Assembly is also impressive and the Swiss people, throughout its career, have not shown any real discontent over its working. "It provides a national forum for the expression of differing points of view, it works quietly and without undue haste, and its cost is not excessive." Much contrary to the expectations of the Constitution-makers, the history of bicameralism is eminently admirable. The two Houses have shown more harmony and the friction has been rare. "In fact, seldom does one House seriously attempt to overthrow the decisions of the other on matters of national importance." And both have attracted highly talented statesmen and election to either of the two Houses is deemed a great honour.

It cannot, however, be denied that there has been a steady decline in the prestige of the Federal Assembly as a body. This is due to important reasons. In the first place, the process of direct legislation has considerably contributed towards the decline of its legislative supremacy. When the Deputies know that ultimately authority vests in the people to accept or reject the laws they make, they take very little interest in the performance of their legislative duties. There is neither initiative nor the ambition to venture it. If the measure passed by the Assembly succeeds at a referendum, the credit for it goes to the people and not to the legislature. If it does not succeed, the blame goes to the legislature. Such a feeling of frustration reduces the sense of responsibility and the legislature, as Bryce says, may be disposed to pass "measures its judgment disapproves, counting on the people to reject them, or may fear to pass laws it thinks needed lest it should receive a buffet from the popular vote." The history of popular voting discloses a marked tendency to reject measures that are in any way radical. The Swiss have also rejected all those laws that are too comprehensive, or complicated, or mean to effect too much at once. They know that they have the right of constitutional initiative and if need be, they have the means to see the Constitution amended. This tendency also creates amongst the legislators a condition of doubt or indecision, if not a feeling of helplessness.

27. Chapter II.

The result is that the Assembly has tried to shift its responsibility and the lead is taken by the Federal Council. The Federal Council has now become the director of legislative process. It not only introduces legislation but initiates it too. The Council derives its authority from Article 102, Section 4 of the Constitution which reads, "It (Federal Council) shall submit to the Federal Assembly drafts of laws and decrees and shall give its opinion on proposals submitted to it by the Councils or the Cantons." The bulk of the legislation, therefore, originates from the Federal Council. Whenever the Federal Assembly makes a request to the Federal Council to initiate legislation on the specified subject, it drafts the Bill with the help of the expert staff at its disposal, and forwards it on to the Assembly along "with a well-reasoned report presenting the purport of the proposed legislation and giving the reasons why it should or should not be enacted. Even in the cases where the Assembly has requested the Federal Council to draft a piece of legislation, it usually does not enact the draft law when the Council's report is unfavourable."²⁸

The members of the Federal Council also pilot the Bills in the Assembly through all the stages of the legislative process. The Councillor, who is assigned the Bill, gives his advice and comments in the Committee and his role is significant there. "It is not necessary," remarks Prof. Rappard, "to have attended many such meetings to understand why the principal actors are rarely the legislative members."²⁹ On the floor of the House of the Assembly which gets the priority to discuss it, the Councillor again explains, elaborates, elucidates and defends or opposes, if necessary, the Bill. The Assembly has, as Codding remarks, "been reduced, to a certain extent, to the position of an advisory body with the electorate exercising the real decision-making power." If a system of legislative initiative should also be adopted, as is being suggested, he further remarks, "there is little doubt that the prestige of the legislature would be even further lowered."³⁰

28. Codding, G.A., The Federal Government of Switzerland, p. 92.

29. Rappard, W.E., The Government of Switzerland, p. 83.

30. Codding, G.A., The Federal Government of Switzerland, p. 85.

CHAPTER VI

THE FRAME OF NATIONAL GOVERNMENT (Contd.)

THE FEDERAL JUDICIARY

The Federal Tribunal. The creation of a Federal Tribunal was the chief institutional innovation of 1874. The Constitution of 1848, no doubt, provided for a court "for the administration of justice in the Federal sphere," but it had no jurisdiction over conflicts of law between the Confederation and the Cantons or between the Cantons themselves. Such cases were heard and decided by the Federal Council and the Federal Assembly. Even cases relating to the rights of the citizens could not be heard by the Federal Court unless they were referred to it by the Federal Council or the Federal Assembly. The Constitution of 1874 does not make any radical change with regard to its powers and jurisdiction, but in practice its authority has considerably expanded. Article 106 merely says, "There shall be Federal Tribunal for the administration of justice in so far as this is within the Federal competence." The Tribunal, as at present constituted, first assembled in 1875 and "since then its jurisdiction has been enlarged several times, chiefly at the expense of the Federal Council."¹

Composition and Organisation of the Federal Tribunal. The Constitution provides that a "law shall provide for the method of organisation of the Federal Tribunal and the sections thereof, the number of its members and Deputy members, their terms of office and pay."² The Judges and Deputy Judges are elected at a joint session of the Federal Assembly.³ The Constitution does not prescribe any qualifications for the judges. It only says that any Swiss citizen eligible to the National Council may be appointed to the Federal Tribunal.⁴ But members of the Federal Assembly⁵ and of the Federal Council, and the officials elected by these authorities, may not, at the same time, be members of the Federal Tribunal. The only condition which the Constitution imposes is that the Federal Assembly, while appointing judges and Deputy judges, shall see that the three official languages of the Confederation are represented upon it.⁶ Due care, however, is taken to select men of legal learning

1. Hughes, C., The Federal Constitution of Switzerland, p. 119.

2. Article 107, Section 2.

3. Article 92.

4. Article 108.

5. Before 1874 membership of the Federal Tribunal was not incompatible with that of the Federal Assembly nor with following another employment, and in fact was normally combined with one or both of these.

6. Article 107, Section 1.

and ability, and "while political predilections may sometimes be present, it is not alleged that they have not injured the quality of the bench, any more than the occasional action of like influences tells on the general confidence felt in England and (as respects the Federal Courts) in the United States in the highest courts of those countries."

The Law on Judicial Organisation of 1943, determines the organization of the Federal Tribunal. It fixes the number of judges between 26 and 28; which is actually 26. There are also 11 to 13 alternates or deputy judges; the actual number is 12. The term for which the judges of the Tribunal are elected is six years. But, as in the case of Federal Councillors, the judges may be, and often they are, re-elected. This practice of re-election has resulted practically into a life-tenure, thus, removing the danger to the independence of the judiciary which "might otherwise inhere in the brevity of the judge's legal term and in the influences which affect their original election." In practice, judges resign in the year in which they become seventy. The Tribunal has its own President and Vice-President elected for two years. They are not, however, immediately re-eligible.

The judges are paid 53,000 Swiss francs a year with a pension. The President receives an extra allowance of 3,600 and the Vice-President 2,400 francs. The deputy judges have an allowance for each day they are required to serve.

The Federal Tribunal is the only national Court. There are no inferior Federal Courts except the assizes in which the country is divided for criminal cases. The reason is that the bulk of judicial work continues to be discharged by the Cantonal Courts. Nor has the Tribunal, as in the United States, a staff of its own all over the country for the execution of its decisions. Execution of judgments in Switzerland is the function of the Federal Council with an authority to act through Cantonal officials. Such a distinct organization gives to the Swiss Federal Tribunal a peculiar position among the federal judicial systems.

Its Jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of the Federal Tribunal extends over civil and criminal cases and questions of public law. As said earlier, the Tribunal has no power of interpreting the Constitution and declaring a federal law invalid. In other words, the Federal Tribunal cannot question the validity of laws passed by the Federal Assembly. It can, however, inquire into the constitutionality of Cantonal laws and actions of Cantonal executives and sometimes federal executives. But Prof. Hans Huber, at one time a Judge of the Federal Tribunal, is of the opinion that the Court will make an effort to interpret federal laws whose meaning is not clear in such a manner as to honour the intent of the Constitution.⁷

(i) Civil Jurisdiction. By the terms of the Constitution⁸ the civil jurisdiction of the Federal Tribunal covers all suits between the Confederation and the Cantons and between the Cantons themselves. Suits brought by an individual or a corporation on one side and the Confederation on the other, provided that the former are the plaintiffs and the amount involved in the dispute is 8,000 francs or more, also lie with the Tribunal. Similarly, it decides cases between a Canton on one side and a corporation or private persons on the other, at the instance of one or other of the parties and when the amount of the suit exceeds 8,000 francs. The Tribunal also decides cases between individuals where the amount in litigation exceeds 10,000 francs and when the two parties request to take jurisdiction. The Federal Tribunal further decides cases concerning loss of nationality and disputes upon citizenship between communes of different Cantons.

7. See W.C. Rice's Law Among States in Federacy, p. 117.

8. Article 110.

The civil jurisdiction of the Tribunal expressly conferred by the Constitution has further been much extended by virtue of the provision of Article 114 which authorises the Confederation to place "other matters" within the competence of the court. The same Article further confers on the Tribunal powers to ensure the uniform application of laws relating to commerce and transactions affecting movable property (law of obligation including commercial law and the law of exchange), suits for debt and bankruptcy, protection of copyrights, and industrial inventions. Finally, the Assembly has made the Federal Tribunal virtually a general Court of appeal from the Cantonal courts in all cases arising under federal laws,⁹ where the amount in dispute exceeds 8,000 francs.

(ii) Criminal Jurisdiction. On the criminal side, the Tribunal has original and exclusive jurisdiction in:

- (a) Cases of high treason against the Confederation and revolt and violence against the federal authorities;
- (b) Crimes and offences against the Law of Nations;
- (c) Political crimes and misdemeanours which are either the cause or consequence of disorders and disturbances necessitating armed federal intervention;
- (d) Offences committed by officials appointed by a Federal authority when brought before the Tribunal by that authority.

The Tribunal also has original jurisdiction over other serious crimes such as counterfeiting and voting frauds. Cases of original jurisdiction, however, make up a very small proportion of the work load of the Federal Tribunal.

Article 64(1) empowers the Confederation to legislate in regard to criminal law. In criminal cases, as stated before, the Tribunal holds assizes from time to time at fixed centres in which the country is divided for this purpose. In these assizes a section of the Tribunal sits with a jury chosen by lot from the neighbouring villages. Concurrence of five-sixths of the jury is necessary to convict an accused person.

The Tribunal sits in four Chambers for exercising its criminal jurisdiction: The Federal Criminal Court; the Court of Accusation—this prepares business for the Federal Criminal Court and decides if there is a prima facie case, and decides as to the place of criminal jurisdiction, i.e., in which Canton. Then, there is the Court of Cassation, and finally is the extraordinary Court of Cassation of seven judges.

9. Article 111.

(iii) Constitutional Jurisdiction. The Federal Tribunal has a limited constitutional jurisdiction. It takes cognisance of:

- (a) Conflict of competence between Federal authorities on one side and Cantonal authorities on the other side;
- (b) Disputes in public law between Cantons; and
- (c) Appeals against violation of constitutional rights of citizens and appeals of private persons against violation of international agreements or treaties.

The provision relating to the constitutional rights of citizens has been constructed by statute to include rights guaranteed by Cantonal as well as by Federal Constitutions. In all such cases of conflict of competence it is the duty of the Federal Tribunal to uphold the Federal Constitution against the Cantonal, and the Cantonal Constitution against ordinary laws and decrees of the Cantons. The Federal Tribunal can invalidate Cantonal laws and it can inquire into the constitutionality of actions of Cantonal executive officials. In practice, there are a great number of such appeals brought before the Federal Tribunal each year, and the great majority of such appeals concern the guarantees of equality before the law as provided for in Article 4 of the Constitution.

(iv) Administrative Jurisdiction. Finally, it has a limited administrative jurisdiction too. It decides disputes relating to the legal competence of public officials, hears many classes of railway suits and administrative disputes in matters of taxation. The Federal Tribunal also shares certain restricted areas of judicial power with the Federal Insurance Tribunal and the military authorities.

Comparison with the Federal Judiciary of United States. The nature of the Swiss Federal Judiciary was discussed in Chapter II, and it was pointed out that it differs materially from the Federal Judiciary in the United States. The Swiss Federal Tribunal, though a national court, stands alone. It has not, like the American Supreme Court, subordinate courts spread over the whole country. Nor has it its separate officials to execute its judgments. The Tribunal relies upon the Federal Council, acting through the Cantonal governments, for the enforcement of its decisions. But the real difference is between the powers of the two. The Federal Tribunal is bound by an express provision of the Constitution to apply every law passed by the Federal Assembly. Article 113 provides, "in all the above cases the Federal Tribunal shall apply the Laws passed by the Federal Assembly and the universally binding decrees passed by the Federal Assembly, and the treaties which it has ratified." The Swiss Tribunal has, accordingly, no power to ascertain the constitutionality of Federal statutes and such decrees of the Federal Assembly as are of general application. The Constitution has reserved for the Federal Assembly the right to interpret the Constitution and all laws passed thereunder. The Assembly can put its own construction on every law which it has passed without the interference of any judicial authority to correct it. This is, of course, unpalatable to American lawyers who hold that the powers of a legislature cannot go beyond those which the Constitution has conferred upon it. There cannot be security, the voice of America further contends, for the due observance of the Constitution, if its interpretation is left to be determined by the legislature which might have infringed its provisions. It would be tantamount to make the violating body the judge in its own case.

The Continental theory, on the other hand, subordinates the judiciary to the executive and the legislature. Some of the eminent Swiss Jurists, no doubt, regard the American system as more rational, still Switzerland has clung to the Continental tradition and there is no apparent likelihood of a change. Even if it may be conceded that the power of judicial review inheres in the Federal Tribunal, it would hardly serve as an effective instrument since the sovereign people in Switzerland have the direct means of expressing their will at a referendum. A judicial decision declaring a law unconstitutional would interfere with their cherished constitutional right of accepting or defeating legislation passed by the Assembly. Finally, the Federal Tribunal, as it has already been pointed out, has less authority over the public officials than the Supreme Court of the United States. Many important matters are beyond the competence of the Tribunal. It may further be added that although conflicts of jurisdiction between the Federal authorities and Cantonal authorities are decided by the Federal Tribunal, but conflicts of jurisdiction between the Tribunal and the Federal Council are decided by the Assembly. The Federal Tribunal has, therefore, no power, like the Supreme Court, to decide upon the question of its own competence. The Federal Tribunal, in brief, since its establishment at Lausanne in 1875, has never enjoyed the prestige and independence of the American Supreme Court. "To endow it with the right of disavowing federal statutes would therefore be to impose on a much weaker court a much heavier burden than that under the American judiciary sometimes seems to be staggering today."¹⁰

THE FEDERAL ADMINISTRATIVE COURT

The Federal Administrative Court was provided for in 1914 by an Amendment of the Constitution.¹¹ It gave to the Administrative Court jurisdiction to hear administrative disputes and disciplinary cases within the federal sphere, and Cantonal administrative cases, provided the Cantons had invested the Court with such a jurisdiction. In 1925, the Federal Assembly by a resolution decided that the duties of this Court were to be exercised by the Federal Tribunal. The Administrative Court is, therefore, not a separate Court like the Swiss Insurance Tribunal or like the Administrative Courts in France and other Continental countries. It is a section of the Federal Tribunal and, accordingly, a part of the ordinary courts, except that the Administrative Courts use a different type of procedure from that used in the Federal Tribunal.

10. Rappard, W.E., The Government of Switzerland, op. cit., p. 91.

11. Article 114.

CHAPTER VII

THE REFERENDUM AND THE INITIATIVE

Direct Legislation. The institution of direct legislation is a distinctive feature of Swiss democracy. The method of popular legislation, i.e., law-making by the citizens themselves and not by their representatives, is as old as Swiss history and it finds its fullest expression in the Landsgemeinde, the mass meetings of all citizens. The Landsgemeinde is still kept alive with its ancient traditions and practices in the Cantons of Appenzell, Unterwalden and Glaris. In the remaining Cantons the referendum and the initiative represent an effort to extend the idea of direct democracy in order to uphold the cherished conviction of the Swiss people that they are sovereign and they can assert their right by taking a direct part in the determination of the affairs of the State. Such an attitude of mind of the people has profoundly modified Swiss mechanism of Government and influenced the world opinion in favour of these institutions.

"Nothing in Swiss arrangements," writes Bryce, "is more instructive to the student of democracy, for it opens a window into the soul of the multitude. Their thoughts and feelings are seen directly, not refracted through the medium of elected bodies."¹ Switzerland is really speaking a type of "mixed democracy,"² wherein "the legislative will of the people is expressed both through legislatures and through direct popular votes in the form of the referendum and the initiative."³

The Referendum. Literally the word referendum means "must be referred." As a concept of Political Science, it means the process by which the verdict of the people is sought on a proposed law, fundamental or ordinary, and on which the legislature has already expressed its opinion. If it is approved by the majority of the voters voting, the law stands adopted. If it is rejected, it is given up. Referendum is, thus, really a consultation of the people on a law passed by the Legislature before its final enactment.

The referendum may be of two kinds: optional or facultative, and compulsory or obligatory. When a law, after it has passed through the legislature, is submitted to the people for their acceptance or rejection on a petition from the specified number of citizens, it is known as the optional or facultative referendum. In the case of compulsory or obligatory referendum all measures of a specified type must necessarily be referred to the people for their acceptance or rejection before they can become laws. The obligatory form is obviously more democratic, for

1. Modern Democracies, Vol. I, p. 415.

2. Marx, M., Foreign Governments (2nd ed.), p. 390.

3. Ibid.

it requires expression of popular opinion on every law. The Swiss, too, consider it preferable on practical grounds, because it "avoids the agitation necessarily involved in the effort to collect signatures to the petition for a referendum." And laws so approved by the people have a great stabilising effect as they have the impress of popular will.

Forms of the Referendum. All amendments to the Federal and Cantonal Constitutions are subject to obligatory referendum and without such a process no constitutional change becomes final. The obligatory referendum for all changes in the Federal Constitution was introduced in 1848, and this provision has been continued in the Constitution of 1874. The prevailing Constitution also includes the provision that Cantonal Constitutions must be similarly adopted in order to be guaranteed by the Federal government.⁴

The procedure applied in the Confederation for constitutional referendum has already been discussed.⁵ To recapitulate it, proposed amendments for partial or total revision of the Constitution are usually passed first by the Federal Assembly in the same way as ordinary laws. Then, they are submitted at a referendum of the people and become valid only after having been approved by a majority of the popular votes cast in a referendum, and by a majority of the Cantons. The vote of each Canton or half-Canton is determined by its popular vote.

If one of the Councils of the Assembly does not agree to the proposed amendment or revision, the matter whether such an amendment is necessary or not, is referred to the people at a referendum. If the majority vote is in the affirmative, then, fresh elections of the Assembly are held. The newly elected Assembly undertakes the proposed revision and after duly passing it, it is submitted to the referendum of the people and Cantons for their acceptance or rejection.

The national legislative referendum is applicable to federal laws—except budgets and decrees—and since 1921 to international treaties concluded for an indeterminate period or for more than fifteen years. Every federal law after having been passed by the Assembly is published in the Federal Official Journal and sent to the Cantons to be circulated through the Communes. Within ninety days of its circulation either eight Cantons or 30,000 citizens may demand its submission to a referendum. Similarly, 30,000 citizens may demand international treaties concluded for an indefinite period or for more than fifteen years their submission to a referendum. Federal decrees which come into force immediately can also be demanded for approval at a referendum. All these are examples of the optional referendum.

The Cantons have never demanded referendum. The citizens do usually demand it. The opponents of the measures excite popular interest and secure the requisite number of signatures. The signatures are now often collected by sending reply-paid cards through the post to voters, who merely need to sign and drop the card into a letter box.⁶

4. Article 6.

5. Chapter II.

6. Hughes, C., The Federal Constitution of Switzerland, op. cit., p. 101.

When the number of signatures sent in has been recognised by the Federal Council to be sufficient, it publishes the law to be circulated among the people all over the country and fixes a day for voting, not before four weeks after the publication and distribution of the law. Meetings are held at which members of the Assembly and others advocate or oppose it. Articles on the main provisions of the law appear in the press. The arrangements for voting are made by the Cantonal authorities, but ballot papers are supplied by the Federal government. The voting is held on a Sunday and takes place on the same day over the whole country. The polling is usually quiet and orderly and complaints of bribery and impersonation are seldom heard.

All Cantons, except those retaining the Landsgemeinde, provide for the legislative referendum. In some it is obligatory, in others it is optional; where it is optional it depends upon a petition by a specified number of citizens, the number varying from Canton to Canton. In still other Cantons the referendum is obligatory for important financial laws only and optional for others.

Forms of the Initiative. The referendum has purely negative effect as it merely enables the people to reject measures passed by their representatives. The advocates of direct legislation, and more particularly the Swiss plead that the legislature ought not to have the exclusive right to originate legislation. It ought to be, it is asserted, an inherent right of the citizens to propose legislation and when ratified by the popular vote, it must become law no matter even if it has been disapproved by the legislature. Such a device of popular legislation is called initiative. By means of the initiative the voter can make his influence felt in those cases where the legislature may not want to adopt a constitutional amendment or a law.

The initiative is very often erroneously likened to a petition. But both essentially differ from one another. A petition is a mere popular submission made to the legislature suggesting the need for making a particular legislation. The legislature may or may not act upon it. But the initiative is the vindication of the sovereign power of the people as it takes effect without regard to the opinion of the legislature, and even against its wishes.

The initiative may also take two forms: formulative, and in general terms. When the demand is couched in general terms, it is the obligation of the legislature to draft, consider and pass the laws as desired by the required number of citizens, subject to the ratification of the people. If the proposal is formulated, in the form of a Bill complete in all respects, it is the duty of the legislature to consider the measure as it is and the vote has to be taken on that text.

The right of constitutional initiative exists both in the Confederation and in the Cantons. Under it a minimum of 50,000 voters may petition for an amendment to the Federal Constitution, either in the form of a request in general terms or formulated in the complete and final form of a Bill. If the Assembly approves a proposal submitted in general terms, it, then, proceeds immediately to draw up the amendment and submit it to the popular and Cantonal vote. If, however, the Assembly votes against it, the question is referred to the people whether or not the initiative proposal will be proceeded with. If it wins the majority of the popular vote, it becomes the duty of the Assembly, although it has already expressed its disapproval of the proposal, to put the amendment in form and submit it to the verdict of the people and Cantons. An unfavourable popular vote kills it.

If the initiative is formulated in specific terms, and if the Assembly accepts it, the proposal is at once submitted for popular and Cantonal action in the usual manner. If the Assembly does not agree to the formulated proposal, they may either advise the voters to reject the initiative or submit a counter-proposal along with the original one.

If the initiative contains a proposal for a complete revision of the Constitution, then the procedure is identical to the one explained previously,⁷ when one Chamber of the Federal Assembly proposes the revision and the other opposes it.

Since there is no federal legislative initiative, the constitutional initiative has been used to place all kinds of matters in the Federal Constitution, for instance, the prohibition against Kosher slaughtering. "The Constitutional initiative, on the other hand, has also been used for such politically significant purposes as the introduction of proportional representation and of the referendum on certain international treaties. Dr. Finer says, that the "constitutional initiative (in Switzerland) is wide enough to include ordinary legislation when proposed in a constitutional amendment and, thus, which is found in some States of United States also, is a defect rather than a merit—to put ordinary laws into the Constitution."⁸ There is, indeed, no recognised criterion for determining whether a proposed measure is a constitutional amendment or an ordinary law.

In the Cantons, however, there is legislative initiative. In all Cantons, except where laws are made in the Landsgemeinde, a prescribed number of citizens may either propose a new law or submit to the Cantonal Council the principle on which they desire a new law to be based. In the latter case, the Council refers the question to the vote of the people. If the people approve it, then, the Cantonal Council prepares the law and it is submitted to the people for their acceptance or rejection. If the proposal is formulated, it goes straight to the people. But the Cantonal Council may suggest counter-proposals and refer them to people for their decision along with the original popularly initiated proposal.

Working of the Referendum and the Initiative. The Swiss people are constantly being called upon to express their opinion either by referendum or by initiative. From 1848 to 1965, the Swiss went to the polls for more than a hundred times for revision of the Federal Constitution. There have been two proposals for total revision—in 1880 and 1935—and both were rejected. The partial revisions have been numerous, but comparatively few of these have altered the constitutive parts of the Constitution. The vast majority have extended the competence of the Central Government. Between 1874 and 1950, "620 Legislative Acts have been liable or subjected to referendum—the figure includes constitutional amendments subject to the compulsory referendum, and all Acts and treaties liable to the facultative referendum, including in both cases those accepted and rejected."⁹ Since then the number has still more increased.

7. Chapter II.

8. The Theory and Practice of Modern Government, p. 561.

Between 1891, when the popular initiative was first introduced, and 1960, some forty-five proposals originated with the people, twelve of them in the twelve years between 1935 and 1947. Seven of these popularly initiated proposals were finally adopted by the people.

In the Cantons the consultation of the people is more frequent. But its frequency is more in the German-speaking Cantons. In the German-speaking Cantons there is more jealousy and distrust of the Government and more confidence in the action of the people. Hence the referendum and the initiative are peculiarly German institutions. The French, on the other hand, are less democratic in the Swiss sense of the term. They are by nature more inclined to follow the lead of the Government and although they have adopted the referendum, it is most exclusively optional and for that, too, they have made little use of it.

Character of the Laws rejected. From the above survey of the working of direct legislation in Switzerland it will be clear that the Swiss are asked to pronounce their judgment on a variety of problems including the highly technical. From the list of the measures rejected, a few inferences may be made. First, the history of popular voting reveals a marked tendency to reject measures that are in any way radical. It implies that the Swiss people by themselves are really more conservative than their representatives. But the conservatism of the people does not manifest itself so much in the Confederation as in some of the Cantons. The people also reject those laws that are too comprehensive, or complicated, or mean to effect too much at once. This tendency has one good result, for it shows that the Swiss want to understand the laws they are required to enact. Finally, the Swiss have rejected measures which involve spending of money. This tendency, which seems to be universal, applies especially to proposals "for increasing the salaries of public officers, and in fact, the largest number of negative votes ever cast in a federal law were thrown against the Bill for pensioning officials." But whenever the government has appealed to the spirit of patriotic sacrifice, when the interest of national security seemed to justify such appeals, as it happened during the two World Wars, and in the period of economic depression, the people had readily responded to the needs of the nation and readily enhanced their personal and financial burdens.

Direct legislation, it was remarked in the beginning of the present Chapter is almost peculiar to Switzerland and it has profoundly modified the character of the Swiss Government. Its institutions were planted in some other countries after World War I as a result of the peoples' reaction against representative democracy. Whatever be the degree of success there, it cannot be denied that the mechanism of direct democracy is a difficult operative ideal. It demands certain inherent qualities in the people where it is desired to be made operative. The success which popular legislation has achieved in Switzerland is due to the historical antecedents of the Swiss people, to their long practice of self-government in small communities, to social equality, and to the pervading spirit of patriotism and sense of public duty in them. Similar success cannot be expected in countries where similar conditions are not obtainable. In Switzerland direct legislation has a natural growth, or as Bryce says, it is "racy of the soil. There are institutions which, like plants, flourish only on their hill side and under their own sunshine."¹⁰

9. Hughes, C., The Federal Constitution of Switzerland, p. 101.

Independence is the first quality which a Swiss citizen exhibits. Democracy without political parties is unthinkable and voting of any kind closely follows party lines. But in Switzerland party sentiments seldom dominate the minds of the Swiss citizens, particularly when they are required to give their final judgment on legislation. The Swiss Constitution does not provide for the dramatic clashes of political parties and forces common in other countries. There have been instances when a displeasure at the conduct of a party created a prejudice against the measures it had put through the legislature, as it happened in 1884 when the people rejected all the four Bills due to the irritation caused among the minority parties in the Assembly. But this is a rare phenomenon in Swiss politics. "The Swiss voter, always independent, is most independent when he has to review the action of his Legislature."¹¹ Each proposal is generally dealt with on its merits. Party affiliations do not count when the Swiss dislike changing their members even when they championed the measures which they have rejected. "As a general rule the Swiss tend to re-elect representatives whom they have disavowed, unless they have reason to suspect their patriotism."¹²

Another quality in the Swiss is parsimony. Like the Scotch, they are thrifty, and "in public matters positively penurious." A Swiss is averse to anything which can increase taxation, and, as previously stated, he cannot understand "why officials should be paid on a scale exceeding what he earns by his own toil." With this attitude the Swiss examine all their political problems and institutions. As a corollary, it follows that they like their administrative machinery to be simple. And through all these ages the Swiss have jealously guarded their local sovereignty and have always resented the interference of the Central Government, although there has been a marked evolution in the popular mind towards centralization.

But the quality most important "in a legislating nation as in a legislating assembly," says Bryce, "is compounded of two things: judgment and cool-headedness, the absence of passion and presence of intelligence."¹³ The Swiss are the embodiment of this quality which we may call a "good sense." They are neither an emotional nor a passionate people. They are an educated nation and "their best minds are more sagacious than imaginative." Having a long experience with the methods of direct democracy and its successful operation, the Swiss have formed the habit of voting in a calm spirit. They are cautious in their judgment and the great majority of the nation have always shown resolute hostility to extreme demagogic spirit.

10. Modern Democracies, Vol. I, pp. 453-54.

11. Ibid., p. 433.

12. Rappard, W.E., The Government of Switzerland, p. 72.

13. Modern Democracies, Vol. I, p. 435.

Compromise and tolerance, indeed, are essentially elements in the Swiss system of government. "A people more given to absolutes or inclined to engage in extremist debates over abstract principles would find the Swiss system unworkable."¹⁴

Arguments in favour of Referendum. The principle of popular sovereignty, it is asserted, finds its real expression in direct legislation rather than in a representative system. In a representative system genuine public opinion is unobtainable, for it is moulded and shaped by the partisan influences of the press, the platform and the propaganda. The referendum upholds the sovereignty of the people and is the surest method of discovering the real wishes of the people. It is, therefore, an excellent barometer of public opinion. Moreover, a citizen knows better than his representatives what can serve him the best and enhance his interests. A law which comes direct and straight from the people carries with it fuller moral authority and commands more unquestioning obedience than a law made for them by the representatives.

The referendum, its advocates further maintain, minimises the importance of political parties and discourages partisan spirit. Then, it is a popular check on the vagaries of the legislature and the political machine. The frequent rejection by the people of measures passed by the legislature shows that the latter does not always know or give effect to the real will of the people. The referendum also ensures that laws opposed to the popular will have no chance of being enacted. It puts, as a matter of fact, a veto in the hands of the people.

The referendum reduces the political high-handedness of the majority party. Under the representative system a law is usually what the parliamentary majority wishes it to be. It does not represent the will of the minorities. If, however, it is referred to the people before it can be finally enacted, the minorities do get an opportunity to adequately express their opinion and to muster strong their opposition, and if possible, to negative it. This is real democracy. Then, there is no time lag. Direct legislation, remarks Bryce, "helps the legislature to keep in touch with the people at other times than at general election and in some respects a better touch, for it gives the voters an opportunity of declaring their views on serious issues, apart from the destructive or distorting influence of party spirit."

When the people feel and realize that they are the real legislators, their patriotism and their sense of responsibility are fully stimulated. Realisation of this fact is also the real political education of the citizens. This is the true price of democracy. Moreover, the process of direct legislation is conservative in character. The people will seldom introduce radical changes when they know that they are the arbiters on legislation. They realise, that if need be, they themselves can easily adjust laws to fulfil their needs. They do not, accordingly, press for sweeping changes.

The Referendum is the best means of resolving deadlocks between the two Chambers of the Assembly. It is, again, a check on the powers of the legislature. In Switzerland the executive does not exercise a veto on legislation. Nor does one Chamber override the other. They are co-equal in powers. The only check available, therefore, is the popular vote. Finally, as Bryce says, "There must somewhere in every government be a power which can say the last word, can deliver a decision from which there is no appeal. In a democracy it is only the people who can thus put an end to controversy."

14. Buell, B.L., Democratic Governments in Europe, p. 583.

Arguments against Referendum. One of the chief objections against the referendum is that it has undermined the prestige of the legislative assemblies and has adversely reacted on the quality of membership. When the representatives know that ultimately their efforts may be reversed, they will take little interest in the discharge of their legislative duties. Moreover, it erodes responsibility by making the people, "an anonymous shifting abstraction," responsible. If the measure succeeds at the popular vote, the credit for it goes to the people and not to the legislature. If it does not succeed, the blame goes to the legislature. The status and authority of the legislature must, accordingly, suffer and the result is that the people become less deferential towards it. "Its sense of responsibility," says Bryce, "is reduced" and it may be disposed to pass "measures its judgment disapproves, counting on the people to reject them, or may fear to pass laws it thinks needed lest it should receive a buffet from the popular vote."

The man in the street is not adequately qualified to form and deliver any opinion upon many subjects of legislation particularly when legislation has become so highly technical and complicated. A simple 'Yes' or 'No' does not indicate the real will of the people and their comprehension of the legislation which they accept or reject. The making of laws or their ratification demands from the people a great moral standard and it is this moral value which is first and last for the referendum's main justification. The people may be ever so shrewd and ever so willing to do their duty in accordance with the strict code of morality, but they have not, and cannot have, the knowledge needed to enable them to judge the implications of the proposed legislation. Nor can the pamphlets distributed and speeches made by the supporters and opponents of the measure convey to them the requisite knowledge. The interests of the people, the critics of direct legislation maintain, are really safer in the hands of representatives chosen for their talent and mature judgment than when submitted to the hazards of the popular vote. Then, the people must accept or reject the Bill, no amendments are possible. The vote must be given for the whole Bill. In fact, no amendments can be possible when the Legislative Assembly consists of the whole public.

Another criticism and, indeed, a really cogent one relates to the small size of the votes cast at a referendum. It is asserted that the result of the ballot does not fairly represent popular opinion, because in most cases the opponents of the measure go to the polls in larger proportion than its supporters. The number of large abstentions at referendum also proves that many a voter either cares little for his civic duties, or knows his unfitness to perform them. Moreover, when people are frequently asked to cast their votes, they develop what may be called an "electoral fatigue." The net result is that the decision arrived at is invariably that of a minority of the citizens and it becomes difficult, under the circumstances, to know whether there is any public opinion at all on the question. Furthermore, the referendum sometimes involves unnecessary and harmful delay in passing many laws of vital national importance. All this takes away the educative value of the referendum. When citizens do not interest themselves in public affairs, direct legislation becomes a farce pure and simple.

When a law is accepted at the referendum by a small majority, as it happened on the question of the Swiss Federal Penal Code, and on the Federal Economic Articles in 1938 and 1947 respectively with a majority of only 53 per cent in both the cases, its moral authority would suffer more than it would be the case had opinion been nearly equally divided in the representative legislature. In countries where direct legislation does not exist, a law passed by representative legislatures is accepted and no one cares to enquire what was the majority that passed it. It comes in the regular way from the usual organ of the people's will and it is accepted by the people in the usual way. But when it goes to the people for their acceptance every one is keen to know the majority that passed it. Those who opposed it carry on their opposition ceaselessly and openly, because they feel aggrieved to have been overridden by a negligible majority.

There is also no justification to hold that direct legislation lessens the evils of party system. As a matter of fact, political parties become more active when frequent votes are to be taken. The referendum accentuates political rivalry and partisan spirit, though this tendency has not been so prominent in Switzerland because of the habits of the people. The high cost per signature of securing the petition of 30,000 citizens for a challenge confines its use to corporate bodies—political parties, trade unions, pressure groups, etc., and increases their already strong influence on policies. "The vitality and influence of these non-public-law bodies," observes Christopher Hughes, "appears to a foreigner the most helpful sign in Swiss democracy, but the Swiss themselves are unanimous in exploring it; perhaps that is because they have deprived themselves of the counter-weight of strong political parties divided on issues of policy."¹⁵

One obvious result of the referendum is the movement of the centre of gravity from the legislature to the executive. In the first place, the Assembly prefers to delegate legislative powers to the Federal Council than to legislate itself, "for less surface is thereby exposed to criticism: laws are drafted to avoid referendums. And secondly, the Arretes of the Federal Council not being exposed to challenge like those of the Assembly, in times of emergency the Federal Council has to do all the legislating."¹⁶ The will of the people finds no adequate channel of expression and effectiveness. Direct democracy and its often acclaimed advantages disappear. An executive which is neither responsible nor responsive and is, in fact, the servant becomes the master.

15. The Federal Constitution of Switzerland, op. cit., p. 102.

16. Ibid., p. 101.

Finally, "the most comprehensive but also the vaguest argument," says Bryce, "adduced against the referendum is that it retards political, social and economic progress." Sir Henry Maine developed this point in his book, The Popular Government, in 1885, and it particularly impressed Englishmen who had associated masses with conservatism. But this argument is not supported by Swiss experience. It is true that prejudice or undue caution has in some cases delayed the progress of economic or social reforms which the Assembly proposed, but no general harm has followed in Switzerland from that conservatism.

Arguments in favour of the Initiative. Arguments in favour of the referendum and the initiative are more or less identical. But as the conditions of the latter's application are different, it needs, therefore, to be considered separately.

The initiative is claimed to be the necessary development of the concept of popular sovereignty. The people, it is argued, cannot really be sovereign, if they act through representatives. Howsoever politically virtuous and best intentioned the representatives may be, they must act according to the party programme and the party whip which may even lead to misrepresentation of the people's will. It is, accordingly, claimed that there is no better means of adequately and genuinely expressing their will, except by their own voice and vote. The referendum gives, to the people only a negative right of either accepting or rejecting the legislation on which they are required to express their opinion. But the initiative gives them the positive right of framing the laws which they feel they actually need. If the referendum "protects the people against the legislature's sins of commission so the initiative is a remedy for their omissions."

Next, if the legislatures are apathetic to the needs of the people, lag behind public opinion, and primarily concern themselves to push through party programmes, then, "why should a body of persons chosen by the people close the door against the people themselves allowing only such proposals as take their fancy to pass through so that the people can deal with them?" A law initiated by the people is the expression of their experiences and the manifestation of their own will. There is spontaneity in obeying such laws and obedience to authority is ipso facto. Such political behaviour on the part of the citizens adds to the stature and stability of the government and all round reverence for the institutions of the country. Finally, the initiative minimises the possibility of political upheavals as there is no indefinite postponement of legislation which the people deem essential for their welfare. They act immediately and on their own initiative rather than to depend upon their representatives to feel their pulse and wait for the legislature to pass it.

Arguments against the Initiative. But the initiative, like the referendum, reduces the authority and responsibility of the legislature. Making of laws, especially drafting of Bills, is not the job of a man in the street. It is an arduous task which requires specialized knowledge and mature judgment which only experts connected with the work and members of the legislature acquire by long experience. An average man cannot and does not know the technicalities required in drafting Bills.

The result is that popularly initiated Bills are often "crude in conception, unskilful in form marred by obscurities and omissions." The language used in such Bills is usually seriously defective and liable to many interpretations. In the Cantons where the legislative initiative has been much freely used, it has not been the parent of any reforms which might not have been obtained through the legislature. The people, on the other hand, have sometimes placed unwise laws on the statute books. "Sometimes the prudence of the Cantonal Councils," maintains Bryce, "dissuading the people from the particular plan proposed and substituting a better one, averted unfortunate results, while in the case of an ill-considered banking law the Federal authorities annulled the law as inconsistent with the Constitution. Several times the people have shown their good sense in rejecting mischievous schemes proposed by this method." The much acclaimed advantages of initiative, therefore, are actually negated by the practical results.

Conclusion. In Switzerland, the opinion both of scholars and statesmen on the value of direct legislation are most divergent. Some extol it as the most perfect institution, in theory and practice, so far devised. There are others who decry it on the ground that people are consulted on matters which they do not understand and assert that the actual working of the system has been bad. Some reformers resent the delays and checks inherent in the referendum and some voters complain of the excessive demands made on their spare time. All the same, no one in Switzerland would now be seriously in favour of giving it up. If one were to ask, writes Rappard, the man in the street in Switzerland "whether his country was on the whole satisfied with the results of her experiments with direct democracy, the answer would undoubtedly be in the affirmative. Indeed, he might take exception to the term of experiments in this connection. The experimental stage is over and with it have gone as well the misgivings of the early enemies of the initiative and referendum as the blind enthusiasm of its first friends."¹⁷

The people as a whole value the privilege. "The people of modern democracies," writes Bonjour, "is no longer the irresponsible demos which Aristophanes pilloried with his mordent pen in the Knights—a brutal, elderly and irascible epicure, a willing prey to the basest flattery. Today, it is usually clear-sighted and obedient to its best impulses when its leaders know how to enlighten it by appealing to them...."¹⁸ The political party which holds the majority in the legislature, though sometimes annoyed at the results, has never tried to withdraw it. The Radicals deem it to be a necessary feature of democracy. The Conservatives and the Clericals consider it a necessary drag on hasty legislation. The institution has, thus, become permanent, "not only because the people as a whole are not disposed to resign any function they have assumed, but also because it is entirely comfortable to their ideas and has worked in practice at least as well as a purely representative system worked before or would be like to work now." The institutions of the referendum and the initiative are the pivot upon which hinges the entire Swiss

17. The Government of Switzerland, op. cit., pp. 74-75.

18. Bonjour, F., Real Democracy in Operation, pp. 115-16.

governmental system. If they are abolished, "certainly the present relations among the executive, the legislature and the judiciary will have to be altered and either the American or the British system of Government adopted."

The Radical Party has constantly advocated the introduction of the legislative initiative for federal laws and recently it has been joined by the Socialists. Various arguments are used and repeated for the institution of the legislative initiative and one of a more practical nature is that it would eliminate the practice of using constitutional initiative to insert into the Constitution provisions that should ordinarily be drafted as laws. Various arguments against this institution are also offered and the most familiar argument is that it would further reduce the importance of the Cantons and their protection against the encroachment of the Federal Government."¹⁹ There may be practical reasons to block the introduction of legislative initiative, but as an institution of direct democracy it is highly valued. The majority of the Cantons have the institution of the legislative initiative. Some of the American States introduced non-constitutional initiative simultaneously with the referendum on the Swiss model. Twenty States of the Middle and Far West already have the right of initiative. Whatever be the verdict on the initiative, the Swiss people, as Hans Huber has said, "as a whole and in the Cantons have, by and large, given proof of great political maturity in referendum voting."

19. Rappard also points out that if a majority of the voters and Cantons should be required for approval of a legislative initiative, "the only distinction still existing between constitutional and ordinary legislative measures would disappear." The Government of Switzerland, p. 70.

CHAPTER VIII

POLITICAL PARTIES

Nature of Political Parties. Switzerland is a democracy, but even in democracy the individual alone is inevitably impotent unless he joins others with "similarly minded fellow-individuals" to exercise his political authority. When he does so, it is the emergence of a political party, which is a necessary tool of democratic government.

In spite of the inevitability of political parties in the Swiss system of government, the Swiss Constitution, like that of the United States, contains no express mention of this instrument of democracy. Political parties in Switzerland have extra-constitutional growth. There is, however, an indirect reference to political parties in the Swiss Constitution since the introduction of proportional representation for the election of the National Council. Article 73 as amended on October 13, 1918 specifies, "Elections for the National Council are direct. They follow the principle of proportionality, each Canton or half-Canton forming an electoral district." The "principle of proportionality" would be meaningless if it did not refer to the parties between whose elected representatives a proportion, similar to that prevailing between their electors, was to be established.

Switzerland, too, like other Continental democratic States, relies upon a variety of political parties to organize and promote national opinion. In fact, nowhere else in Europe there are more chances of having political parties than in Switzerland. The suffrage is wide and the people have to vote upon public affairs very often. Then, there are so many diversities of racial character, of religion, of speech, of forms of industry, and of conflicting economic interests. All these diversities are a breeding ground for multiplicity of parties and their frequent regroupings. But it is fortunate for Switzerland that the lines of party do not coincide with those of race and language and nowhere else "has the ship of the State been so little tossed by party oscillations." There are three major political parties and there do not exist extreme differences in their political philosophy and social composition. As the Swiss love for "order and compromise is as strong in politics as it is elsewhere," the multiple-party system has not led to the instability that is found among two of Switzerland's close neighbours.

History of Political Parties. The political history of the present Confederation begins with the overthrow of the Sonderbund to which a reference has been made earlier,¹ and the adoption of the Constitution of 1848. This Constitution sealed the re-union of all the Cantons and created closer ties between them. At that time, federal affairs were dominated by two groups of politicians whose principal support came from the Protestant German Cantons and from Protestant French Cantons. These groups subsequently became known respectively as the Liberals and the Radicals. The former group, the Liberals, consisted of older men who advocated a liberal political philosophy of the traditional laissez-faire type, moral and cultural freedom for all, and republican political institutions. The Radicals were younger and progressive people and they were inclined towards a liberalism of more advanced type. They sought to extend political democracy through the institutions of the initiative and the referendum, and advocated a policy of economic liberty with a certain degree of State intervention. Despite their difference the Liberals and the Radicals actively collaborated in bringing into being the Federal Constitution of 1874, and this document incorporates the philosophies of these parties and presents "centralistic, liberal, secular and democratic features."

1. See ante, Chap. I.

Opposed to them was the Catholic Conservative People's Party. It consisted mainly of those elements which had formed the Sonderbund in 1846, and brought in the War of Secession in 1848. The Clericals were ultramontane in their views and were the champions of the Cantonal rights. The party paid, according to Zurcher, "only grudging allegiance to the Constitutional settlement of 1848, into the acceptance of which it had been virtually coerced." This party now draws its members mainly from the Cantons where the Catholic majority is overwhelming. It is the most ardent, the most compact, and the best organised of the Swiss political parties. The party still opposes certain provisions of the Federal Constitution that they regard as anti-Catholic or as anti-Clericals. It rejects all powerful State and espouses rights of the individuals in regard to family, school, and church. In general, it is hostile to centralisation.

Thus, at the advent of 1874, there were three political parties. The Liberals and the Radicals governed the country from 1848 to 1890 while the Catholic Conservatives remained in the Opposition. They commanded a large majority in the Assembly and all the seven seats in the Federal Council belonged to them. An important feature of this period is that the Liberal Party's electoral strength decreased considerably whereas that of the Radicals increased enormously. In time, the Radicals commanded a decided majority both in the Council of States and the National Council, but not in the Federal Council because of the Swiss habit of re-electing the Councillors as long as they wished to serve. With their retirement, however, they were replaced by the Radicals and by 1890, the Federal Council's membership came to include a single Liberal Member.

When the only Liberal member of the Federal Council retired in 1891, the Assembly which was then manned by the Radicals, elected in his place a representative of the Catholic Conservative Party. The Liberal Party became the Opposition. The Radical Conservative Coalition begun in 1891, continued till 1943, when a Socialist found his way. With the resignation of Dr. Max Weber, the Socialist member of the Council, the Socialist Party decided not to put forward another candidate. The vacated seat was given to the Catholic Party. In 1954, the Federal Council was made up of three Radicals, three Catholics, and one Farmers. But the withdrawal by the Socialist Party was temporary. In 1959, it put up two candidates and secured both the seats. The Federal Council then reflected for the first time the true party strength.

After 1880, Switzerland witnessed the rise of the Swiss Social Democratic Party. The Socialists, as their name suggests, were the followers of Karl Marx. The development of industrialization, and the growth of such industrial centres as Zurich, Winterthur, and Basel together with the large immigration of German working-men, offered the best opportunity for propagating the socialist doctrines, and the party grew apace. At the end of the First World War, it claimed 41 seats and in the elections of 1935 it secured 50 seats in the National Council and, thus, became in the next four years the dominant party; the Radical Liberals and Catholic Conservatives having 48 and 42 seats respectively. In 1939 its number fell to 45 as a group of Left-Wing Radicals broke away from the party. In 1943, it again went up to 56, but fell down to 48 in 1947 and in the elections of 1951 its strength stood at 49, and in 1959 at 51. It keeps close to this number and as at present, it is the biggest party. Like the two other big parties, it has two seats in the Federal Council.

An important feature of the party system in Switzerland is that a certain conservatism governs the development of parties and none of them is extremist. The socialist of the Swiss Social Democratic Party is essentially practical and not revolutionary, although in the early days of its career it believed in the collective ownership of all the means of production, in an inevitable class struggle and, consequently, in violent and unconstitutional methods. But as Switzerland is a mountainous country of small holdings and the peasantry wedded to the soil with strong patriotic sentiments, the revolutionary aspect of socialism did not have much appeal for the people. Moreover, the communal and Cantonal public enterprise, the nationalisation of rails and roads, forests, water, power, etc., make the programme of the Socialists less attractive. They were, accordingly, compelled to make their programme less militant as compared with those of the socialist parties in certain other countries. The Swiss Socialist Democratic Party, therefore, reconciled itself to the democratic and constitutional principles. The Party has now openly declared its faith in an evolutionary form of socialism.

The Socialist Democratic Party is the most highly organised political party in Switzerland and it has its branches in all the Cantons. It stands for nationalization of industries and of all private monopolies, higher wages, social security, compulsory liquidation of agricultural debts, unemployment relief, recognition of the right to work, and suffrage for women.

Other Parties. With the introduction of proportional representation in national elections in 1918, many more parties emerged in. The Farmers, Workers and Middle Class Party was organised in 1918 as a result of split from the Radicals because of dissatisfaction with the latter's agrarian policy. In 1929, the Radical Conservative coalition was broadened to include a representative of the Farmers Party which claimed 31 seats in the National Council. In 1935, the Party could command only 21 seats and this number continues since then with a seat fluctuating this or that way. This fall off was primarily due to the coming into existence of another agrarian party called the Young Farmers who secured four seats in 1935, 6 in 1943, 5 in 1947, 4 in 1951 in the National Council. The Farmers Party is intensely patriotic and vigorously favours measures for adequate national defence. Its programme is decidedly for the protection of agricultural interests and advocates a policy of advancement of agricultural interests by means of federal subventions.

Other minor parties, at present, represented in the National Council include the Independence Party formed in 1935, the Independent Social Democrats, the Nicole group which seceded from the Socialists in 1939, and the Communists. The Communists, who now call themselves the Labour Party, have increased their following, but their success in the stable political conditions of Switzerland can never be phenomenal.

Features of the Swiss Party System. The Swiss party system is now more akin to the French rather than the Anglo-American system. The reasons for multiplicity of parties in Switzerland are obvious. It is a country of diversities, more communal and Cantonal rather than federal in its political outlook and consequently the political parties, too, are not nationally organized. Switzerland, unlike other democracies, has not in any true sense a party government. There are no nation-wide elections for a national office, such as that of a President. Elections to the Federal Assembly have a strong local colour. National party organizations are maintained now, but really their practice is to constitute mere alliances for common nation-wide purposes with otherwise independent Cantonal parties; the only exception being the Social Democratic Party.

Switzerland also disproves the contention that democratic government cannot work unless there is a definite majority party or a coalition of parties. Minority parties find representation in the Federal Council and in the Executive Councils of almost all the Cantons. This enables them to exert a direct influence on the conduct of public affairs. Thoroughly partisan administration is, therefore, out of question in Switzerland. There is also absence of strict party control in the Assembly. Party lines are rarely drawn, except on measures that have an immediate bearing on party interests or on religion. The result is that there is the absence of party machinery. There are no national committees, no elaborate system of party caucuses and general conventions. The Radicals and the Clericals, and so do the Socialists, do occasionally hold their Congresses, but they can have no resemblance with party meetings in the United Kingdom, India, and other countries.

Another feature of the Swiss party system is that there are no party leaders. The absence of party leaders is partly due to the non-party executive at the centre as well as in the Cantons, and partly because the parties are divided on local rather than on national issues. Lowell aptly says that it would be "more accurate to say that federal representatives are chosen by the Cantonal parties." The influence of the leaders consequently finds expression in their own Cantons and their power is local rather than national. Another reason is that there is no opportunity for anyone in Switzerland to extend patronage and distribute spoils. Finally, there is neither professionalism in politics nor party funds. Administration has attained in Switzerland a stage of businesslike efficiency. Demagogues do not find favour with the Swiss people. Nor do the representatives find time, during the short sitting of Swiss Parliament of ten to twelve weeks in a year, to permit "talkers and fighters." The Assembly is the most business-like body in the world and it does its work quietly. Obstruction in the conduct of business is unknown and divisions are much less frequent.

.....

Politics is run in Switzerland more cheaply than anywhere else in the world. Money for party purposes is needed only when the party requires scientific organization, meetings to be held for nursing the constituencies and diffusing literature. All parties, including the Socialists, agree on three fundamentals: Swiss independence, Swiss neutrality, and Swiss trade. They may disagree on details and on the best method of achieving the objectives, but on the importance of the three-fold goal there can be no difference of opinion. Then, there is no bid to capture the government. The defeat of a party leader in the elections is neither desired nor it is manipulated. In fact, pains are taken "to provide against such a contingency." Politics, therefore, in Switzerland is unadulterated and a game of the veterans who play it in a sportsman spirit. There is complete absence of the motive of personal profit. "It is not worth anybody's while," writes Bryce, "to spend money on party work except for some definite public purpose. Nobody in Switzerland has anything to gain for his own pocket by the victory of a party, for places are poorly paid. Federal places do not change hands after an election, Cantonal places are not important enough to deserve a costly fight, nor could the expenditure of money at an election escape notice in these small communities."

The spirit of political parties is, thus, weaker in Switzerland than in most other democracies of the world. The political organizations are less tightly knit and less actively worked. In the mountainous and agricultural regions, there are only local questions that occupy the people. In the industrial parts of the country, political parties are more active, but their issues are so diverse and their problems so numerous, because of natural diversities, that it is impossible to give a general description of Cantonal politics. The result is that the parties in the Cantons are not necessarily the same as in the Confederation. They do not always even bear the same names. The Cantonal elections are usually fought on Cantonal and not on national issues. The Swiss, while electing their representatives, respect ability and trust those whom they have long known as honest and courageous. Party enthusiasm and hero-worship seem foreign to their nature.

Good effects of such a Party System. Such a party system, as is obtainable in Switzerland, has a tranquillizing, stabilizing and ennobling influence. There is no incentive to party organization and chances of a party warfare are reduced to a minimum. The extreme stability of the parties is the most remarkable peculiarity of the Swiss political life. The majority parties are not obliged to make any great effort to retain their positions. The minority parties become passive by the consciousness that they have no chance of getting control of the government. Moreover, politics in Switzerland is conducted almost without regard to party leanings. When one party has the stable support of a large part of the nation and its supremacy is, thus, firmly established, its members are not rigidly compelled to stand together for all intents and purposes.

SUGGESTED READINGS

- | | |
|--|--|
| Bonjour, E. | : Real Democracy in Operation, The Example of Switzerland. |
| Bonjour, E., Offier, H.S., and Potter, G.R. | : A Short History of Switzerland. |
| Brooks, R.C. | : Government and Politics of Switzerland. |
| Bryce, J. | : Modern Democracies , Vol. I, Chaps. XXVII—XXXII. |
| Buell, R.L. | : Democratic Governments in Europe , pp. 557-84. |
| Codding, G.R. | : The Federal Government of Switzerland |
| Ghosh, R.C. | : The Government of the Swiss Republic. |
| Hans Huber | : How Switzerland is Governed. |
| Hughes, C. | : The Federal Constitution of Switzerland. |
| Kohn, Hans | : Nationalism and Liberty: The Swiss Example. |
| Lowell, A.L. | : Government and Parties in Continental Europe , Vol. II, Chaps. XI, XII. |
| Marx, M. | : Foreign Governments. |
| Munro, W.B. and
Ayearst, M. | : The Governments of Europe , pp. 735-50. |
| Neumann, R.G. | : European and Comparative Governments. |
| Ogg, F.A., and Zink, H. | : Modern Foreign Governments. |
| Rappard, W.E. | : The Government of Switzerland. |
| Sauser-Hall, Georges | : The Political Institutions of Switzerland. |
| Shotwell, J.T., and Others | : Governments of Continental Europe , pp. 331-86. |
| Siegfried, Andre | : Switzerland: A Democratic Way of Life. |
| Soloveyetchik, George | : Switzerland in Perspective. |
| Spiro, Herbert, J. | : Government by Constitution. |
| Tripp, M.L. | : The Swiss and United States Federal Constitutional Systems. |
| Wheare, K.C. | : Federal Government. |

The Government of Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

CHAPTER I

THE REVOLUTION AND AFTER

The World War. On the eve of the First World War Russia was still ruled by a Tsar Emperor. The foundations of his autocratic power had, no doubt, been rudely shaken, but the more his moral authority was undermined the more insistently he clung to the substance as well as to the semblance to his power. Still, all parties in the country, except the Social Democrats, enthusiastically responded to the government's call for mobilization. There were two reasons for this popular support. The action of the Central Powers in attacking Serbia and Belgium was regarded by the Russians as unwarranted and flagrantly aggressive. Secondly, Russia's alliance with Great Britain and France was considered a happy augury for the future of the country. But all hopes were falsified by the subsequent events and the co-operation anticipated between the government and the people could not materialise. As the war progressed the entire machinery of government disintegrated until it fell into a state of complete collapse.

Factors responsible for the Downfall of Government. The war began and continued with military disasters and serious food scarcities at home. The general mobilization increased the size of the army to the staggering figure of fifteen million strong. The government had to face the bewildering problem of equipping and provisioning these men. The national resources of the country had not so far been fully exploited to meet such an unprecedented demand and the acute shortage of labour due to mobilization further aggravated the situation. The blockade of the Baltic Sea isolated Russia from the rest of the world and there could not be import of food supplies in the country. Starvation, thus, haunted the country in the midst of war. Profiteering and black-marketing flourished unchecked. The inefficiency and corruption both in the military and civil supply departments were almost unbelievable.

Then, there were the financial embarrassments of the government inherent in wartime conditions. In the whirlpool of financial difficulties, the government adopted the stupid policy of prohibition in the country and suspended the operation of State Monopoly of Liquor which annually brought to the exchequer more than a quarter of the State revenue. The policy of inflation created its own vicious circle. Soaring prices and shortage of foodstuffs accompanied by the military reverses in the different theatres of war cooled down the enthusiasm of the people of winning the War.

The Tsar and the Tsarina. The country under these circumstances was inevitably heading towards a national crisis. Only a sagacious ruler could save the country. But Nicholas II "was far from being super-humanly clever, and, with a few exceptions, the people who surrounded and influenced him, whether the ministers who passed in dreary succession across the political stage, the members of his immediate household, or hangers-on at the Court were stupid, corrupt and revolutionary." Unfortunately autocracy had the unswerving and bitterly determined support of the Tsarina, a neurotic and unbalanced woman who herself was under the influence of Grigori Rasputin, "an uneducated, coarse, and licentious peasant." In Rasputin, the Empress had implicit faith and regarded him as the "man of God." Ministers and high officials of Government were appointed or dismissed at Rasputin's bidding, and his power was really enormous. Under his influence Russia received one of her least capable Prime Ministers, Boris Sturmer, who with A. Protopopov, the Minister of the Interior, acted practically as Rasputin's Secretary.

The Empress under the influence of Rasputin prompted the Tsar to assume in person the command of the army. The Emperor sent the Grand Duke Nicholas Nikolaevich, who was appointed the Commander-in-Chief at the outbreak of the war, to Caucasus, and assumed the command of the army himself. With the departure of the Tsar, at the end of August 1915, began the personal rule of the Empress and Rasputin. The ministers, who protested to the Sovereign that he should not assume command of the army, were replaced by those who had the blessings of Rasputin. The frequent ministerial changes accompanied by reshuffling of the permanent heads of the departments shook the bureaucratic pyramid, the mainstay of Imperial Russia. In 1916, Rasputin became the undisputed master of the country. Public resentment spread throughout Russia and even the arch conservatives sent to Tsar warnings of the impending catastrophe. In return, the Emperor gave rebukes and reprisals to all those who had wished to forewarn him. On December 30, 1916, Rasputin was assassinated by Prince Yusupov and other conservatives. But that was not the end of the drama. The year 1917 began with a great foreboding. A few weeks later came the Revolution which swept away the Tsar and his regime.

THE REVOLUTION

The "February" Revolution. The Bolsheviks all through this time had worked for a defeat of Russia in war so as to promote revolution. The strikes and hunger marches had become numerous and although they were still suppressed, but the attitude of the troops sent against strikers and bread demonstrators showed that their loyalty to the Tsar had begun to waver. The political police, which was ubiquitous in Russia, had also become susceptible to the imminence of the revolution. The smouldering fire flared up early in 1917. The striking workmen, who numbered some seventy or eighty thousands and the hungry people of Petrograd¹ demonstrated in the streets of the capital demanding food. The troops of the Petrograd garrisons were summoned to quell the demonstrators. But the soldiers refused to obey orders and instead joined the revolutionary populace. The Government unable to offer any real resistance succumb-

1. According to the Julian Calendar which was in force in Russia.

2. St. Petersburg had been renamed Petrograd.

ed to the revolutionary forces. The State Duma elected from its own members a provisional committee and established a provisional government. Nicholas II was made to abdicate and held prisoner with his family.

The Provisional Government. The Provisional Government, the child of the Duma, was headed by Prince Lvov and was composed of liberal, conservative, and even monarchist members of the Duma. No Bolshevik or Menshevik was in it, and there was only one Socialist Revolutionary, Alexander Kerenski, the leader of the small Labour Party. The Government proposed to establish in Russia parliamentary system of government on the basis of Western States and within the framework of the capitalistic society. The Government was also in favour of carrying on war to a victorious end and fulfilling Russia's obligation towards her allies.

But the Provisional Government ran at once into insurmountable difficulties. The people were not in a mood to accept its parliamentary programme. The economic collapse of the country needed a political and economic organization that should revolutionize the existing structure of society. The Radical groups condemned the Lvov Government as it aimed at middle class rule. Their object was to establish a government dominated by peasants and workers.

The difficulties of the Government were further aggravated by the Petrograd Soviet of Soldiers' and Workmen Representatives, a body which came into being in February 1917. It contested, from the very beginning, the authority of the Provisional Government and very often issued decrees at variance with the decrees of the Government. Soviets were simultaneously established in other parts of the country and in the army. These Soviets were manned by the Social Revolutionaries and the Social Democrats who had long before anticipated a situation in which they could act. Their activities, in fact, had not only demoralised the army, but also paralysed the Provisional Government, thus, preparing the way for the "October Revolution."

By this time Lenin and other Bolshevik leaders, Kamenev, Radek, Lunacharski and others, had come into Russia. They went to work immediately. With the freedom of the press, speech, assembly, and organization, which the February Revolution had secured, the Bolsheviks got the opportunity to agitate for their programme and tactics. Lenin and his associates were successful in organizing great demonstrations on May 3 and 4 against certain members of the Provisional Government. Bolshevik agitation was stepped up under the slogan "All powers to the Soviets."

The "October" Revolution. In the meantime Left groups within the Government became active. Prince Lvov resigned on July 20, 1917, and was succeeded by Kerenski. Kerenski made an all-out effort to win the War and brought a new fighting spirit to the troops. But the offensive met with disaster; the rest the Bolsheviks did. They had been agitating among the soldiers and peasants for an immediate cessation of hostilities and for the immediate seizure of all land by the peasants. Their programme synchronised with the aspirations of the masses, who had clamour-ed for bread and peace all these years. At last on November 5, the Government decided to take determined action against the Bolsheviks. But the Government was repulsed everywhere. On November 7, 1917, the Bolsheviks seized power. The Congress of the Soviets which was in session declared itself to be the repository of all power and established a government called Council of People's Commissars, composed solely of Bolsheviks, headed by Lenin. Its most important members were Rykov, Trotsky, Stalin, and Lunacharsky.

3. According to the Jullian Calendar in Russia.

Immediately on coming to power, the Bolsheviks did two important things. First, they renamed themselves Communists and, thus, "finalised the separation between themselves and the more moderate Socialist elements." Second, they shifted the seat of government from Petrograd to Moscow.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE COMMUNIST REGIME

War Communism. The Communist Government pursued a forceful and direct policy of establishing a one-party State, and suppressing all opposition. Its early decrees were, as Trotsky described, "in the language of power." It successfully concluded peace with the Central Powers and was able to drive out of the country the so-called White Armies organised by Anti-Bolshevik Russians. To save the country from the threat of famine and economic collapse, the government embarked on a policy of wholesale nationalisation of the means of production, regimentation of agriculture and private trade was forbidden. The peasants were ordered to turn over to the Government all the produce less what they needed for their living. A system of rationing was introduced for the urban population and an attempt was also made to eliminate money economy and substitute it by State-organised barter.

The period from the middle of 1918 until the spring of 1921 is described in the Soviet History as the period of War Communism. It is true that the revolutionary policy of the Communist government was partly responsible for the economic collapse of Russia during this period, but it was consistent with and in vindication of the Marxian-Lenin doctrines. The Left-Wing Communists saw in these measures the dawn of integral communism. Lenin justified it as the "direct assault on the citadel of capitalism." But the peasants and workers could not reconcile themselves to the new socialist order. Seeing the impending dangers, Lenin commanded a halt to further extension of the revolution in the economy and on March 21, 1921, inaugurated the New Economic Policy, the N.E.P.

The New Economic Policy. The N.E.P. period extended up to 1927, and in many respects it was the negation of the socialist principles. It conceded in the economic field the individual ownership of the means of production and individual profits therefrom, without disturbing the nationalised character of large-scale industries. The peasants were free to dispose of the surplus of their produce after paying a heavy tax. The scheme for the elimination of money economy was abandoned and effective steps were taken to stabilise the value of money. The banking and credit institutions were simply put under the State control. Trade treaties with foreign countries followed and some foreign capitalists were admitted in Russia to manage a certain amount of business. In fact, the concessions which the N.E.P. made were essentially the same against which the "October" Revolution was directed.

But the most astounding departure was in the international field. Russian delegates appeared again at international conferences culminating in the treaty of Rapallo in 1922. Soviet Government first having been recognised by Germany, the recognition by Great Britain, Italy and France came in 1924. The N.E.P., thus, marked the abandonment for the time being of plans for imminent world revolution. The survival of Russian Soviet Government had become an established fact. But it led to a sharp controversy and with the death of Lenin in 1924, the differences within the Communist Party became more acute. Trotsky was a strong supporter of world revolution and he considered its promotion as the most essential object of the Russian Soviet Government. Stalin, who had till then unflinchingly supported that view, came forward with his new theory of "Socialism in a single country." Though the controversy between Stalin and Trotsky was personal motivated by the bid for power, but it centred on a fundamental issue of Communism. The victory was for Stalin and his doctrine of "Socialism in a single country" and the new doctrine became the official policy of the Soviet Government. Apparently, the dogma of world revolution had never been given up, but, in practice, it ceased to influence the policies of the Russian Government. The Soviet Union sought international amity and co-operation with the capitalist countries. In domestic policies, too, it was the triumph of nationalism over internationalism. All efforts were concentrated on the reconstruction of Russia and building up of the Communist State.

The period of Socialistic Reconstruction. The N.E.P. was a make-shift affair and Lenin called it "a strategic retreat." After Stalin had consolidated his position, he proceeded to direct and adopt long-range policies to make the country strong. And to be strong meant to be industrialized. This was to be accomplished by a series of Five-Year Plans. The period of planned economy manifested in a phenomenally rapid industrialisation of the country and collectivization of agriculture. In 1936, Soviet democracy was established with the new Constitution which was the third in the Soviet series of governmental structure. The Stalin Constitution, as it had been popularly called, was the embodiment of the First and Second Five-Year Plans.

Early Constitutions. The Stalin Constitution was preceded by two earlier Constitutions in 1918 and 1924. The Constitution of 1918 was drawn up by a Commission set up by the Central Executive Committee of the Communist Party under the direct guidance of Lenin and Stalin and ratified by the Fifth All Russian Congress of Soviets on July 10, 1918. The State which it created came to be known as the Russian Socialist Federated Soviet Republic and it comprised about three-quarters of the old Tsarist Empire.

The Constitution was imbued with the militant spirit of the newly established dictatorship of the proletariat and embodied essentially the series of declarations, rules and decrees issued between the October Revolution 1917, and the Summer of 1918. It aimed at a complete suppression of capitalism and the capitalist structure of society. Land, natural resources, and industries were transferred to the people as their common property and the power of the State was vested in the Soviets and Russia became a "Republic of Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies."

The Constitution was federal in character. But it presented a novel specimen of federalism. The authors of the Constitution, consistent with the Marxian principles, conceived of establishing at no distant date a world federation consisting of diverse nationalities and scattered territories. To make it attractive for the sovereign States, after the world revolution, the architects of the Constitution provided for free and voluntary association of the component units with an option to secede.

The Soviet Constitution of 1918 applied to the area of Russia proper in Europe. In 1923, it was named the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) comprising of four constituent republics; the Russian Socialist Federated Soviet Republic, the Ukraine, White Russia and Transcaucasia. The Uzbek and Turkmen constituent Republics were carved out in 1924, and the Tadzhik Republic in 1929, raising the number* of the constituent republics to seven.

The Constitution of 1924 was the replica of the previous Constitution, except that three new bodies were created—All Union Congress of Soviets, All Union Central Committee, and All Union Presidium. The division of powers between the federal government and the units resembled in many respects the division of powers in the United States. Specified powers were given to the centre while residuary powers rested with the constituent republics. But the powers assigned to the Union Government were so wide that they embraced the whole economic system of the USSR. The cardinal principle of the Soviet system of government was the relationship between economic and political structure; the authority of the Union Government superseded that of the constituent republics. The Union Government was also given the power of vetoing any law or decree of a constituent republic, if it was in conflict with the Constitution. Finally, the Union Congress was empowered to lay down "general principles to be followed by the constituent republics in the matter of civil and criminal law, judicial procedure, labour legislation and schools."

The administrative structure of the USSR consisted of a pyramid of Soviets. At the bottom were the village Soviets and at the top, the Union Congress of Soviets, the supreme political authority in the Union. In between the base and the apex came the county and city Soviets, Soviets of the territories, provinces, and the constituent republics. Early in 1919, Lenin said, "Soviets had become the permanent and sole foundation of all State power" in Russia. Soviets are, today, the "genuine popular government" in the USSR and "are of the flesh and bone of the people."

THE SOVIETS

Origin of the Soviets. The origin of the idea of Soviets may be traced to the early nineteenth century in Britain where a follower of Robert Owen propounded a plan to do away with the House of Commons and to organise a government based on a council representing the various trade unions. Soviet is a Russian word for "council" and the first appearance of a Soviet in Russia was in 1905, when a strike committee was set up in St. Petersburg to carry on the general strike. At that time labour unions and strikes were forbidden in Russia. The strikers, therefore, had to work under disabilities and to achieve their ends they were constrained to direct their activities not only against the employers, but also against the State. So the Soviet of 1905 was militant in character and it forced the Tsar to grant the Manifesto of 1905, granting to the people the immutable guarantees of civil liberty upon the basis of real inviolability of person, liberty of conscience, of speech, of assembly, and of association.

The Soviets were, however, suppressed by the end of 1905 and Russia did not know anything about them till the "February" Revolution of 1917, when they reappeared first in Petrograd and then in the other Russian cities. This time the Soviets became the organs of rebellion and defied at every step the authority of the Provisional Government. The Petrograd Soviet very often issued decrees at variance with the official decrees, thus, paralysing the government. Lenin's slogan: "All power to the Soviets" materialised. The Soviets became the organs of State power.

SOVIETS BEFORE 1936

(i) Village and factory Soviets. The primary unit of administration was the village or the factory. Each village or factory had its own Soviet or Council and it was entrusted with the performance of all matters of local importance. Elections to the unit Soviet were direct. But villages with a population of less than 300 either governed themselves directly by forming assemblies of all adults, or combined with other villages of the same character forming a small group and each group elected its own Soviet. Similarly, factories employing less than 100 operatives combined with three or four others and elected a common factory Soviet. The main functions of the factory Soviet were to look after the social life of the workers, the factory, kitchen, the club, and the education of the factory children.

(ii) District Soviets. The next higher administrative unit was the district Soviet. It consisted of the representatives of the village Soviets and the factory Soviets within the district boundaries. The representatives to the District Soviet were elected not by the people directly, but by the village Soviets and factory Soviets. The District Soviet performed all local functions concerning the district, subject to the orders and functions received from the higher unit. Each District Soviet had its own Executive Committee which was entrusted with the work of general administration, control, and co-ordination of all Soviets within its area.

(iii) Regional Soviet. Each constituent republic of the USSR was divided into several regions for purpose of administration. Each region had its own Soviet consisting of the representatives of various district, town and factory Soviets within the region. The representatives were elected indirectly. Village Soviets had no direct representation in the Regional Soviet.

(iv) Autonomous Republic Soviet. The USSR, as pointed out previously, consisted of seven constituent republics. The Regional Soviets of a republic elected representatives to the Congress of the Republic. The Republic Congress had jurisdiction over all subjects not assigned to the Union Government by the Constitution. In theory at least, the republics possessed a large measure of autonomy in their cultural, political and economic development. They had also the right to secede.

The Republic Congress was a numerous body which met once or twice a year. It elected its Central Executive Committee enjoying generally legislative powers. The Executive Committee was accountable to its parent body—the Republic Congress. The Executive Committee, too, was a numerous body and it met generally once every three months. It, therefore, elected a smaller body called the Presidium, and acted on behalf of the Executive Committee whenever the latter was not in session. Then, there was the Council of Peoples' Commissars or the Council of Ministers. Each Commissar was head of some particular branch of administration.

All-Union Congress of Soviets. At the top of the pyramid was the All-Union Congress of Soviets consisting of the representatives of the Town Soviets and Rural Soviets. The representation given to the urban Soviets was at the ratio of one representative for 25,000 workers whereas the rural Soviet had one representative for every 125,000 peasants. The All-Union Congress of Soviets was the basic law-making authority. But being enormous in size, with more than 2,000 members, and since it met too infrequently, it could not be expected to satisfactorily carry out its functions. It delegated its powers, therefore, to the Central Executive Committee.

The All-Union Central Executive Committee was composed of two bodies: the Soviet of the Union consisting of 600 members elected on the basis of population, and the Soviet of Nationalities, numbering 150 members—5 members from each of the territorial sub-divisions of the Union.

The All-Union Central Executive Committee, too, was unwieldy in size and it met only four times a year and that also for short sessions. It, accordingly, delegated its functions to the Union Presidium consisting of 27 members. The All-Union Central Executive Committee also elected All-Union Council of Peoples' Commissars. They were 17 in number and in functions were akin to ministers under a parliamentary system of government.

SOVIETS AFTER 1936

Article 2 of the Stalin Constitution provides that "The Soviets of the Working Peoples' Deputies, which grew and attained strength as a result of the overthrow of landlords and capitalists and the achievement of the dictatorship of the proletariat, constitute the political foundation of the USSR." At all levels, village, city, district, area, Autonomous Regions, Autonomous Republics, Territories and Regions, Union Republics, there is a Soviet which is the organ of State authority and it directs the work of the organs of administration subordinate to it. And the socialist State of workers and peasants is designated as the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Soviets are, therefore, the State form of the dictatorship of the proletariat, the real organs of authority representing the will and power of the working people of the town and country to whom all power belongs. Other organs of administration in their respective spheres are subordinate to their appropriate Soviets. They adopt decisions and give orders within the limits of the rights granted to them by the laws of the USSR and the Union Republic. Elaborating the importance of the Soviets, Stalin said, "In our Soviet country we must evolve a system of Government that will permit us with certainty to anticipate all changes, to perceive everything that is going on among the peasants, the nationals and the non-Russian nations and the Russians; the system of supreme organs must possess a number of barometres which will anticipate every change, register and forestall...all possible storms and ill-fortune. That is the Soviet system of Government." But how far the Soviets are the barometers of the will of the people which "anticipate every change, register and forestall...all possible storms and ill-fortune," and how far, as representative assemblies, they express that all power really belongs to the working people depend upon the relationship between the Soviets and the Communist Party, and the nature of elections of the Deputies.

The Stalin Constitution introduced drastic changes so far as elections are concerned and assigned a definite status and role to the Communist Party. This has been claimed to be a great democratic advancement over the earlier Soviet Constitutions. The old disfranchised categories existed no more in the Soviet Union and consequently all Soviet citizens of eighteen or older are entitled to vote and elect members of the various Soviets. Every citizen who has reached the age of twenty-three is eligible for election to the Supreme Soviet of the USSR. The age of eligibility for election to the Republican Supreme Soviets and Autonomous Supreme Soviets is twenty-one whereas for local Soviets it is eighteen. All elections are conducted now on territorial basis and no distinction is made between village and city Soviets and consequently the weighted categories whereby the peasants were outvoted stand abandoned. The method of indirect voting has been discarded and open ballot has given way to the secret ballot. For purposes of election the country is divided into appropriate electoral districts. Article 141 of the Constitution provides that the right to nominate candidates on all levels is secured to public organisations and societies of the working people, Communist Party organisations, trade unions, co-operatives, youth organisations and cultural societies. Election regulations have extended this right to general meetings of workers, employees, servicemen, collective farmers, and general rural meetings.

But the process by which the candidates are actually nominated is absolutely informal. Nominations are made generally in meetings of factory or farm workers or of the inhabitants of an electoral area. Sometimes the party organisation makes it known beforehand whom it wants and the meeting simply endorses the name. When organisations other than the Party also propose names, then, informal conference committees are appointed to make the choice to one candidate. It is at this stage that the Communist Party intervenes and plays the role of leadership and guides the choice which will finally be made. The Communist Party is the only political organisation listed in Article 141 as having the right to participate in Soviet elections. The Constitution, of course, permits other organisations and societies to exist and participate in elections, but all such organisations, like trade unions, co-operative societies, youth organisations, cultural, technical and scientific societies, are of non-political character. They are organised to promote the interests of common welfare and material advancement towards the realisation of the socialistic goal of society. The Communist Party being the vanguard of the proletariat, consisting of the most active and politically conscious citizens, as a rule, it is closely connected with all these non-party organisations, and its members are the real force behind them. Not all candidates for elections to the Soviets are Communist Party members, but those who are not must be persons devoted to the cause of Communism. It is useless to suppose that one who is opposed to the regime, or even a slightly dissident person is likely to be nominated.

Thus, on the election day, the voter has no choice. He has only one candidate on the "List of Communists and Non-party People." Yet election campaigns are carried to the full pitch. All the vehicles of propaganda are geared up to educate the voters in the aims and achievements of the government both in the domestic and foreign policy. Meetings are arranged and speeches of prominent party leaders are broadcast and reprinted in millions of pamphlets. House to house canvassing takes place and on the election day every one is on the move to vote. Cars carry invalids to the polls and "precincts are set up on trains, ships, in hospitals and homes for the aged, so that every one may vote." The Soviet Information Bulletin rightly explains that "No country in the world has known such election activity on the part of the voters as is maintained in the Soviet Union." The problem is that of getting out the vote and that the vote be unanimous. A 100 per cent record is the goal and in Stalin's district in Moscow it was regularly achieved. In the 1950 election to the Supreme Soviet 99.6 per cent votes were cast and in the elections held on March 14, 1954, 99.98 per cent of the eligible voters cast their ballots. In subsequent elections, too, the percentage has veered round the same point. Unanimity evinces solidarity of the nation and it strengthens the prestige of government and the cause for which it stands. Molotov's pre-election speech in 1946 is pregnant of the meaning of elections in the USSR. He said, "In its policy the Party sets us the correct course for our work. And we in authority in local and central organizations must prove by our deeds that we know how to work.... We have every ground to expect that at the elections to the Supreme Soviet, our people will again show confidence in the Bolshevik Party and will unanimously support the candidates of the Stalin Bloc of Communist and non-party workers, peasants and intellectuals.... So let the new elections serve to cement our people's unity still further and to promote our further advance under the tried leadership of the Bolshevik Party and our great beloved Stalin." The Party and its leadership have ever remained the rallying force with unflinching faith. Deviation therefrom is tantamount to treason and dissension is as heinous a crime as treason itself.

There is not the least similarity between elections of the Soviets and elections in other democratic countries. In the USSR there is only one party, all candidates belong to one political conviction and only one candidate is presented on the "List of the Communist and the non-party people." The idea that a voter decides for or against a policy, or for or against a government, is totally absent in the Soviet Union. In fact, there is no choice for the voters. Political opposition cannot exist in the USSR. Soviet elections have, indeed, a different function to fulfil. "The Soviet election system," writes Vyshinsky, "is a mighty instrument for further educating and organizing the masses politically, for further strengthening the bond between the State mechanism and the masses, and for improving the State mechanism and grubbing out the remnants of bureaucratism." Election affords an opportunity to the party to enthuse the people with the spirit of socialism. Prominent leaders exhort the people for devoted conviction, and for mighty efforts to speed up production. In fact, things are generally stirred up. Results of elections, however, are foregone conclusions.

Article 142 of the Constitution prescribes: "It is the duty of every Deputy to report to his electors on his work and on the work of the Soviet Working Peoples' Deputies, and he may be recalled at any time upon decision of a majority of the electors in the manner established by law." This provision gives a constitutional right to the voters to demand from their Deputy an explanation of his work in the Soviet and if he is deemed to have not fulfilled his duties he may be recalled and another Deputy elected in his place. According to the letter of the law a Deputy is a mere delegate or agent of his constituents. But is this a matter of reality in the context of what has been said above?

CHAPTER II

THE NATURE OF THE SOVIET STATE

Basic elements of Marxism. The Bolsheviks who succeeded the Provisional Government belonged to the Second International and they fantastically believed in the doctrine of Revolutionary Socialism founded on the writings of Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels. For them the February Revolution was a prelude to the proletarian revolution and the October Revolution was a proletarian seizure of power. "We shall now proceed to construct the socialist order," declared Lenin as he appeared on the rostrum of the Second Congress of the Soviets. The nature of the Soviet State was, therefore, to be an embodiment of a direct revolutionary action which would ultimately pave the way for a classless and stateless society. The revolutionary action aimed at smashing the old ruling machine and creating a new state, a state of the proletariat. It directed its endeavours at establishing new production relations designed to lead to Socialism and educating citizens of the proletariat State to discard bourgeois ideology and accept the ideology of Socialism as a step towards Communism.

Historical Materialism. A basic element in the Marxian theory is the economic interpretation of history which teaches that the political, social, religious and other institutions of any given historical era are determined by economic factors, by the mode of production. "Legal relations as well as forms of the State," said Marx, "could neither be understood by themselves, nor explained by the so-called general progress of the human mind, but they are rooted in the material conditions of life.... The mode of production in material life determines the general character of the social, political and spiritual processes of life. It is not the consciousness of men that determines their existence, but, on the contrary, their social existence determines their consciousness." Thus, to each stage of economic production there corresponds an appropriate political form and an appropriate class structure.

Theory of Surplus Value. Starting with this fundamental proposition and operating with a theory of value Marx explains the actual mechanism of capitalist exploitation. In the analysis of his theory of surplus value, Marx derives his inspiration from the classical economists and held that labour in the long run is the sole source of value. Marx defined commodities as "congelations" of labour and regarded value as "crystallised labour." Labour, says Karl Marx, is a commodity and its value, too, is determined like any other commodity, that is, its value in exchange is fixed by the labour needed to produce and maintain it. The worker must get wages sufficient enough to cover his expenses of maintaining himself and his family. But actually this does not happen in a capitalist society and the wages paid to workers bear no proportion to the price which the commodity fetches. The capitalist class, who are the employers of labour, know that labour is highly perishable and it suffers from many other disabilities. Labour's disabilities are the employers' advantages and workers receive only as much in wages as the employers are forced to give and this is usually a subsistence wage. The difference between the exchange value of commodity and the wage paid to labour, the surplus value, is the capitalists' profit which is expropriated from the labour who has created it. It is, in fact, the product of unpaid labour and Marx held it as pure and simple exploitation. In the Communist Manifesto Marx says, "For exploitation, veiled by religious and political illusions, it (bourgeoisie) has substituted naked, shameless, direct, brutal exploitation."

Law of the concentration of capital. Marx, then, proceeds to show how capital becomes concentrated into the hands of a handful of people. He foresaw the expansion of capitalist undertakings and the substitution of trusts and kartels for free competitive enterprise. He rightly predicted that the number of capitalist enterprises would diminish as the magnitude of a single enterprise goes through, what we call, rationalization of industry. With the diminution in the number of businesses as a result of monopolisation, the number of capitalists, too, diminishes and, thus, capital comes to be concentrated in the hands of a few capitalists. The capitalists thrown out of their business will join the ranks of the proletariat. "Our epoch, the epoch of bourgeoisie," says Karl Marx, "has simplified class-antagonisms. Society as a whole is more and more splitting up into two great hostile camps, into two great classes directly facing each other: Bourgeoisie and Proletariat." When the capitalists grow numerically weaker it heralds their destruction. "All previous historical movements," wrote Marx, "were movements of minorities. The proletarian movement is the self-conscious, independent movement of the immense majority, in the interest of the immense majority."

Marx applied the principle of the law of concentration of capital not only to industry, but also to agriculture. He predicted the land owners to become fewer in number while their estates grew larger and larger. This process, he maintained, makes more glaring the evils and injustices of the capitalist system and consequently strengthens the power of the opposition.

The doctrine of class war. From this analysis Karl Marx reached the conclusion that the history of the human race must be told in terms of class struggle. Every system of production has given rise to two opposing economic classes, the exploiters and the exploited, the owners and the toilers. "Freeman and slave, patrician and plebeian, baron and serf, guildmaster and journeyman, in one word, oppressor and oppressed, standing constantly in opposition to each other, carried on an uninterrupted warfare, now open, now concealed." Just as in the ancient world the interest of the slave owners was opposed to that of the slaves, and in the Mediaeval Europe the interest of the feudal lords was opposed to that of the serfs, so in our own times the two classes confronting one another are the employers and the workers, the exploiters and the exploited. Division of society into distinct economic groups creates within each group special group consciousness which gives rise to class struggle.

The existence of a class war is, accordingly, nothing new. But it was not so intense before the Industrial Revolution. With the growth of complexity of industrial technique and the concentration of capital in the hands of fewer capitalists the condition of the workers has been rendered hopelessly precarious and it is here that the mechanics of capitalism and its inner contradictions prepare the way for the inevitable downfall of the capitalist system. Marx developed this prognosis in concrete detail and showed how a violent proletarian revolution would overthrow the capitalist class first locally, then nationally, and at last internationally. The victory of the proletariat will change the social order and the emerging society will be a classless society preparing the way for the Communist Commonwealth of the future. "Though the revolution itself," asserted Marx, "is carried out in a class basis, the state of society which follows the revolution will be based on the abolition of classes." All land and capital shall be owned in common, exploitation will cease, the tyranny of the owners of wealth will no longer be possible, and all men will be free. The Communist Manifesto ends with an appeal to the wage-earners of the world to rise on behalf of Communism. It reads, "The Communists disdain to conceal their views and aims. They openly declare that their ends can be attained only by the forcible overthrow of all existing social conditions. Let the ruling classes tremble at a Communist revolution. The proletarians have nothing to lose but their chains. They have a world to win. Working men of all countries, unite."

The Communist theory of the State. According to the Communist doctrine the State is inevitably and solely the instrument of class domination, that is, the instrument by which the exploiters keep the exploited in subjugation and obedience. It is always, in the phrase of Engels, "a force of suppression," the dictatorship of the ruling class which under capitalism is the bourgeoisie. The fact that many of the modern capitalist States appear in the guise of democracies changes nothing in their nature as they still remain class dominated. The capitalists man the entire machinery of the State and occupy all key positions in government. The laws of the State are so made and its policies so formulated as to protect and perpetuate the vested interests of the capitalists as a class. The Communists, accordingly, consider it idle to expect that the capitalists who run the "bourgeois democracies" will ever voluntarily relinquish their privileged position. The downfall of capitalism can be brought about only by the forcible overthrow of the oppressors. They, however, point out one redeeming feature of the "bourgeois democracies." While preserving all the inner contradictions inherent in capitalism, "bourgeois democracies" offer important advantages to the proletariat which provide them the opportunity to organise for the coming struggle. The industrial proletariat, thus, led by the resolute and enlightened leadership of a well-organised and disciplined revolutionary party would strike at the proper moment and carry a successful revolution for the ultimate triumph of Communism.

Dictatorship of the Proletariat. Although the ultimate goal of the Communists is the emancipation of humanity by creating a classless and stateless society, but its realisation will take some time. The revolution paves the way for a Communistic society, it does not miraculously bring it into being. The revolutionary progress, accordingly, has been divided into two distinct stages: (1) a transitional revolutionary stage when the State dominated by the proletariat will continue functioning, and (2) a Communistic classless stage in which State as a repository of authority will disappear.

Deliberate, intelligent, and informed action is needed, according to Karl Marx, to bring into existence the conditions of socialism after the overthrow of the rule of the bourgeoisie. During the transitional revolutionary period the machinery of the existing state must, therefore, be substituted by a revolutionary dictatorship of the proletariat. "In order to break down the resistance of the bourgeoisie," wrote Karl Marx, "the workers invest the State with a revolutionary spirit." It follows that the machinery of the State is vested with oppressive and autocratic powers, because, as Engels says, "Since the state is only a temporary institution which is to be made use of in the revolution in order forcibly to suppress the opponents, it is perfectly absurd to talk about a free popular state: so long as the proletariat needs the State, it needs it not in the interests of freedom, but in order to suppress its opponents; and when it becomes possible to speak of freedom the state as such ceases to exist." The Communists anticipate, and rightly they do, that the bourgeoisie, though dispossessed by a sudden proletarian revolution, will still make frantic efforts to regain their lost economic and political power. "In any and every serious revolution," says Lenin, "a long, obstinate, desperate resistance of the exploiters, who for many years will yet enjoy great advantages over the exploited, constitutes the rule."

The first stage, therefore, in the realisation of the Communistic society is the one in which the State continues to exist, but its machinery is substituted by the dictatorship of the proletariat. For Marx and Engels dictatorship of the proletariat is really democratic as compared with the bourgeois democracies, because the former is ruled by a majority while the latter is ruled by minority, a small minority of the population constituting the capitalist class.

The proletarian State so created immediately will take to the task of construction of socialism and destruction of capitalism. As destruction of capitalism will not be accomplished in one comprehensive stroke, the transfer from capitalism to socialism will be made by degrees. The first step in this direction will be to raise the proletariat to the position of the ruling class and thereby win the battle of democracy. The proletariat, thus, raised to the position of rulers will use its political supremacy in wresting, by degrees, all capital from the bourgeoisie and centralising all instruments of production in the hands of the State. It will simultaneously devise means to increase the total of productive forces as rapidly as possible. The immediate measures to be adopted are outlined in the Communist Manifesto: abolition of private ownership of land, nationalisation of the means of communication and transport, taking over by the State of credit and banking, regulation of commerce, abrogation of the rights of inheritance, imposition of heavily progressive taxation, prohibition of child labour in factories, and an enforcement of an equal liability to work, thereby taking away all privileges. These measures are to be followed by a gradual extension of public ownership in other fields of production. The destruction of capitalism is, in fact, the construction of socialism ultimately leading to a Communistic society, classless and stateless.

"Withering away" of the State. Once the bourgeoisie has been suppressed and all remnants of the capitalist system have been removed the necessity of the State ceases to exist. It becomes a superfluous institution and must, accordingly, "wither away." The State, having its origin and justification in the class struggle, can exist only so long as there are classes. Classes under capitalism are the product of economic inequality and privileges, especially of the private ownership of the means of production. The dictatorship of the proletariat observes the revolutionary policy of destroying economic inequalities and privileges and constructing a socialistic society. "When collective capital will replace private capital, both capitalists and wage-earners disappear, and all persons become co-operating producers." When the whole society comes down to one level everyone will be able to contribute his best to the social whole, and freely satisfy his needs. The State gives place to a free society of voluntary associations formed for the transaction of common business. The advent of such a society bears witness to the fact that the revolutionary era has terminated and it is the climax of Marx's socialism. When socialism is achieved mankind will make the ascent, according to Engels, "from the kingdom of necessity to the kingdom of freedom." The whole process of development from the conditions of socialism to the "withering away of the State" and, thus, making room for a classless and stateless society, has been described in the Communist Manifesto. It reads: "The proletariat seizes State power, and then transforms the means of production into State property. But in doing this, it puts an end to itself as the proletariat, it puts an end to all class differences and class antagonism, it puts an end to the State as the State.... As soon as there is no longer any class of society to be held in subjection; as soon as, along with class domination and the struggle for individual existence based on the former anarchy of production, the collisions and excesses arising from these have also been abolished, there is nothing more to be repressed and the special repressive force, a State, is no longer necessary."

Thus, the State "withers away." The end of the State ushers in a society without antagonism, without exploitation, in which, as Lenin says, "people will become gradually accustomed to the observance of the elementary rules of social life.... without compulsion, without subordination, without the special apparatus for compulsion which is called the State."

Lenin's doctrine—"Leninism." Valdimir Lenin was the most ardent follower of Karl Marx and the most famous of the revolutionaries who carried the banner of Marxian socialism to its successful achievement in Russia and strived for the proletarian revolution. Lenin was not himself a workman, but a member of the middle class intelligentsia who had become interested in the revolutionary movement and Marxism when still very young. The execution of his elder brother for his part in the attempt to assassinate Alexander III in 1887 influenced Lenin deeply. The ostarism of his family after the execution accentuated his hatred of the society that supported privileges and submitted to atrocities of the few privileged people. He found solace in the writings of Marx and Engels and soon after organized a Marxist group that called for revolution.

The Tsarist Government recognised the danger ahead in the activities of Lenin and arrested him in 1895, exiling him to Siberia in 1897. While Lenin was in exile his colleagues formed organisations called Leagues of Struggle for the emancipation of the working class in all the key cities with a principal organisation at St. Petersburg. A meeting of the representatives of various Leagues of Struggle was convened in the city of Minsk in 1898. The meeting proclaimed the organisation of the Russian Social Democratic Labour Party and issued a manifesto urging a fight against capitalism until the victory of socialism. Before the Party could come into being all the members of the Minsk meeting were arrested. But it proved to be a spark and the organisation that had been announced came into existence in 1903.

Lenin had returned in 1900 and he plunged himself immediately with organisation of the proposed Russian Social Democratic Party. But he soon found that there existed considerable differences of opinion among its supporters. The liberal members of the intelligentsia were drifting towards the Socialist Revolutionary Party, formed from the remains of the Narodnik groups, and which concentrated its work on the peasants. Plekhanov and Lenin's many other friends were of the opinion that the liberals could be helpful in furthering the cause of revolution and, accordingly, they should be encouraged to join the proposed Social Democratic Party. Lenin, taking a position to which he adhered up to his death, answered that "liberals were generally half-hearted, cowardly, and ready to compromise with Tsarism." The group led by Plekhanov thought it unnecessary for the new party to become a single highly centralised organisation of trained revolutionaries. There was another group, the "economists." They preferred an organisation of mass character that would progress with the workmen as they developed a political and social consciousness. In 1902, Lenin wrote a pamphlet, What is to be Done, calling for "a vigorous, closely knit party of professional revolutionaries to lead the proletariat, as its vanguard."

In the midst of these disagreements on plans and programmes the "First Congress" of the Russian Social Democratic Labour Party was called at Brussels on July 30, 1903. The Congress shortly moved to London because of the police surveillance and established itself as the Second Congress of the Party. There was a good deal of opposition to Lenin's ideas about the revolution and the dictatorship of the proletariat. Leon Bronstein, known in the party and later to the world as Leon Trotsky, argued that the dictatorship of the proletariat could be accomplished only when the working class had become the majority of the population and had joined the party almost in its entirety. Lenin's views ultimately prevailed. But he lost on the rules to be adopted for membership. Lenin held the firm conviction that the party should be "a militant, disciplined, centralised organisation," and it should be limited to "a disciplined small group of schooled revolutionaries." Sympathisers were to be barred from becoming members. Trotsky and many others, who won on the rules, secured the vote of the Congress that anyone, who accepted the programme of the party and promised to render all possible aid in the realisation of that programme, could become a member. This created a definite cleavage and some of the moderates, who had helped to carry the vote over Lenin's group on the issue of membership, walked out of the Congress. This left Lenin's group in majority and the two factions in the party earned the names the Bolsheviks and the Mensheviks, the former meaning majority and the latter minority.

The differences between the two factions became wide and the Mensheviks did not participate in the Third Congress of the Party. The Bolsheviks utilised the opportunity to annul the previous rules of membership adopted in 1903. The new rules permitted membership to a small group of revolutionaries only dropping out the sympathisers. A plan was also adopted for armed uprising and the political strikes in the country were to be used as the springboard of the uprising. It was decided that the leadership of the planned uprising should be in the hands of a provisional revolutionary group. The Bolsheviks, thus, took an active and direct part in the barricade fighting later known as the Revolution of 1905. The Revolution did not succeed and from its failure Lenin drew the conclusion that "the offensive against the enemy must be most energetic; attack and not defence must be the slogan of the masses."

There was no guide book for the revolution; Marxism provided only an ideological guidance. Lenin attempted to provide one while awaiting his opportunity to lead it. But hardly had he finished the first part of the celebrated volume The State and the Revolution, which did not even cover the analysis of the events of 1905, that he ran back to Russia from exile to lead the revolution. The military disintegration provided a new opportunity for the revolutionaries. Lenin was determined to act quickly, no matter what the cost. He caused the Bolsheviks to break with the Mensheviks and to form a separate party. This enabled the Bolsheviks to gain control of the Petrograd Soviet and with his new slogan, "All power to the Soviets" the rest followed in rapid succession and the first Socialist State came into being.

Lenin and the theory of Imperialism. Lenin was an ardent advocate of world revolution. He emphasised the theory that imperialism was the highest stage of capitalism. The era of imperialism, he maintained, was characterised by two important tendencies: (1) The export of finance capital and the control of the banks over industry; and (2) the growth of gigantic monopolies. The "inevitable" economic forces, Lenin said, would throw these monopolies into a savage struggle to find new markets culminating in war between the imperialist countries. Such a war, according to Lenin, is a war between trusts in which workers have no stake. Lenin admitted that certain parts of the proletariat, specially the skilled workers, profit from this imperialistic development. But he appealed to the workers to seize the opportunity by turning the imperialist war into a civil war. Class loyalty, Lenin emphasised, must be above national loyalty.

Abolition of the Army and the Bureaucracy. Lenin had the deepest contempt for utopias in general and for the utopian Socialists in particular. He would seldom venture to forecast future developments except in broadest terms. But with regard to the process of "withering away of the state," he was unusually precise and concrete and it caused considerable embarrassment to his successors. He maintained that "the toilers need a State merely for the suppression of the resistance of the exploiters," and since the latter formed a small minority the breaking down of their resistance appeared to him as a matter "relatively easy, simple, and natural." The proletarian State once established will immediately begin to "wither away" because in a society free from class contradictions the State is both unnecessary and impossible. Lenin outlined a number of steps by which the process of "withering away of the State" was to be brought about. The first step was, in the words of Marx, "the abolition of the permanent army and its replacement by the armed people," a popular militia. Bureaucracy, Lenin regarded, as a dangerous inheritance from the bourgeois regime and the victorious proletariat, he asserted, must not only be content to take over the machinery of government, but it should be broken and destroyed altogether to get rid of all bureaucratic elements.

The second step in the process of "withering away of the State" should be the complete abolition of bureaucracy. "Capitalist culture," Lenin wrote, "has created large-scale production, factories, railways, the post, telegraph and telephone service, and so on, and on this basis the immense majority of the functions of the old 'State authority' have been so simplified and can be reduced to such elementary operations as registration, book-keeping and control, that the performance of these functions will be perfectly accessible to all literate people, that it will be perfectly feasible to perform these functions for the 'wage of a workman,' that one can deprive these functions of even a shadow of something privileged, 'authoritarian'." Civil servants in the Socialist State, therefore, will be mere "supervisors and book-keepers," recruitment to government service will be by election and the tenure of office of all offices, without exception, subject to recall. Lenin, indeed, demanded the immediate "introduction of a system" under which "all should fulfil the functions of control and supervision, all should be 'bureaucrats' for a time and therefore no one could be a 'bureaucrat'." Finally, Lenin would retain the elected representative institutions in the new set up of the Socialist government. But he would forthwith scrap "parliamentarianism" as a system. By "parliamentarianism" Lenin meant the doctrine of the separation of legislative from the executive power. Referring to the doctrine of the separation of powers Vyshinsky writes, "...From top to bottom the Soviet social order is penetrated by the single general spirit of the oneness of authority of the toilers." The proletarian representative assemblies, according to Lenin, must be a place of work, not for idle talk. He characterised parliaments of bourgeois democracies as 'talking shops'. Lenin also advocated the abolishing of the immunities of the Deputies.

World Revolution. Marxian Socialism, as interpreted by Lenin, is primarily a doctrine of revolution. Lenin had an unfailing belief in the inevitability of the proletarian revolution originating in one of the more advanced industrial countries spreading the spark to other similar countries. For the establishment of Socialism a national revolution was not by itself considered sufficient. It required the concerted effort of at least several advanced countries and the process, as envisaged by Lenin, was the merging of the national revolutions into a world revolution. The establishment of a Socialist State in one single country had never been given any serious consideration. In fact, the idea was usually rejected as un-Marxian and utopian. The occurrence of the first proletarian revolution in Russia, which was a backward agricultural country, was something of a shock to the more orthodox Marxists. But they found solace in the belief prevailing among the Russian revolutionaries that the example of Russia was to be followed ere long by other European countries and even the United States would not be able to resist the proletarian revolution. The policy pursued by the Revolutionary Government in Russia was, thus, aimed at the advancement of world revolution. War-weary countries in the midst of economic distress provided a good opportunity to the Communist cause and political revolutions had actually occurred in many European countries, notably in Germany and Austria-Hungary.

But the revolutionary movement collapsed in its incipient stage. The Executive Committee of the Workers' and Soldiers' Soviet of Great Berlin, which seized power on November 11, 1918, was just short-lived. The Soviet Republics that declared themselves in some other areas of Germany, notably in Munich from April 7 to May 1, 1919, were suppressed by Government troops. The Soviets that emerged in Austria in 1918 could not stabilise their existence and had no voice in national affairs. The Soviet Republic established in Hungary could survive only for near-about four months.

The failure of the revolution in Europe and the economic collapse of Russia itself embarrassed the Russian revolutionaries. Lenin was a practical man and though he looked forward to complete success only after revolution had come to Western Europe, he was frank enough to tell his followers that the revolutionary parties must complete their education. Having learnt how to attack, they must now understand how to retreat. He followed the same line of thought which he had set forth in 1918: "It is in our interest to do all that is possible to take advantage of the slightest opportunity to postpone the decisive battle until the moment the revolutionary ranks of the single, great, international army have been united." But Lenin's colleagues did not all agree with him. They felt that Soviet Russia must support the revolutionary German proletariat or it would itself go down in defeat. The Communist Party accepted Lenin's principle. It did not, however, mean that Lenin had abandoned faith in the world revolution. He had simply called for the postponement of the direct support of revolutionary movements in Western Europe till conditions could be found favourable. Efforts to bring about world revolution were never relaxed and Lenin sponsored the creation of a third International to organise and direct the proletariat of other lands. For some years it even pressed militantly for world revolution.

"Socialism in a Single Country." Lenin's death in January 1924 was followed by a bitter struggle within the Communist Party, and it centred round the issue of world revolution. Leon Trotsky, along with many others who held similar views during the lifetime of Lenin, considered the promotion of world revolution not only the chief but the sole object of the Soviet Union. He believed that the construction of Socialism and the consolidation of the dictatorship of the proletariat were impossible in Russia without the direct support of the proletariat of Europe. Stalin, who had held similar views as late as April 1924, suddenly reversed himself and championed the principle of "socialism in a single country," provided the country concerned had a large territory, a large population, and abundant natural resources. The Fourteenth Congress in December 1925 endorsed Stalin's doctrine and the decision that the country was able to build Socialism even though surrounded by capitalist countries became the official creed of the Communist Party. The ideal of world revolution was not renounced, but it ceased to be an active factor in soviet policies both national and international. In its international relations USSR sought co-operation with the capitalist States, and at home it embarked on vast schemes of economic reconstruction embodied in the Five-Year Plans. Stalin attached so much importance to his doctrine of "Socialism in a single country" that in his report to the Fifteenth Congress in 1926, as well as on different other occasions he unequivocally declared that without full assurance that Socialism could be built within the Soviet Union the industrial programme would have been futile. At the Seventeenth Congress in 1937 he hailed the effort to complete the construction of "Socialism in a single country" as successful.

Yet the opposition to Stalin's doctrine could not be silenced for four or five years after Lenin's death. Trotsky, and others of his views, never felt satisfied with the new policy of Soviet Russia. Trotsky was expelled from the party, deprived of his various offices and deported first to Central Asia and in 1929 to Turkey, and was finally murdered in Mexico in 1940. The rest met their fate in the historic purges of the thirties. Khrushchev, while justifying the fate that the Trotskyite opposition met, gave at the Twentieth Congress an outright appraisal of Stalin's methods. He said: "We have to consider seriously and analyse correctly this matter in order that we may preclude any possibility of a repetition in any form whatever of what took place during the life of Stalin, who absolutely did not tolerate collegiality in leadership and in work, and who practised brutal violence towards everything which opposed him, but also toward that which seemed to his capricious and despotic character, contrary to his concepts."

Revision of the theory of the State. The doctrine of "Socialism in a single country" was a distinct departure from the Marxian theory and consequently it entailed a revision in the theory of the State. According to the official view, the State, having its origin and justification in the class struggle, can exist only so long as there are classes. With the elimination of private ownership of the means of production class distinctions disappear and simultaneously the State should begin to wither away. To quote Lenin again, "In a society free from class contradictions the State is both unnecessary and impossible." Disappearance of the army and elimination of bureaucracy were the principal ramifications of the withering of the State.

But Stalin proved otherwise. He held that the withering of the State can be accomplished not through the weakening of the State power, but through the maximum increase of its strength. In his report to the Eighteenth Congress Stalin explained the reasons why Soviet Communism differs from the norm set by Marx and Lenin. His explanation was really the vindication of his doctrine of "Socialism in a single country." He said that the contradiction between the Socialist Commonwealth envisaged by Marx and Lenin and the Soviet Union as it existed was due to the capitalist environment and especially due to the activities of "foreign spies, assassins and wreckers" sent to Russia by foreign intelligence services. Stalin pointed out that Engels never discussed the position of a single socialist State encircled by hostile capitalist nations. Engels, Stalin argued, either was concerned with the inner process of development of the future socialist State, irrespective of the international situation, or proceeded on the assumption that Socialism will be victorious in all or in the majority of the countries. "But it follows from this," Stalin said, "that Engels' general formula about the destiny of the socialist state in general cannot be extended to the partial and specific case of the victory of Socialism in one country alone, a country which is surrounded by capitalist world, is subject to the menace of the foreign military attack, cannot therefore abstract itself from the international situation, and must have at its disposal a well-trained army, well-organised punitive organs, and a strong intelligence service—consequently must have its own State, strong enough to defend the conquests of Socialism from foreign attacks."

Stalin could not say about Lenin what he had said about Engels. He admitted that Lenin would not have overlooked such a contingency, but he had no time to discuss the behaviour of the Soviet State as the writing of his State and the Revolution was interrupted by the events of the autumn of 1917. The only inference which can be drawn from this is that what Lenin would have done is being done now by his disciples.

Stalin divided the history of Soviet Russia into two stages. The first stage lasted from the advent of the Bolsheviks to power to the liquidating of the exploiting classes. During this period the State performed two principal functions: suppression of the exploiters at home, and defence of the Soviet Union from foreign aggression. The second stage is the period from the liquidation of the capitalist elements to the construction of Socialism and consequently the adoption of the new Constitution which registered and gave legislative embodiment to what had been actually achieved. The triumph of the socialist economy has changed the character of the State, Stalin asserted. He said: "The function of military suppression at home has been dropped, has withered away because exploitation has been abolished, there are no more exploiters and there is no one to suppress. Instead of the function of suppression the State has assumed the new function of protecting Socialist property against thieves and embezzlers of the people's wealth. The function of military defence from foreign aggression has been fully preserved and, therefore, there are maintained the Red Army, the Navy, as well as the penal agencies and intelligence service necessary to catch and punish the spies, assassins and 'wreckers' sent into our country by foreign intelligence services. The function of economic organisation and the cultural educational activities of the State agencies have been maintained and have been fully developed. Now the principal domestic task of the State consists in the peaceful work of economic organisation and cultural and educational activities. As to our army, penal agencies and the intelligence service, the point of their weapon is no longer directed inside the country, but outside it, against our enemies. As you see we have now an entirely novel socialist State, unprecedented in history, a State that differs considerably both in form and functions from the Socialist State of the first period.

"But progress cannot be stopped here. We are moving further forward, toward Communism. Shall we maintain the state under Communism?

"Yes, it will be maintained unless the capitalist environment has been liquidated, unless the danger of military aggression from the outside has been removed. It is evident that the forms of our State will be altered again according to the modification of the domestic and foreign situation.

"No, it will not be maintained and will wither away if the capitalist environment has been removed, if its place has been taken by a Socialist environment."

To sum up, the State, according to Stalin, will not wither away unless capitalist environment has been liquidated; and a prerequisite of the withering of the State is the existence of socialist environment. So long as the Soviet State is encircled by capitalist countries, it should be strong enough to consolidate socialist economy and to combat international aggression.

The Stalin Cult. Stalin's doctrine of "Socialism in a single country," and the policies of the Soviet Government in pursuance of that doctrine had been opposed, as said before, in the different bodies of the Communist Party. Stalin, Khrushchev said at the Twentieth Congress of the Party, "acted not through persuasion, explanation, and patient co-operation with people, but by imposing his concepts and demanding absolute submission to his opinion. Whoever opposed his concept or tried to prove his viewpoint and the correctness of his position was doomed to removal from the leading collective and to subsequent moral and physical annihilation. This was especially true during the period following the Seventeenth Party Congress, when many prominent party leaders and rank-and-file party workers, honest and dedicated to the cause of Communism, fell victim to Stalin's despotism." Even Lenin was cited by Khrushchev, in his speech at the Twentieth Congress, to have described Stalin as "excessively rude" and did not have a proper attitude towards his comrades and that he was capricious and had abused his power.

The whole indictment of Stalin reads like the story of the primitive times when tyrants used to devastate lands to satisfy their lust for blood and to promote their inordinate ambitions. And no impartial student of contemporary history can disagree that Stalin was a monstrous tyrant with domineering habits, diabolical cunning, and ruthlessness.

He committed several incredible blunders and atrocities which gravely weakened the cause of Communism, caused unnecessary sufferings and misery among the people and produced fierce resentment in the non-Communist world against the USSR culminating in the cold war of today. Stalin originated the concept of the "enemy of the people" and "this term automatically rendered," Khrushchev observed in his report, "it unnecessary that the ideological errors of a man or men engaged in a controversy be proven; this term made possible the usage of the most cruel repression, violating all norms of revolutionary legality, against anyone who in any way disagreed with Stalin, against those who were only suspected of hostile intent, against those who had bad reputations."

Stalin not only controlled the Government but also the Party machine. He became the First Secretary of the Communist Party on April 3, 1922, and this office, which he never relinquished, assured Stalin the extraordinary position he held for nearly thirty years. He had shunned public office up to 1941 when he unexpectedly became the Chairman of the People's Commissars and in the years to come other public offices and titles followed one another in rapid succession. Power accumulated in the hands of one person resulted into Stalin's worship. No other public figure had been driven, during his lifetime, to such incredible lengths of adulation as Stalin. He was described as the "greatest genius on earth;" "greatest architect of Communism;" "wise teacher and leader;" "inspirer of our glorious victories;" "foremost authority on science, literature, linguistics, music," etc. In 1952, Mikoyan said in his speech at the Nineteenth Congress, "At the present stage in world history and the history of our motherland, it is unthinkable to live, build, fight without thorough mastery of all the new concepts Comrade Stalin has contributed to the Marxist-Leninist science.... After the 19th Party Congress our Party will go forward still more calmly and confidently to the victory of Communism, under the guidance of our leader and teacher, the brilliant architect of Communism, our own beloved Comrade Stalin; Glory to the great Stalin." The text of the national anthem of the Soviet Union contained not a word about the Communist Party. It contained the following unprecedented praise for Stalin:

"Stalin brought us up in loyalty to the people. He inspires us to great toils and acts."

The same men who shouted themselves hoarse in proclaiming Comrade Stalin's imperishable glory subjected him to extreme denigration at the Twentieth Congress. Indeed, it may be said that denigration of Stalin had begun with the funeral oration delivered over his bier. At the Twentieth Congress Khrushchev said, "The Central Committee adopted measures for wide-scale enlightenment on Marxist-Leninist position of the role of personality in history. The Central Committee resolutely opposes the cult of personality alien to the spirit of Marxism and Leninism, which turns one or another leader into a miracle-performing hero, and, at the same time, minimises the role of the party and the popular masses." Khrushchev did not mention here names, but when this part is read with the opening part of Khrushchev's speech, "the miracle-performing hero" could be none other than Joseph Stalin. Khrushchev said, "After Stalin's death the Central Committee of the party began to implement a policy of explaining concisely and consistently that it is impermissible and foreign to the spirit of Marxism-Leninism to elevate one person, to transform him into a superman possessing supernatural characteristics akin to those of a god. Such a man supposedly knows everything, sees everything, thinks for everyone, can do anything, is infallible in his behaviour." M.A. Sualov, Secretary of the C.P.S.U. Central Committee, bluntly condemned "the cult of personality... which was spread prior to the Nineteenth Congress" and which "inflicted considerable damage both to organizational and ideological work of the party." Anastas Mikoyan, who had described Stalin at the Nineteenth Congress as "our leader and teacher, the brilliant architect of Communism," admitted that "in the course of about twenty years we in fact had no collective leadership." He also denounced "ossified forms of Soviet diplomacy" and criticised Stalin's Economic Problems of Socialism in the USSR for its mistaken notions about the nature of contemporary capitalism. He also attacked the Short Course of the History of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolsheviks) as well as other party histories edited by Stalin, particularly dealing with portions eulogising Stalin's role in the early years of the present century, for distortion of historical truth, and especially for their mendacious treatment of certain personalities.

Stalin, in brief, was shown at the Twentieth Congress as a man of colossal conceit, unbounded ambition and ruthless nature who did not hesitate to send thousands of persons to gallows in order to maintain himself in power, and "the cult of the individual acquired," in Khrushchev's word, "such monstrous size chiefly because Stalin himself, using all conceivable methods, supported the glorification of his own person. This is supported by numerous facts. One of the most characteristic examples of Stalin's self-glorification and the lack of even elementary modesty is the edition of his Short Biography which was published in 1948." This book is the expression of most dissolute flattery, an example of making a man into a "godhead, of transforming into an infallible sage," "the greatest leader," "sublime strategist of all times and nations."

New Thesis of the Communist Party. The long resolution adopted on domestic and foreign policies by the Twentieth Congress marks a spectacular development in the policy of the Communist Party and the methods it would advocate for the realisation of a socialist society ultimately leading to a Communist Commonwealth. The old thesis about the contradictions of capitalism and inevitability of war has not been discarded, but it makes a number of significant admissions and consequently modifications thereto particularly relating to the transitional stage from Capitalism to Socialism. While admitting the non-inevitability of war, the Congress asserted that the Communists do not necessarily stand for the violent overthrow of the capitalist order. Socialism, it is maintained, will not come to all States in the same way and that "each State will make its own particular contribution to the one or the other form of democracy, to one or the other type of dictatorship of the proletariat, to this or that tempo of socialist transformation in various aspects of the life of the society." The Congress expressed the view that "the establishment of the new socialist system in this or that country is an internal affair of the people in each country." Finally, it denounced Stalinism and condemned the cult of the individual as alien to Marxism-Leninism and called for a revival of intra-democracy and a return to Leninism.

The modifications of doctrine presented at the Twentieth Congress are thus:

- (i) the non-inevitability of war;
- (ii) the sanctioning of different paths to Socialism;
- (iii) the acceptance of the possibility of Socialism coming to power by parliamentary means;
- (iv) the possibility of co-operation with Social Democrats.

The Congress claimed that its resolution embodying the means of realising a socialist society represents merely a return to Leninism. But whether it is a return to Leninism or whether it represents a new approach to the problem of socialist transformation is really debatable. But no one can deny that the resolution of the Twentieth Congress throws overboard the concepts of inevitability of war between capitalist and Communist States, class conflict, and the identification of democratic Socialism with Capitalism. All the same, the new approach of the Communist Party is more realistic and the restatement of the doctrine of peaceful co-existence reflects the awareness of the dangers of thermonuclear warfare and of the realities of atomic stalemate.

But how can the theory of peaceful co-existence be reconciled with the Leninist thesis that wars are inevitable in the era of imperialism? "We are living," Lenin wrote, "not merely in a State but in a system of states, and the existence of the Soviet Republic side by side with imperialist states for a long time is unthinkable. One or the other must triumph in the end. And before that end supervenes, a series of frightful collisions between the Soviet Republic and the bourgeois states will be inevitable." Even Mikoyan said at the Twentieth Congress, "The danger that the imperialist States will attack the countries of Socialism... will continue to exist until Socialism has attained an overwhelming superiority over Capitalism throughout the world." It is explained that the Leninist thesis was correct until the outbreak of World War II and it is no longer applicable now because of the changed correlation of forces between Socialism and Capitalism. But something more can be read in between the lines. The Soviet State does not consider the possibility of a foreign aggression and if it comes at all the Soviet Union is strong enough to combat the forces of aggression. It is important to note that while pledging the Soviet Union to peace the party leadership makes it clear that they still retain their faith in the ultimate triumph of world Communism and propose to wage an ideological struggle against Capitalism "with the utmost vigour and consistency."

The statement of Khrushchev at the Twentieth Congress that it is not true that the Communists "regard violence and civil war as the only way to remake society" has two implications. In the first place, the theory of separate paths to Socialism has been made acceptable from the Marxist-

Leninist point of view and secondly, it endeavours to dispel the idea, which is generally held in the capitalist countries, that the Communists are blood-thirsty people, advocates of an armed insurrection and civil war regardless of the conditions and of the situations. According to the new version of the Communist History, Lenin sincerely hoped to win power by peaceful means and was forced to resort to violence because of "the violence of the bourgeoisie." This new version of the Soviet History throws the responsibility of the civil war in Russia on the interventionist armies and the counter-revolutionaries. The Bolsheviks themselves had determined "a path of peaceful revolution."

Khrushchev summed up the new directive for Communist parties abroad in these words: "...The present situation offers the working class in a number of capitalist countries a real opportunity to unite the overwhelming majority of the people under its leadership and to secure the transfer of the basic means of production into the hands of the people....The working class, by rallying around itself the toiling peasantry, the intelligentsia, all patriotic forces...is in a position to defeat the reactionary forces opposed to the popular interest, to capture 'a stable majority in Parliament, and to transform the latter from an organ of bourgeois democracy into a genuine instrument of the people's will....' It means that Parliaments, which according to Lenin were to be utilised for the express purpose of their eventual destruction, are now recognised as organs of genuine democracy for the working people and that parliamentary collaboration with Social Democrats and other progressive parties is permissible to defeat the reactionary forces opposed to the popular interest. The letter of the new policy is being most sincerely implemented by encouraging series of visits by prominent socialists to Moscow and by visits of top Communist leaders abroad.

The New Revolution. In the Twenty-third CPSU Congress held in December 1966, were outlined, "on the basis of a profound scientific analysis," the main tasks of the present stage in Communist construction. The Party worked out and is implementing the most important "measures on establishing and developing the Leninist norms of party and state life," perfecting the principles of collectivity in work, developing inner-party democracy, promoting criticism and self-criticism and improving methods of running the national economy. The tasks and plans "for the coming years," says the Report of the Decision of the CPSU Central Committee,¹ "mapped out by the 23rd Congress give birth to new forces and new energy of the Soviet people."²

The Report on the decision of the Central Committee admits the failure of the national economy. It really echoes the resolution of the Central Committee carried in the autumn of 1965. The resolution noted "that the existing organizational structure of management, the methods of planning and economic stimuli in industry do not correspond to modern conditions or to the level of development of productive forces....Cost accounting at enterprises in many respects is formal; the powers of enterprises in the economic activity are restricted." In his report to the

1. Dated January 4, 1967.

2. Soviet Review, January 28, 1967, p. 16.

Central Committee, A.N. Kosygin said that "we are not satisfied with the results achieved in particular in such branches as light industry, foodstuffs, chemicals, timber, paper and building material." He said agriculture "lagged behind," and that there were "great shortcomings in capital construction" linked with "the unsatisfactory state of planning." The resolution of the Central Committee, in order to remedy the grave shortcomings, said, "It is essential to improve planning methods, to reinforce economic stimuli to industrial production, and to increase the material incentives to workers."

Two significant changes the resolution of the Central Committee introduced. The first is the adoption of the profit motive, and the encouragement of individual enterprise. Kosygin in his report made the Government's attitude to the profit motive even clearer. He said, "If the purpose of production plans is to link production closer with consumption, then the index of profit and return is the best way to increase efficiency.... Profit, as distinct from prime costs, is a better indicator." Individual enterprises are to have wages funds, which will be given part of the profits. As Kosygin said, "out of these profits workers and employers will have to be paid not only bonuses for high work indices during the year but also non-recurring bonuses at the end of the year." In short, every Soviet enterprise is now committed to working to make a profit and establish national incentive fund for its employees. Report by N.K. Balieakov, Vice-Chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers and Chairman of the USSR State Planning Committee, to the Supreme Soviet, stated that the Government recently examined the results of the work of the industrial enterprises which have already "gone over to the new system of planning and economic incentives, and mapped out the ways for the further implementation of this vital undertaking." The Report emphasised that it was "very important to get enterprises entrusted in expanding their output and in increasing not only the grand total of profits, but also the amount of profits obtained per rouble of production assets allocated them. The work being done in our country in changing industry to the new system of planning and economic incentives is helping to boost the efficiency of social production."

This is, indeed, abandonment of some hitherto sacred Communist principles. There is also a strong impression in Moscow among foreign observers and many Russians as well that the pioneering zeal which swept communism from one end of Russia to the other has largely gone. The old Communists still feel it, but many of the younger ones seem to be disillusioned. When Khrushchev was in power there went round the story that "Khrushchev was a miracle man. He plants wheat in Russia and harvests it in Canada." The people demand and the Government feels that they should have sufficient and better things to eat, wear and read, to ride in, to live in, to sit in, and to sleep in. And these are the shortcomings which the State Plan for 1967, with increased economic incentives, plans to offer.

With these obvious changes, which are revolutionary in their charac-

3. USSR State Plan for 1967, Soviet Review, January 10, 1967, p. 22.

4. Ibid.

ter, there is a marked effect on the Soviet Foreign policy too. "The Soviet State proclaimed and is carrying out in practice new principles in relation between people and countries, principles of equality, sovereignty and non-interference in domestic affairs."⁵ Soviet Russia accepts the existence of a Sovereign State and proclaims to respect its sovereignty both internally as well as externally. The report of the Central Committee in 1966 said, "co-operation and solidarity is one of the main sources of strength of the socialist system. The development and deepening of this co-operation meets the best interests of each country in particular and the world socialist system as a whole, and promotes the unity of our ranks in the struggle against imperialism."⁶ Mutual visits, talks and conferences of Communist leaders, heads of the parties and governments of socialist countries are important means of shaping and co-ordinating the policy, working forms of co-operation and the necessary instruments of unity. Elaborating the Soviet Union foreign policy, decision of the CPSU Central Committee says that "this is a policy of ensuring favourable conditions of building socialism and communism, of strengthening the unity and cohesion of the socialist countries, of rendering all-round support to the struggle of the peoples of national and social liberation, of co-operation with the young developing countries of consistently carrying out the principles of peaceful co-existence of states with different social systems, of waging the struggle for ridding mankind of a new World War."⁷

5. Towards the 50th Anniversary of the Great October Socialist Revolution, Soviet Review, January 28, 1967, p. 12.

6. Leninist International Policy of the CPSU, Soviet Review, January 3, 1967, p. 15.

7. Soviet Review, January 28, 1967, p. 12.

CHAPTER III

THE STALIN CONSTITUTION

The Constitution of 1936. In 1936, Russia had a new Constitution, third in the Soviet series. It was referred to, at first in popular use and, then, almost officially, as the "Stalin Constitution," as Stalin was its principal architect. After Stalin's death it began to be referred to as the Soviet Constitution. The Constitutions of 1918 and 1924 contained nothing concerning the embodiment of socialist system. In his report to the fifth All-Russian Congress of Soviets, Lenin said, "...We do not yet know of Socialism that can be put into paragraphs of law." The period between 1918 and 1928 was really one of struggle and privation in the Russian history. But towards the end of the period of N.E.P. conditions had greatly improved. Then, came the First Five-Year Plan. It aimed at socialist reconstruction and elimination of all capitalist elements in the economic and political structure of the USSR. By 1932, Russia had witnessed a phenomenally rapid industrialization under a most extensive programme of construction and exploitation of natural resources. In agriculture the process of collectivization had achieved certain tangible results. About 60 per cent of the former individual Kulak households, numbering 60 million, were brought together in 220,000 units. The process of collectivization was accelerated in 1930, when the "grand offensive" took place which involved the liquidation of the rich peasants. One million peasants, according to the official figures, who had opposed the policy of collectivization were expropriated and transported to Siberia. This pace of collectivization was three times ahead of the original schedule of the Plan and it was regarded as the most revolutionary feature as it pulled capitalism out by roots.

Private trade was also substituted by co-operative trade and distribution. Even in the field of literature and science complete regimentation of opinion had been achieved. A neutral attitude towards the programme of building Socialism was no longer permitted. Nor could any opposition be tolerated as for the success of the Five-Year Plan a "monolithic iron-disciplined party" was most essential. The press and the radio became State organizations and vehicles of propaganda and agitation behind the drive for Socialism. Even the programmes of educational institutions, the theatre and the movie were co-ordinated with the Plan.

The Second Five-Year Plan (1933-38) undertook to eliminate completely all capitalist elements in the economic structure and in the thinking of the people. "The basic political aim of the Second Five-Year Plan," according to the resolution of the Seventeenth Conference of the Communist Party, "is the final liquidation of the capitalist elements and of classes in general, the complete elimination of causes that lead to class distinctions and exploitation, and the overcoming of the survival of Capitalism in the economic organisation and in the mind of men, and the transformation of the entire population into conscious builders of the classless society." Early in 1938, it was stated that 95 per cent of the "Production Funds"—capital goods—had been socialised and the remaining 5 per cent individual control of means of production did not constitute "a hostile economic force." And Molotov could say in 1939 that the chief objective of the Plan had been achieved.

The two Plans had radically altered the economic and political structure of Russia and Stalin could claim, "It is pleasant and joyful to know that the blood our people shed so plentifully was not shed in vain, that it has produced results." A new socialist industry was created in the USSR. The collectivization of agriculture had "emerged victorious." The class structure of the society had changed completely. The "socialist society of the USSR," to quote Molotov, consists now of two classes friendly to one another—the workers and the peasants—the dividing line between these classes as well as between them and the intellectuals is being effected, is gradually disappearing."

The Stalin Constitution registers and gives legislative embodiment to what had already been achieved. Speaking on the significance of the Constitution Stalin said, "After the path of struggle and privation that has been traversed it is pleasant and joyful to have our Constitution which treats of the fruit of our victories."

Drafting of the Constitution. Early in 1935, the All-Union Central Executive Committee appointed a Commission of 31 members, with Stalin as Chairman, to frame a Constitution, recording and consolidating what had already been achieved. The Commission produced the draft Constitution after more than a year of hard work, published it in June 1936, and submitted it to the people for suggestions and amendments. The draft Constitution created widespread public interest and it became practically a duty with the Russians to join in its discussion. It is reported that five hundred thousand meetings were held for this purpose and were attended by more than thirty-six million people. A staggering number of amendments—1,54,000—were suggested. An extraordinary session of the Congress of Soviets of the USSR was convened which unanimously adopted the text of the draft Constitution, with only 43 minor changes, on December 5, 1936. The majority of these alterations were textual, only seven were of "substantial content." The Stalin Constitution came into force in 1937.

The working Constitution of the USSR is that of 1936. Subsequent political exigencies, of course, necessitated some constitutional amendments, but in its main provisions the Stalin Constitution remains unaltered. In 1944 changes were made in the composition and organization of the Presidium and in the Council of Commissars. In 1946, the number of additional members of the Presidium was reduced to fifteen, thus, giving it a total of thirty-three. The Council of People's Commissars was given the Western nomenclature of the Council of Ministers. The hours of work were changed from seven to eight a day. Some amendments were also made with regard to free education. The age of candidates seeking election to the Supreme Soviet was raised from eighteen to twenty-three. The Constituent Republics were permitted to have their own republican military formations, to enter into direct relations with foreign States, to conclude agreements and exchange diplomatic representatives. Most of these constitutional amendments were necessitated by altered conditions after the termination of the Second World War.

The Constitution is arranged in 13 chapters covering 146 Articles. The Constitution of 1936, is a lengthy document as compared with the Constitutions of 1918 and 1924. Chapter I sets forth the foundations of the "Socialist State of Workers and Peasants," attributing all power to "the working people of town and country as represented by Soviets of working people's Deputies." Chapter II outlines the system of Federalism. Chapter III deals with the "Supreme Organs of State Power" in the Union, and Chapter IV with Supreme Organs in the Republics. Chapter V and VI deal with the administrative machinery of the Union and Constituent Republic, Chapters VIII and IX with Local Government and Judiciary respectively. Chapter X contains the "Basic Rights and Duties of Citizens." Chapter XI outlines the scheme of nomination and Elections and Chapter XII with Arms, Flag, and Capital. Finally, Chapter XIII specifies the procedure for Amending the Constitution.

Soviet Plan for New Constitution. The Supreme Soviet in April 1964, approved N. Khrushchev's proposal and decided to draft a new Constitution. The Prime Minister told the Supreme Soviet that the old Basic Law adopted in 1936 had outlived its usefulness. "It is quite natural," he maintained, "to consider it too old," as "Socialism has won the victory and is developing into Communism." He also emphasised that the Stalin Constitution was not suited to meet the new foreign policy demands of the Soviet Union. Khrushchev declared that the new Constitution was needed to permit the Soviet Union, among other things, "to form new relations with those countries which have been freed from colonialism." The old Basic Laws for the conduct of foreign relations, he asserted, were suitable "only for making war and not for planning peace." The new Constitution should embody Leninist principles of "peace, labour, freedom, equality and fraternity."

The Supreme Soviet, accordingly, appointed a 97-man Commission, with N. Khrushchev at its head, to draft a new Constitution. What has happened to this Commission after the exit of N. Khrushchev in 1964 from the body politic of the country, nothing is known with authenticity. The motive for replacing the Stalin Constitution is there and how does the new Constitution shape itself, time alone will show. For the present, the Stalin Constitution, now thirty-four years old, is still operative.

Procedure for amending the Constitution. The procedure for amending the Constitution is rather simple. Article 146 prescribes a matter of fact procedure. The Constitution can be amended by a decision of the Supreme Soviet adopted by a majority of not less than two-thirds of votes cast in each of its Chambers. That is to say, all constitutional amendments must be passed by a two-thirds majority in the Soviet of the Union and the Soviet of Nationalities, the two Chambers of the Supreme Soviet, separately. These need not be ratified by the Constituent Republics. Nor do amendments emanate from them. The procedure adopted is the one that is used in ordinary legislation, except for a two-thirds majority of votes. The Constituent Republics are, therefore, not equal participants in amending the Constitution and this is not in accord with the well-accepted principles of federalism. It does not also establish supremacy of the Constitution.

Scope of the Constitution. The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is a federal State with fifteen Constituent Republics, namely, Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Kazakh Soviet Socialist Republic, Uzbek Soviet Socialist Republic, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Georgian Soviet Socialist Republic, Azerbaijan Soviet Socialist Republic, Moldavian Soviet Socialist Republic, Lithuanian Soviet Socialist Republic, Latvian Soviet Socialist Republic, Kirghiz Soviet Socialist Republic, Tadzhik Soviet Socialist Republic, Armenian Soviet Socialist Republic, Turkmen Soviet Socialist Republic and Estonian Soviet Socialist Republic.

The Union Republics are sub-divided into Territories, Regions, Autonomous Republics, Autonomous Regions and National Areas. But not all Union Republics have all such sub-divisions. Federal relationship extends only from the Union to the Union Republics and all lower units are the creations of the Union Republics.

The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, with Moscow as its capital, measures 8,599,776 square miles and is the largest country in the world. It occupies 15 per cent of the earth's inhabited land area: is two-and-a-quarter times the size of China; nearly two-and-a half times as big as the United States; almost eight times as large as India; and more than ninety times as big as the United Kingdom. Twelve countries border on the Soviet Union, Norway, Finland, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Romania, Turkey, Iran, Afghanistan, China, Mongolia, and North Korea.

One hundred and nine nationalities inhabit the USSR, eleven small national groups related to other nationalities apart. It is instructive to note that forests cover nearly half the Soviet Union and deserts occupy one-sixth. The USSR has deposits of all the minerals to be found in the earth's crust and ranks first for known reserves of 13 out of 16 most important minerals. It also holds a leading place in reserves of oil and natural gas.

FEATURES OF THE CONSTITUTION

A Socialist State of Workers and Peasants. Article I of the Constitution reads: "The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is a Socialist State of Workers and Peasants." The Stalin Constitution sets forth the fundamental principles of the new Socialist system of society and the Soviet structure of the State. The Constitution of 1918 and 1924 said nothing about recording of the establishment of a Socialist system. At that time Socialism was still in the making. In 1936, it was an accomplished fact and in practice. Socialism in practice means, in the words of Stalin, "our mills and factories are being run without capitalists. The work is directed by men and women of the people. That is what we call Socialism in practice. In our fields the tillers of the land work without landlords and with Kulaks. The work is directed by men and women of the people. This is what we call socialism in daily life, that is what we call a free, social life." All land, its natural deposits and principal means of production are owned by the State and operated by the people on behalf of the State. There is absence of exploitation and oppression of man by man, the characteristics of a capitalist society. Socialism, thus, implies the new relations that have emerged in a socialist society. These relations are based not on individual interests, but on co-operation and mutual assistance among people free from exploitation. All are workers and everyone works for himself and for a society composed of workers. Distribution of what is produced in the USSR is carried out in accordance with the principle: From each according to his ability, to each according to his work.

Forms of Socialist Property. The Soviet Constitution recognises two forms of Socialist property—State property and Co-operative and Collective-farm property. The land, its mineral wealth, waters, forests, mills, factories, mines, rail, water and air transport, banks, communications facilities, large State organised enterprises (State farms, machine and tractor stations, and the like), and also municipal enterprises and the bulk of the dwelling houses in the cities and industrial localities, are State property.

A collective farm is a voluntary union of members to whom land, which is a national property, is allotted in perpetuity by deed papers for being exploited by the common labour of the members assisted by the large-scale machinery and necessary credit facilities provided by the State. The peasants own a farm collectively and its affairs are managed by a Committee elected by the peasant members of the farm. The Committee is responsible for farm management, allocation of work, distribution of income in kind and money, and disposal of surpluses. The peasant members receive their share on the basis of labour days worked and quality of work. The system of remuneration in the USSR is based on the principle "from each according to his ability, to each according to his work." Differences in skill or special efficiency are remunerated by grading up some jobs to a higher equivalent in 'work day' units.¹

The collective farm has some obligations to the State. It must pay necessary taxes² and deliver, at a fixed price, to the State such part of the produce as is prescribed by law. It must also pay, both in cash and kind, to the State-owned machine and tractor station for work done.

A Planned National Economy. Article 11 of the Constitution reads: "The economic life of the USSR is determined and directed by the State national economic plan, with the aim of increasing the public wealth, of steadily raising the material and cultural standards of the working people, of consolidating the independence of the USSR and strengthening its defensive capacity." Under a socialist system of State structure unified planning of the national economy is a necessity. The economy of the country is not split up in separate sectors, but is almost entirely concentrated in the State thereby constituting a unified system of many enterprises and industries which are closely connected with each other and depending on each other.

1. Arkhangelsky, N., Land of the Soviet (1962), p. 1.

2. Taxes have been abolished for factory and office workers. As per speech of Khrushchev in the Supreme Soviet on May 4, 1960.

The State national-economic plans are compiled for yearly and five yearly periods, and quarterly and monthly plans are worked out with them as a basis. In 1959, a Seven-Year Plan was adopted, but when it ended in 1965, the old practice of Five-Year Plans was reviewed. The Five-Year Plan is considered and approved by the Supreme Soviet of the USSR and the yearly plans by the Council of Ministers of the USSR. The plans for the economic development of the individual republics, territories, regions, districts and enterprises are integrated in the plans for national economic development of the USSR. The central planning bodies are the State Commission for Long-term Planning and the State Commission for Current Planning, both Commissioners operating under the USSR Council of Ministers.

The decisive factor in the fulfilment of the Plan "is the activity—productive as well as political activity—of the working people who are vitally interested in the fulfilment and overfulfilment of the national economic plans, since they are themselves masters of their State." This brings into prominence the importance of work in USSR.

Importance of Work. Article 12 of the Constitution reads: "He who does not work, neither shall he eat." In 1930, Stalin pointed out that "work is a matter of honour, a matter of glory, a matter of valour and heroism." The Constitution, too, regards work as a duty and a matter of honour for every able-bodied citizen. In capitalist countries work is a matter of private decision and choice. In the Soviet Union it is a matter of public concern. All must work and work honestly for the benefit of the society. There is no place for slackers, loafers and those who live on the labour of others. Knowledge and work have won for the Soviet Union the reputation of being advanced and highly developed country. Soviet industry today accounts for nearly 20 per cent of world industrial output, or more than what Britain, France, Italy, Canada, Japan, Belgium and the Netherlands produce together. In the course of its economic development whereas Russia in 1913 ranked fifth in the world in industrial production, the Soviet Union today holds second place, next to the United States.³

If the Constitution enjoins work on every able-bodied citizen, it also grants to him the right to guaranteed employment. Article 118 grants to citizens the right to work, that is, they are guaranteed the right to employment and payment for their work in accordance with its quantity and quality. Everyone has work in the USSR and is sure of tomorrow. There is no unemployment anywhere, either in the towns or the rural areas. It is a unique feature of the Soviet Constitution as in no other country of the world full employment is constitutionally guaranteed.

Existence of Private Property and Wage-earners. Two important results follow from the nature of Socialist property in the USSR. First, the persistence of private property and private ownership no matter in what form, secondly, the existence of the wage-earning class. Article

3. Sokolov, I., Soviet-Indian Economic Co-operation, 1955-65, p. 3.

9 of the Constitution permits individual peasants and handicraftsmen to have a small private establishment of their own, provided it is operated by their own labour and is not pursued to exploit the labour of others. The Constitution, thus, specifically provides for small scale private enterprise. Article 10 likewise recognises the right of personal property of citizens "in their incomes from work and of their savings, of their dwelling houses and subsidiary household economy; their household furniture and utensils and articles of personal use and convenience," as well as the rights of inheritance of personal property of citizens are protected by law.

A worker who wishes to build his own house is given a plot of land by the State free of charge. On application, endorsed by the Trade Union and the management of his place of work, the State Bank grants a loan of 5,000 to 10,000 roubles, payable over five to ten years on easy terms. Interest is charged at the low rate of 2 per cent per annum. In addition, the State provides building materials and free technical advice.

It is, however, against Soviet Law to derive unearned income from one's savings or other personal property. Speculation, usury, etc., are criminal offences punishable by law. A citizen has the right to bequeath his personal property, i.e., savings from work, house, personal effects, copyrights and patents.

The number of wage and salaried workers is increasing all the time. At the end of 1950 the national economy of the USSR counted 8,300,000 more workers than at the end of 1940. Another 8,000,000 were added during the Fifth Five-Year Plan period, bringing the total by the close of 1955 to 47,900,000 exclusive of members of producers' co-operatives, who numbered 1,800,000 in 1955. In 1967, there were 80 million factory and office workers, almost 27 million collective farmers, millions of teachers, scientists, physicians and surgeons and in the cultural field.⁴

The wage-system in the USSR is based on the Socialist principle, "from each according to his ability, to each according to his work." In addition to the wages, each worker receives from the State a number of allowances and other benefits, e.g., allowances and benefits from State Social Insurance Funds, pay for holidays, money grants to mothers of large families and unmarried mothers, tuition at State expense in all educational establishments, free medical service, premiums and benefits of many kinds, etc. In pursuance of the resolution of the Central Committee every enterprise is now committed to working to make a profit and establish a material incentives fund for its employees. Speaking to the representatives of the working people of the Frunze constituency of Moscow, Alexie Kosygin, Chairman of the Council of Ministers, observed on March 6, 1967, "The economic reform will be introduced with persistency, systematically and consistently so that the system of new economic relations would gradually spread to the entire national economy. The new system of planning opens great vistas for the initiative of local party and government organs, executive and collectives of all enterprises without exception. The task is to support and encourage in every way this initiative and bring into play not only the material but also the moral stimuli as well as the great organisational force—the movement of socialist emulation.”⁵ The Soviet Government’s policy of complete reorganization of industry and agriculture involves the abandonment of some hitherto sacred Communist principles.

4. Speech by Leonid Brezhnev, March 10, 1967. Along Leninist Line, Soviet Review, March 18, 1967, p. 16.

Inequality of Income. The principle “from each according to his ability, to each according to his work” recognises presence of inequality of income. The inequality of income in the USSR is, undoubtedly, less pronounced than in the capitalist countries. It is, at the same time, not negligible. In 1950, the monthly pay of a skilled worker averaged about 900 roubles while Directors and Managers received 9,000 to 16,000 roubles a month. The inequalities in money incomes have been supplemented by other privileges such as better housing facilities, the use of a car, and many other luxuries enjoyed by officials in receipt of higher salaries and the incentives now the reorganization schemes offer. These privileges are regarded as one of the prerequisites of the position of responsible workers. The most numerous and significant groups that come under this category are the Managers and government officials.

This is a complete departure from the original programme of the Revolution. The Bolsheviks had thrived on the principle of equal wages regardless of the quantity and quality of work. Lenin unequivocally declared on the eve of the “October” Revolution that the administrator was no longer to receive more than the skilled workman. This principle was followed to a certain extent in the period of War Communism. In the period of N.E.P. the differentiation in remuneration assumed wider application. When the First Five-Year Plan came in there was a positive drive against the principle of “equalised wage” and Stalin denounced it as a “vulgarised conception of Socialism.” It was another feather in the cap of Stalin.

Not a Classless Society. The liquidation of the capitalist system of economy does not mean that a classless society has been created there. The society in the USSR consists of workers, peasants, and intelligentsia. By change in the class structure Stalin meant elimination of antagonism which is the sine qua non of exploitation. While reporting on the Draft Constitution in 1936, Stalin declared, “...The class structure of our society has also changed... Thus, all the exploiting classes have now been eliminated. There remains the intelligentsia.” There remains the peasant class. There remains the intelligentsia.” All of them are “toilers” and hence there is no antagonism between them. They belong to different but friendly classes, although it is admitted officially that the working class is the foremost and the leading class. Really the idea of a class society in the USSR was perpetuated by N. Khrushchev’s speech in the Supreme Soviet on May 4, 1960 that taxes were to be abolished for factory and office workers. The announcement of Khrushchev was characterised as a message of “springtime uplift and joy.”⁶

The importance and the privileges which the higher levels of the intelligentsia enjoy raises the question whether they may be a new, and

5. Ibid., p. 12.

6. As reported in the Hindustan Times, New Delhi, May 6, 1960, p. 1.

perhaps self-perpetuating elite. There is some support about it and it comes from the educational regulations introduced in 1940 and the Congress Directives on the Sixth Five-Year Plan. Under the educational regulations of 1940 children of skilled workmen and of the intelligentsia can easily secure those opportunities for education which are essential for higher posts. The decision on education, announced at the 20th Congress by N. Khrushchev, is the Government's intention to build a number of "boarding schools" of top-level standard. The purpose of these schools, according to Khrushchev, is to produce the "builders of a new society, persons of great heart and high ideals, who are selflessly serving the people." These schools become elite institutions and the students admitted in them acquire a preferential status and consequently help to create another class in a classless State.

SOVIET FEDERALISM

On the side of the governmental organisation, USSR is a federation with fifteen constituent Republics. The Union was formed on the basis of voluntary association of the Soviet Socialist Republics all enjoying equal rights. Each Union Republic has its own Constitution and it exercises its authority through its own organs of "State power and State administration, which exercise legislative, executive and administrative authority on its territory." Its territory cannot be altered except with its consent. There is a specified division of powers and the subjects assigned to the Central Government are enumerated in Article 14. Residuary powers rest with the Constituent Republics and the Constitution guarantees the protection of their sovereign rights, freedom and independence.

The jurisdiction of the USSR extends to:

- (a) Representation of the USSR in international relations, conclusion, ratification, and denunciation of treaties of the USSR with other States, establishment of general procedure governing the relations of Union Republics with foreign States;
- (b) Questions of war and peace;
- (c) Admission of new Republics into the USSR;
- (d) Control over the observance of the Constitution of the USSR, and ensuring conformity of the Constitution of the Union Republics with the Constitution of the USSR;
- (e) Confirmation of alterations of boundaries between Union Republics;
- (f) Confirmation of the formation of new Territories and Regions and also of new Autonomous Republics and Autonomous Regions within Union Republics;
- (g) Organisation of the defence of the USSR, direction of all the Armed Forces of the USSR, the establishment of the directing principles of the organisation of military formation of the Union Republics;
- (h) Foreign trade on the basis of State monopoly;
- (i) Safeguarding the security of the State;

- (j) Establishment of the national-economic plans of the USSR;
- (k) Approval of the single State budget of the USSR as well as of the taxes and revenues which go to the All-Union Republican and the local budget;
- (l) Administration of the banks, industrial and agricultural establishments and enterprises and trading enterprises of All-Union importance;
- (m) Administration of transport and communications;
- (n) Direction of the monetary and credit system;
- (o) Organisation of State insurance;
- (p) Raising and granting of loans;
- (q) Establishment of the basic principles for the use of land as well as for the use of natural deposits, forests and waters;
- (r) Establishment of the basic principles in the sphere of education and public health;
- (s) Organisation of a uniform system of national economic statistics;
- (t) Establishment of the principle of labour legislation;
- (u) Legislation on the judicial system and judicial procedure, criminal and civil codes;
- (v) Laws on citizenship of the Union; laws on the rights of foreigners;
- (w) Issuing of All-Union acts of amnesty.

Some Features of Soviet Federalism. All these are the features of a federal polity and bear a striking resemblance to other federations. There are, however, certain significant peculiarities which are incompatible with the basic federal principles and consequently give to the Soviet federation a distinct character of its own. "The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," writes Dr. Finer, "pretends to be a 'multinational' State or Federal union. In reality, it is a highly unitary State, tending strongly to obliterate the national features of its national minorities after having liquidated their independent government and economy." There is not a fair statement, though there is much truth in what Professor Wheare says that though the Constitution of the Soviet Union is "quasi-federal," but it is not "a working example of a Federal Government."⁸

(i) The USSR is a multinational State and there are 109 nationalities plus 11 small national groups related to other nationalities. All of them differ from each other in language, customs, history, and their level of culture. The Bolshevik Party was originally a staunch advocate of the principle of self-determination, but political expediency demanded that they should be banded together in a federal polity. In fact, the authors of the first Soviet Constitution of 1918 had conceived of establishing a world federation consisting of diverse nations and nationalities and scattered territories welded in the Soviet system of a socialist organisation. The association of all such units was to be free and voluntary with the option to secede. This political concession continued to be retained in the subsequent Constitutions, although the possibilities of a world revolution and the option to secede had become obsolete with Stalin's theory of "socialism in a single country" having been fully entrenched.

7. Governments of Greater European Powers, op. cit., p. 817.

8. Wheare, K.C., Federal Government, pp. 27-28.

The Stalin Constitution, accordingly, possesses the unique feature of giving to the Soviet people full and free opportunity to develop their culture and to determine for themselves their political future. The right of self-determination is unprecedented in the history of federalism. The aim of a federation is to produce a unified nation. Federation, in the words of Professor Dicey, is a "political contrivance intended to reconcile national unity with the maintenance of State rights," that is, the desire for national unity and determination of each individual unit to maintain its identity and independence. When the different "nations and nationalities" composing the Union are given the right to self-determination, it is sure to destroy the unity of the country and negate the aim of a federation. But the right to self-determination is only a constitutional provision and there is no sanctity about it. Stalin himself declared that "There are instances when the right of self-determination comes into conflict with another, higher right—the right of the working class...to fortify its power." Even Lenin characterised federalism as a step towards "the most solid unification of the different nationalities into a single, democratic centralized Soviet State." All attempts to secede have been, therefore, ruthlessly suppressed and today this right has only an ideological appeal. Many of those who were charged with treason and counter-revolutions in the purges of 1937-38 were accused of working to dismember the Soviet State. The word "Union" signifies "that the peoples inhabiting the USSR have voluntarily united into a State and have agreed among themselves that they will live together in peace and work together to build a happy new life for themselves."⁹

(ii) The Constitution is supreme in a federal polity and the constitutional law carries with it a special sanctity and all other kinds of law are subordinate to the fundamental law. In the USSR the concept of constitutionalism is entirely different. Vyshinsky maintains that "the dictatorship of the proletariat is authority unlimited by any statutes whatever." It means that it is not the Constitution which prescribes the course of the dictatorship of the proletariat, but it is the dictatorship of the proletariat which prescribes the legal forms of conduct of which the Constitution is the foremost but by no means the only expression. The Soviet Constitution is, thus, the tool of the dictatorship of the proletariat. It is limited and controlled by it; the Constitution neither limits nor controls the dictatorship of the proletariat. Stalin stated a simple truth when he said in 1936, that the Constitution is an expression of what has been achieved. It implies that further changes which take place in the USSR will be recorded therein and the Constitution cannot prevent those changes to occur. There is no question of constitutionality or otherwise and the acts of government cannot be questioned in a court of law. The Constitution stands changed whenever the acts of government and conditions demand it. "The forms of our State will again change in conformity with the changes in the situation at home and abroad," said Stalin. Khrushchev planned for a new Constitution because he thought that the Stalin Constitution was not suited to meet the new foreign policy demands of the Soviet Union. But Molotov put it more bluntly when he said that the Communist Party was always "subordinating the forms of the State structure to fundamental interests of socialism and to the task of strengthening the proletarian dictatorship." The procedure for amending the Constitution is so simple and easy that whenever the government desires it can record the changes in the Constitution; only a two-thirds majority in each Chamber of the Supreme Soviet is needed. And as party discipline and national solidarity demand unanimity of votes there is never any doubt that amendments proposed by Government will not be adopted.

9. Land of Soviets, op. cit., p. 1.

(iii) There is a federation within a federation in Soviet Russia. The Union Republics are divided into Autonomous Republics, Autonomous Regions and National Areas. All of them are represented in the Soviet of Nationalities at the rate of 25 Deputies for each Union Republic, 11 for each Autonomous Republic, 5 for each Autonomous Region and one for each National Area. But the status of all these units of the federation is not permanently fixed. As the basis of Soviet federalism is a Union of nationalities rather than territorial units, it is possible for a National Area to be promoted to an Autonomous Region or an Autonomous Region to an Autonomous Republic and so on subject to the fulfilment of prescribed conditions. Moldavia was originally established as a National Area. It was first promoted to an Autonomous Region and finally to a Union Republic.

(iv) The "Sovereign rights" of the Union Republics which the Constitution guarantees to protect are hedged by significant limitations and the administration of the USSR becomes in the last resort highly centralised, though some pretence towards decentralisation is claimed to be made now. The simple provisions of the Constitution confer upon the Union Government vast powers not only to control and regulate but also directly to administer the whole economic system of the country. Article 11 clearly states that the economic life of the USSR "is determined and directed by the State national economic plan, with the aim of increasing the public wealth, of steadily raising the material and cultural standards of the working people, of consolidating the independence of the USSR and strengthening its defensive capacity." Economic plans in the USSR embrace every aspect of the country life, and, thus, offer unlimited opportunities to the Union authorities for interference even in the day-to-day administration of the Republics. In addition, the Union Government has a monopoly of financial powers. Article 14 assigns to it "Approval of the single State budget of the USSR, as well as of the taxes and revenues which go to the All-Union, Republican and local budgets." In simple words, the finances of the Soviet Republics are under the complete control of the Central Government. And since power over a man's purse traditionally is power over his will, the autonomy of the federal areas is, in practice, severely limited.

(v) The jurisdiction of the Union Government is specified in Article 14. Outside these limits each Republic exercises authority independently.

But the independent authority of the Republic is qualified by the provisions of Article 20 which reads: "In the event of discrepancy between the law of the Union Republic and an All-Union law, the All-Union law prevails." This is the usual feature in every federation, but add to it the power of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet to annul decisions and orders of the Council of Ministers of the Union Republics in case they do not conform to laws. The Soviet Council of Ministers is, therefore, the ultimate authority to determine whether the decisions and orders of the Council of Ministers of the constituent Republics should stand or they may be annulled. This is a veto which the Constitution confers on the Union Government and it is a complete departure from the theory and practice of federalism. This is, indeed, the way of a unitary government.

(vi) The peculiar centralistic position is that created by the institution of the Procurator-General of the USSR who supervises the strict execution of laws throughout the entire territory of the USSR. This means that the purpose of establishing the office of the Procurator-General is to exercise supervisory powers in order to ensure the correct application and strict execution of the Soviet laws by all ministries and other agencies subordinate to them as well as by all officials and citizens of the USSR. The powers of the Procurator-General are so extensive, his authority so pervasive and his secret organisation so ubiquitous that he constitutes an integral organ of the State power having no parallel in any federal scheme of government.

(vii) The Stalin Constitution distinguishes between the All-Union and Union Republican Ministries. The All-Union Ministries exercise their jurisdiction through the entire territory of the USSR, while the Union Republican Ministries direct the branches of the State administration entrusted to them through corresponding Ministries of the Union Republics. It means that the power of the Central Government reigns supreme in the spheres of both the All-Union and the Union Republican Ministries. And many Ministries which were previously Union Republican Ministries have since become All-Union Ministries thereby making the Republican governments entirely dependent upon the Union Government.

(viii) The Constitution-amending power solely rests with the Supreme Soviet. The constituent Republics have neither any initiative nor any power to ratify. The simple process for amending the Constitution and the centralist position of the Communist Party do not leave any margin for doubt that the policy of the Central Government will not be carried out. In fact, it is the Politburo of the Party which determines the policy of the Government.

(ix) Most important of all, however, is the all-pervasive position of the Communist Party, which is strictly speaking centralist. Since all policy emanates from the Communist Party, it matters little whether there exists a federal form of government or not. The Politburo of the Communist Party determines the policy of the USSR, as a whole, and that policy is carried by the authorities, Central or Republics.

Thus, the unified economy, the uniformity of political and administrative institutions, the monopoly of the Communist Party and the leading role it plays in the determination of the national policy, presence of an integrated judicial system, lack of supremacy of the Constitution and absence of judicial review are all matters which seriously depart from the theory and practice of federalism. A federal structure, governed by a unitary, monolithic party provides merely a table of organisation of the distribution of work to be done.

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS AND DUTIES

Nature of Rights. There is a separate Chapter in the Constitution on Fundamental Rights and Duties of Citizens and it is one of the most extraordinary Bill of Rights known to history. Five things in particular distinguish the Soviet Bill of Rights from similar provisions in other countries.

(1) According to the Soviet concept of rights, civil rights are secondary to social and economic rights. Soviet leaders had always asserted that the bourgeois democracy is a sham and an illusion as civil rights are meaningless without economic rights. Stalin, while elaborating this point, said, "What can be the 'personal freedom' of an unemployed person who goes hungry and finds no use for his toil? Only where exploitation is annihilated, where there is no oppression of some by others, no unemployment, no beggary, and no trembling for fear that a man may on the morrow lose his work, his habitation, his bread—only there is true freedom found." Economic rights, thus, must precede civil rights as real freedom is possible only when there is complete economic security and hunger, starvation and destitution do not stare man at every step. The Chapter on Fundamental Rights and Duties of Citizens in the Stalin Constitution, accordingly, opens with the right to work and continues with the right to rest and leisure, the right to maintenance in old age and also in case of sickness or loss of capacity to work.

(2) Civil rights in the USSR must be "in conformity with the interests of the working people, and in order to strengthen the socialist system." This provision in Article 125 has two implications: (i) that the freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly, including the holding of mass meetings, and freedom of speech, processions and demonstrations must be in conformity with the interests of the working people, and (ii) that they must be exercised in a manner which should be consistent with and in accordance to the socialist way of life thereby strengthening the socialist system of society. It means that no one in the USSR is constitutionally permitted to meet, to say, and to write anything which is deemed antagonistic to the interests of the workers, and the socialist society. Vyshinsky made this point clear in his book, The Law of Soviet State. He writes, "In our State, naturally there is, and can be no place for freedom of speech, press and so on for the foes of Socialism. Every sort of attempt on their part to utilise to the detriment of the state—that is to say, to the deriment of all the toilers—these freedoms granted to the toilers must be classified as counter-revolutionary crime to which Article 58, Paragraph 10, or one of the corresponding Articles of the Criminal Code is applicable."

A similar formula is used in introducing Article 126, the right to unite in public organisations—trade unions, “co-operative associations, youth organisations, sports and defence organisations, cultural, technical and scientific societies. But in continuation of this provision Article 126 further reads, “and the most active and politically most conscious citizens in the ranks of the working-class and other sections of the working people unite in the ranks of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, which is the vanguard of the working people in their struggle to strengthen and develop the socialist system and is the leading core of all organisations of the working people, both public and State.” It means that the only political organisation permitted to function in the U.S.S.R. is the Communist Party and the Communist Party is the vanguard of the working people in their struggle to strengthen and develop the socialist system. It is the leading core of all organisations to which the most active and politically most conscious citizens unite. Stalin explained at the time the Constitution was adopted that there would be no room for the organisation of rival political parties, and there exists none.

(3) The Soviet Bill of Rights emphasises all through that the interests of the individual and that of the society are not incompatible and it is only the Socialist State which amalgamates them with the interests of the collective.

(4) Another characteristic of the Soviet Bill of Rights is that it unites in one section and usually in the same articles both rights and corresponding duties and outlines the machinery through which they may be accomplished. There are no rights in the USSR without duties and the duties of Soviet citizens correspond to the rights they possess. Duties, like rights, are strictly in accordance with the Soviet view that the individual is the benefactor as well as the beneficiary of the State.

(5) Likewise, rights, especially economic rights, call for intervention on the part of the State and rendering of certain services on the part of the State. There is no concept of natural rights. All rights are, according to the Communist doctrine, the results of the economic and social order, and subordinated thereto. The nature of the duties obviously becomes clear.

Some Important Rights. (i) The Right to work is the most unique feature of the Soviet Constitution. Article 12 characterises work in the USSR as the duty and matter of honour for every able-bodied citizen, in accordance with the principle that “he who does not work, neither shall he eat.” When every citizen must work to earn his living, he must be provided with continuous and sufficient work to do. Article 118 guarantees to every citizen of the USSR the right to work, that is, the right to employment and payment for his work in accordance with his quantity and quality. The right to work is ensured by the socialist organisation of the national economy, the steady growth of the productive forces of Soviet society, the elimination of the possibility of economic crises, and the abolition of unemployment.

(ii) The Soviet citizens are guaranteed the right to rest and leisure. Article 119 of the Constitution ensures the right to rest and leisure by fixing a seven hour day for industrial office and professional workers. The working hours have now been reduced to six a day for arduous trades, five for those who work underground and to four hours in shops where conditions of work are particularly arduous. The Constitution also provides for annual vacations¹⁰ with full pay and a wide network of sanatoria, rest homes and clubs for the accommodation of the working people.¹¹

The Programme of CPSU envisaged the transition during 1961-70 to a six-hour working day with one day off a week, or to a 35-hour working week with two days off and in underground jobs and injurious trades, a five-hour working day or a 30-hour (five day) working week. During the second decade (1971-80) the transition to a still shorter working week will begin. "The Soviet Union will become the country with the shortest and the highest-paid working day. At the same time, the working people will have much leisure." Leisure, here, does not mean freedom from everything that constitutes activity. By leisure is meant the opportunity for all-round development of the abilities and talents of man. Marx and Engels "dreamed of the harmoniously developed man of Communist society, in whose life free and happy work, according to his own choice, will be combined with the all-round development of his abilities and physique, with sport and interests in science and art."¹²

(iii) Citizens of the USSR have the right to maintenance in old age and also in case of sickness or loss of capacity to work. The right is ensured by the extensive development of social insurance of workers and employees at State expense, free medical service for the working people and the provision of a wide network of health resorts for the use of the working people. Old age pensions are paid through the scheme of social insurance to male workers on reaching the age of 60 after 25 years of service, and women on reaching 55 after 20 years of service. The pension amounts to 100, 85, 75, 65, 55, 50 per cent of the monthly earnings, with those receiving low wages getting 100 per cent and those earning 1,000 roubles a month or more receiving 50 per cent. More favourable conditions have been fixed for wage and salaried workers employed underground, those engaged in unhealthy trades or working in hot shops. The minimum old age-pension is fixed at 300 roubles a month and maximum at 1,200. It does not, however, deprive the pensioners of their right to work. On the death of a pensioner, if he was the only source of family income, pensions are paid to the members of his family unable to work or underage. Workers and employees who have been permanently disabled, either as a result of an industrial accident or while discharging military duties, receive pensions varying from 50 to 100 per cent of their average earnings. Those who are partially disabled and lose their capacity to work from other causes receive pensions equivalent to one-third to two-thirds of their average earnings. In case of temporary disability 50 to 100 per cent of average earnings are paid.

From January 1, 1965, the law introducing old-age pensions for farmers has become operative. A centralised fund, set up for the purpose,

10. Some have holidays of 12 workdays, others of 25 workdays and still others of 36, depending on the kind of work they do.

11. The Soviet Union has about 4,000 holiday homes and health resort establishments.

12. Looking Into the Future, op. cit., p. 21.

is maintained by contributions from collective farms and annual state donations. This measure plus the existing system of state pensions to all employees, will mean an old-age pension coverage of all working people of the Soviet Union.

(iv) The right to education is ensured to all citizens by universal compulsory elementary education. It means all Soviet children attend school. Nowhere in the country is there a child who does not attend school. About 70 million people are now getting free education. Instruction is given in the native language of the pupils. During the Fifth Five-Year Plan period universal secondary education was put into effect in all large towns and industrial centres. During the Sixth Five-Year Plan period (1956-60) universal secondary education was put into effect everywhere. Another major measure taken is the introduction of polytechnical training in secondary schools. The aim is to acquaint school children with the theory and practice of modern industrial and agricultural production. All citizens between 17 and 35 years of age, who have completed a secondary education and passed entrance examination, are eligible for admission to schools of higher learning. Since September 1956 tuition fee is free in all higher schools. All students who do satisfactorily in their studies receive a monthly allowance throughout the course of their study.

(v) The Constitution guarantees to women equal rights with men in all spheres of economic, government, cultural, political, and other public activities. The Soviet women, accordingly, are given an equal right with men to work, payment for work, rest and leisure, social insurance and education. Article 122 also provides for the State protection of the interests of mother and child, State aid to mothers of large families¹³ and unmarried mothers, maternity leave with full pay, and the establishment of a wide network of maternity homes, nurseries and kindergartens. Female labour is forbidden, particularly in hard work or in work injurious to their health. Nursing mothers are not allowed to work at night or overtime. Special intermission at work is allowed to mothers to feed their babies. The State aid to mothers of large families and unmarried mothers resembles what Hitler and Mussolini did in their countries. Mothers in the USSR now receive State benefits upon the birth of the third and every succeeding child. The honorary title of "Mother Heroine" is conferred on mothers who have borne or raised ten or more children. The constitutional guarantee of State aid to unmarried mothers remains unparalleled in the history of mankind. Unmarried mothers in the Soviet Union can entrust their children to the State to be fully maintained at its expense. Any child entrusted to the care of the State is to be returned to the mother on her request to be brought up by her.

(vi) The Constitution guarantees to all citizens equality, irrespective of their sex, race or nationality. Article 123 strictly prohibits any direct or indirect restriction of rights of citizens and unequivocally forbids the creation of privileges for citizens belonging to any particular nationality or race. In Soviet society position is determined not by property, status, sex or national origin, but by work and ability. Pisarzhevsky writes, "All citizens, men and women alike, enjoy equal rights and the happiness of a man does not depend on the colour of his skin, the language he speaks, or the family he comes from, but on how he works, what benefits his work brings to others." If any citizen advocates "racial or national exclusiveness or hatred and contempt" he "is punishable by law." These provisions may be explained in the words of Karpinsky: "If any one in our country should conceive the idea of propagating such profoundly anti-Soviet views as that citizens of some particular nation or race possess exceptional qualities and should therefore enjoy special rights and privileges, or if any one should manifest hatred or contempt for the members of any particular nation or race, he would soon enough find himself in the prisoner's dock. Any violation of the provision in the Constitution guaranteeing the equality of all citizens is punishable in our country as a grave political offence."

13. Grants were awarded to 7,500,000 women with large families.

Equality of all Soviet citizens also means that all people are guaranteed the right to work, rest and leisure, education, material security in old age and in sickness or disablement. A Soviet citizen of any nationality, man or woman,¹⁴ is eligible for election to any organ of government, or for appointment to any government post. All citizens receive equal pay for equal work.

(vii) Article 124 provides for the freedom of conscience, the separation of the Church from the State, and the freedom of both religious and anti-religious propaganda. But the Soviet State thrives on anti-religious propaganda. No teaching of religion is permitted in Soviet schools or to young people outside the schools. Anti-religious propaganda, on the other hand, is carried on with the active support of the State. Soviet Government, it is claimed, is conducted on scientific principles. "The Soviet authorities do all in their power to promote the enlightenment of the masses. They help them in every way to acquire a knowledge of the sciences, acquaint them with the scientific explanations on the phenomena of nature and of human society, introduce them to a knowledge of the origin of the world and of man, and of the origin and significance throughout the history of man. The youth are taught in the Soviet schools the external nature of matter, the evolution of plants and animals, the changes effected in social and political systems by means of the class struggle and revolution."

(viii) The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech, press and assembly, liberty to form trade unions, co-operative associations, youth organisations, sports and defence organisations, cultural, technical and scientific societies. Street processions and demonstrations are ensured by "placing at the disposal of the working people and their organisations, printing presses, stock of paper, public buildings, the streets, communication facilities, and other material requisites for the exercise of these rights." And these freedoms must be exercised "in conformity with the interests of the working people, and in order to strengthen the Socialist system." It would appear from the logical interpretation of these provisions that the freedoms referred to above cannot be exercised if the Government refuses to place at the disposal of a group of citizens the "material requisites." Moreover, the Constitution definitely prohibits that nothing can be said or written which is against the Socialist System. Two illustrations abundantly make it clear. On June 22, 1936, ten days after the publication of the Draft Constitution, the Pravda wrote, "The cowardly bourgeois, Menshevists and counter-revolutionary press has been exterminated for ever in our Soviet country. . . . Whoever aims at overthrowing the Socialist regime and damaging the socialist property of the people is an enemy of the people. He will never receive so much as a scrap of paper in the Soviet Union or be able to cross the threshold of a single printing work in pursuit of his fell designs. He will never find a hall, a room, a corner in which to disseminate his poisonous doctrines."

14. More than 1,800,000, including more than half a million women, directly participate in government as elected deputies of the Soviets. 99.97 per cent of the entire population over 18 take part in the elections.

The Izvestia, in its issue of August 6, 1936, wrote, "We can have no meetings of fools; and we can certainly have no meetings of criminals, monarchists, Menshevists, Social Revolutionaries and the like." And what happened to those who differed or expressed opinion against the "party line"? This can be well illustrated if we take only the ministerial ranks. Tuchachevsky of the Ministry of National Defence was sentenced to death in March 1937. Egorov, of the same Ministry, met the same fate in October of the same year. Yegov, Minister of the Interior, was executed, in November 1937, to make way for Beria and Beria's luck, too, was not different. Then followed Grinko, Tehubar, Tehernov, Aikhe, and scores of others not well known.

(ix) Citizens are guaranteed inviolability of person, home, and privacy and correspondence. No one may be arrested except by decision of a court or with the sanction of the procurator.

(x) The Constitution grants the right of asylum to foreign citizens persecuted for defending the interests of the working people, or for scientific activities, or for struggling for national liberation. It has been rightly remarked that Moscow is, indeed, the heaven of notable revolutionaries.

(xi) The right to private property is unequivocally conceded by the Stalin Constitution. Though it does not find a specific mention in the Chapter on the "Fundamental Rights and Duties of Citizens," yet the question of ownership of property is considered so important that almost the whole of the first Chapter of the Stalin Constitution is devoted to it. The Constitution recognises three forms of property in the Soviet Union. First, State property, and what it constitutes is covered by Article 6. Secondly, co-operative and collective-farm property and Articles 7 and 8 deal with this category of property. Finally, the personal property. Article 10 ensures to citizens the right to personal property in their incomes and savings from work, in their dwelling houses and subsidiary home enterprises, in articles of domestic economy and use and articles of personal use and convenience, as well as the rights of citizens to inherit personal property. Personal property embraces income from labour, savings deposited in State banks or invested in Government Bonds, dwelling houses occupied by their owners, motor cars maintained for personal use, tools, furnishings, and other personal belongings.

It follows that the Soviet people can acquire a large amount of property, but it must be solely for their own use. No one is permitted to possess property which is to "be used in the exploitation of others."

Fundamental Duties. The Stalin Constitution imposes upon the Soviet people definite duties to society and to the State. There are no rights in the USSR, as said before, without duties and the duties of Soviet citizens correspond to the rights they possess. Here are some of the duties which appear to be specially significant with the vital interests of the working people.

(1) Observance of Soviet Constitution and Law. The first commandment to the Soviet citizen is to faithfully abide by the Constitution of the Soviet Union and the Soviet laws. Strict observance of the Constitution and Soviet laws, it is enjoined, ensure the prosperity and might of the USSR and hence the personal welfare of Soviet citizens. It follows that the welfare of the people is obtained from the prosperity and might of the Soviet State. "There neither is nor should be," said Stalin, "an irreconcilable contrast between the individual and the collective.... There should be none for as much as collectivism-socialism does not deny individual interests. It amalgamates them with the interests of the collective." The argument advanced is, of course, simple, but it savours of what Hitler and Mussolini used to say to their people. "The Soviet Socialist State," writes Karpinsky, "represents, expresses and defends the interests of the whole people. The interests of the Soviet State, of Soviet Society, and the interests of the people coincide. They are identical, inseparable."

(2) To maintain labour discipline. A socialist society cannot achieve the desired results unless labour is imbued with socialist ideas and a socialist mind. The workers must exhibit a sense of duty in their work. Each one should work diligently for the common benefit. "Without such free, conscious discipline, Socialist emulation aiming at the fulfilment and overfulfilment of production quotas in the shortest period of time would be impossible." Socialist emulation in the USSR is the mass movement of the working people for high productivity of labour, for the fulfilment and overfulfilment of production plans throughout the national economy. It is one of the main forces that ensured the successful fulfilment of the pre and post-war plans for the development of the national economy of the USSR. "Socialist emulation is one more illustration," writes the author of USSR 100 Questions and Answers, "of the fundamental principle that in the Soviet Union there can be no contradiction between personal interests and the state."¹⁵

Work, therefore, is a duty and a matter of honour for every able-bodied citizen. "He who does not work, neither shall he eat" is the constitutional maxim and an integral part of the labour discipline code in the USSR. Payment for work in accordance with the quantity and quality of work done by each is another important rule of labour discipline, for it increases the sense of responsibility of the workers and encourages them to work conscientiously.

(3) Honesty to perform Public Duties. Soviet citizens must be keenly conscious of their duties to the State and to society. The public duty of a Soviet citizen demands honest compliance with the laws of the Soviet State. It is enjoined that performance of public duty should be regarded as "something broader than the direct mandates of law" and a public duty comprises all that "may be necessary and useful to consolidate and develop socialist society that may advance the welfare of the land of Soviets." Public duties in the USSR mean that every worker should fulfil the accepted standards of output, to promote the common welfare, give precedence to public interests over private interests, and combat whatever is antagonistic and harmful to the socialist society.

15. Pamphlet issued by the Information Department of the Embassy of the USSR in India, p. 93.

(4) Respect for the Rules of Socialist Intercourse. Every society has its own Rules of Conduct, and violation of these rules is regarded a social sin. The rules of the socialist society, however, are recorded in the Constitution and they govern the conduct of Soviet citizens in relation to society and to each other. These rules of Socialist intercourse refer to the duty to work, the prohibition of one man to exploit another, the inviolability of public, Socialist property, etc. The Constitution of the USSR, Kalinin said, is "the fundamental rule of social intercourse under Socialism." Violation of these rules is crime against the State and society, because socialist society demands of its members that in their "whole conduct they be governed above all by the interests of society, of the State."

(5) Safeguarding Public, Socialist Property. "It is the duty of every citizen of the USSR," says Article 131 of the Constitution, "to safeguard and fortify public socialist property as the sacred and inviolable foundation of the Soviet system, as the source of wealth and might of the country, as the source of the prosperity and culture of all the working people." It is further provided that "Persons committing offences against public, Socialist property are enemies of the people." The socialist property is the basis of the Soviet system of the State and society and on its proper protection depends the national welfare and might of the USSR. To safeguard and fortify public, socialist property means "managing State, co-operative and collective-farm enterprises economically, assiduously keeping strict and audited accounts of public property, of the distribution of socially-owned consumer goods, and of all public money, every kopek of it." It further means to steadily increase the productivity of labour, by scrupulous exercise of conscious labour discipline, by reduction in the costs of production and by improvement in the quality of the output. Finally, to safeguard and fortify public, socialist property means to extend and augment the Soviet Socialist economy. The decree of May 1961, now prescribes death penalty for large-scale embezzlers of Government property.

(6) Universal Military Service. Universal military service is the Soviet law and the Constitution regards military service in the Armed Forces as "an honourable duty of the citizens of the USSR." Lenin said, "In order to defend the power of the workers and peasants from the marauders, that is, from the landlords and capitalists, we need a powerful Red Army." What Lenin said his successors translated into a constitutional reality. The universal military service law was adopted on September 1, 1939. It provides that all male Soviet citizens, without any distinction of nationality, race, religion, education, social origin and status must serve in the armed forces of the Soviet Union. The Ministry of the Armed Forces of the USSR is also authorised to enrol and accept, and in wartime to call up for auxiliary and special service, women who are qualified in medical and veterinary sciences, or have received special technical training.

All male able-bodied citizens are called up for service at the age of 19 and those who have completed their secondary education at the age of 18. The period of active service is fixed at two to four years. Those who complete their active service are placed in the reserve until they reach the age of 50. The reasons for universal military service and its being characterised as an honourable duty of Soviet citizens are inter alia: "...And indeed, what duty can be more honourable than to defend with arms in hand our great Soviet country, the first socialist State of workers and peasants in the world, the hope, the bulwark of toiling humanity everywhere on the globe in its struggle for emancipation?"

(7) Defence of the Country. If military service is an honourable duty of the citizens, defence of the country is their sacred duty. Treason to Fatherland is punishable with all the severity of the law as the most heinous of crimes and is punishable with death. Treason also includes violation of the oath of allegiance, desertion from the army, impairing the military power of the State, espionage, etc. Capital punishment in peace time was abolished by a decree of the Presidium, dated May 26, 1947. But it amended that decree on January 13, 1950 and permitted the application of capital punishment as the supreme penalty in the case of traitors, spies and wreckers.

SOME OTHER FEATURES OF THE CONSTITUTION

Separation of Powers. Dictatorship of the proletariat depends upon the unity and oneness of power and the Constitution apparently gives this power to the people, but in the last resort it really belongs to the Politburo of the Communist Party. Vyshinsky, accordingly, writes, "... From top to bottom the Soviet social order is penetrated by the single general spirit of the oneness of the authority of the toilers. The programme of the All-Union Communist Party (of Bolsheviks) rejects the bourgeois principle of the separation of powers."¹⁶ Soviet writers argue that Montesquieu developed his theory as a means of limiting the power of the King of France while in Soviet Russia there is no class conflict and hence there is no need to limit one branch of government by another. All organs of government have to work in the same interest. In the Constitution of 1918 and 1924 there was, therefore, no separation of powers and all functions of the Government were concentrated in the All-Union Congress of the Soviet and the agencies it appointed. The Stalin Constitution, too, confers all power on the working people of town and country as represented by the Soviet of Working People's Deputies. But it is based on the principle of separation of functions in the sense that distinct organs of Government have their own functions to perform. In fact, there was so much confusion of functions that Stalin in 1936 said, "It is time we put an end to situation in which not one but a number of bodies legislate." Article 32 of the Stalin Constitution, accordingly, gives exclusive legislative power of the USSR to the Supreme Soviet of the USSR, the Council of Ministers is limited to action as the executive and administrative organ of State authority¹⁷ and Justice is administered by the Supreme Court.¹⁸

16. The Law of the Soviet State, p. 318.

But in spite of this pretence of Separation of Powers, there is no separation of powers in the Soviet Union. This will be apparent from paragraph 5 of the Party Programme which says, "The Soviet Government, guaranteeing to the working masses incomparably more opportunity to vote and recall their delegates in the most easy and accessible manner, than they possessed under bourgeois democracy and parliamentarianism, at the same time abolishes all the negative features of parliamentarianism, especially the separation of legislative and executive powers, the isolation of the representative institutions from the masses, etc." The Judiciary is under the control of the Presidium and the Ministry of the Interior and Procurator-General. The interpretation of the laws and decrees, which in other countries is vested in the Judiciary, is vested in the Presidium in the USSR.

Plural Executive. No single head of the State has ever been provided by Soviet constitutional law. Some of the functions of the titular head of the State, such as receiving of ambassadors, are performed by the Chairman of the Presidium. But these are only formal functions. There is no President of the USSR and Stalin called the Presidium as the "collegial Presidium of the USSR."

The One-Party System. The Soviet system permits of only one party. Nothing in the law established the Communist Party as the only legal political party until the enactment of the Constitution of 1936. Now the Communist Party has a constitutional sanction behind it. It is the leading and directing force in the Soviet Union and the Constitution prescribes that it is "the vanguard of the working people in their struggle to strengthen and develop the socialist system." The Constitution also records that it "is the leading core of all organisations of the working people, both public and State" and it is available to the "most active and politically conscious citizens in the ranks of the working class and other sections of the working people." As the Constitution explicitly omits the right to form other political parties, it has been taken to establish the legal monopoly of the Communist Party.

The Masses and Legislation. The Constitution provides for a nationwide poll or referendum on the initiative of the Presidium or on the demand of one of the Union Republics. In this way, the people of the USSR are given the right, in certain cases, to adopt or reject legislative measure involving important issues. But since the Stalin Constitution became operative no measure has so far been submitted to a referendum.

Soviet Judiciary. Judiciary in the USSR has certain peculiar features as distinguished from other countries. This aspect will be examined in one of the following Chapters. It is sufficient to mention here that Soviet

17. Article 64.

18. Article 102.

Courts are organs of the Soviet Socialist State. Their functions are: (1) to fight the enemies of the Soviet Government, and (2) to fight for the consolidation of the new Soviet system, and "to firmly anchor the new socialist discipline among the working people." The functions of the Soviet Courts are defined in the Law adopted by the Supreme Soviet in August 1938.

Capital Punishment only for Political Offences. In the Soviet Union capital punishment was abolished in peace time by a decree of the Presidium in May 1947. But it was amended on January 13, 1950 so as to permit the application of capital punishment in the case of traitors, spies and wreckers. A decree of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of May 6, 1961 introduced the death penalty for large-scale embezzlers of Government property.

CHAPTER IV

GOVERNMENT AT THE CENTRE

THE SUPREME SOVIET

The Supreme Soviet. The highest organ of the State power is the Supreme Soviet of the USSR¹ which exercises all the powers vested in the Central Government by Article 14, except those specifically delegated by the Constitution to other organs of the Union.² The legislative power "is exercised exclusively by the Supreme Soviet,"³ although the rejection of the theory of the Separation of Powers and its outright condemnation as the bourgeois principle, makes the position of the Supreme Soviet rather confusing.

Bicameral Legislature. The Supreme Soviet is bicameral and consists of the Soviet of the Union, and the Soviet of Nationalities. The Soviet of the Union is elected by the citizens of the USSR by electoral districts on the basis of one Deputy for every 300,000 of population.⁴ The Soviet of Nationalities is elected by citizens voting by component parts. Each of the 15 Union Republics is represented by 25 Deputies, regardless of its size or the number of its citizens. Each Autonomous Republic is represented by 11 Deputies, each Autonomous Region by 5 Deputies and each National Area by one Deputy.⁵ In the elections of 1966 to the Supreme Soviet, there were elected 720 Deputies to the Soviet of the Union and 640 to the Soviet of Nationalities. Terms of Deputies are four years.

The Soviet of the Union is a representative Chamber of all the Soviet people and it represents the nation as a whole. It does not represent either nationality or some special interest. But the USSR is a multi-national State and all those nationalities have their special interests which require special representation. The Soviet of Nationalities, accordingly, represents the special interests of the Soviet people who have organised national State structures of their own. "Such a structure of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR," maintained Stalin, "assures the fullest and most accurate expression of the interests of all the peoples of our country in the highest organ of the State power. Such a structure of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR facilitates the consolidation of fraternal co-operation and strengthens the bond of friendship between all the Soviet people."

Bicameralism is, no doubt, a prerequisite of a federal form of govern-

-
1. Article 30.
 2. Article 31.
 3. Article 33.
 4. Article 34.
 5. Article 35.

ment, but the motives which necessitate organization of the legislature into two Chambers in a federation are not the same which prompted the creation of bicameralism in the USSR. Soviet Russia is a huge country with a huge population and on this vast territory reside, in addition to Russians, about one hundred and twenty nations, nationalities and ethnal groups. Fifteen of these peoples form their own sovereign states—Union Republics. Each of them has its own Constitution, its own legislative organ and its own executive and administrative organ and judiciary. These organs of Union Republics exercise sovereign state power on their territories on all matters except those which were assigned voluntarily to the jurisdiction of the USSR. Many nationalities, e.g., the Tatars, Bashkirs, Ossetians, Adjarians, Yakuts, Nenets, form autonomous republics, autonomous regions or national areas. It is, therefore, natural that, besides the common interests, each of the nationalities united in the Soviet State has its own requirements connected with the specific nature of its economy, and its culture and mode of life, evolved in the course of history. It is for this reason that Soviet Parliament consists of two Chambers having equal rights. One of these, the Soviet of the Union, is the supreme organ representing the common interests of all citizens, irrespective of their nationality. The other Chamber, the Soviet of Nationalities, is the supreme organ called upon to reflect the specific interests ensuing from the national characteristics of the population. "One cannot govern," maintained Stalin, "without having before us here, in Moscow, in the supreme organ, emissaries of these nationalities."

The Constitution makes no distinction between one Chamber and the other. It gives to both the Chambers equal rights. Their powers and functions are identical and they are elected for a term of four years. Even the Chambers are convened and hold their sessions simultaneously. The Deputies to both the Soviets are elected on the basis of universal, equal, and direct suffrage by secret ballot. Moreover, the Constitution makes no difference between a Money Bill and a legislative measure, and a Bill becomes law if passed by both Chambers by a simple majority vote in each. The nomenclature as Upper and Lower Chamber does not exist in the USSR. In fact, equality between the Soviet of Nationalities and the Soviet of the Union has been so much emphasised that both the Chambers have been made approximately equal in size.

Composition and Organisation. Both the Soviets are elected for a term of four years on the basis of universal, equal, and direct suffrage by secret ballot. All citizens of the USSR who have reached the age of eighteen, except the insane, and persons condemned by a court and deprived of electoral rights, are entitled to elect Deputies. Any Soviet citizen who is 23 years of age may be elected a member of either of the two Soviets. The Soviet of the Union and the Soviet of Nationalities are approximately equal in size. In the elections of 1966 the former had 720 Deputies and the latter 640. As stated earlier, the Soviet of the Union serves to represent the Union as a whole on the basis of one Deputy for every 300,000 citizens. The Soviet of Nationalities represents the various national groups on the basis of 25 Deputies for each Union Republic, 11 Deputies for each Autonomous Republic, 5 Deputies from each Autonomous Region and one Deputy from each National Area.

The composition of the Supreme Soviet is claimed to be most democratic as it is representative of all sections of the people,—workers, peasants, intelligentsia, men of letters, army commanders, and men and women of all ages and belonging to different nationalities of the Soviet Union. The election of 1954 revealed that out of 708 Deputies, 188 were workers, 114 peasants, and 406 were scientific workers, people engaged in the field of culture and art, technical intelligentsia and public officials. One hundred and seventy of the Deputies were women. Out of 639 Deputies elected to the Soviet of Nationalities, 130 were workers, 106 peasants, and 403 public figures and intelligentsia; 178 among the Deputies were women. The composition of the Supreme Soviet, therefore, ensures the fullest and all-round expression of the interests of all kinds of people and is claimed to be the real barometer of public opinion.

The Supreme Soviet is a single-party legislature and four-fifths of the Deputies are the nominees of the Communist Party. The rest are “non-party men.” But it is a misnomer to designate them non-party men. The Constitution permits the existence of only one party and the Communist Party is acclaimed as “the vanguard of the working people in their struggle to strengthen and develop the socialist system.” It is further held to be “the leading core of all organizations of the working people, both public and State.” The Communist Party is also the only political party referred to in Article 141 as having the right to participate in elections. Other organizations listed in the same Article and entitled to nominate their candidates for elections are “societies of the working people.” Non-party Deputies are the nominees of these organizations. But all of them, whether nominees of the Communist Party or nominees of the trade unions, co-operatives, youth organizations, and cultural societies, must be Communists by faith, for it is a treason in the USSR to possess any other political views or sympathies.

Organization and Sessions of the Supreme Soviet. When new elections are over both the Soviets meet. By an established tradition, it is opened by the oldest Deputy. He delivers the opening address and directs the elections of a Chairman and Vice-Chairman of the Chamber. At the first session of the Supreme Soviet, each Chamber also elects a Credentials Committee, consisting of a Chairman and members. The Credential Committee of each Chamber verifies the credentials of the Deputies elected to that Chamber.

All the following sessions are opened by the Chairmen of the Chambers. They approve the reporters and co-reporters on the questions on the agenda, direct the sitting of the Chambers and preside at meetings of their respective Soviets and see to the orderly conduct of business and proceeding. In case of joint sittings the Chairman of the Soviet of the Union and the Chairman of the Soviet of Nationalities preside alternately.

The Presidium of the Supreme Soviet convenes both the Soviets in sessions simultaneously twice a year. The Presidium may also convene extraordinary sessions either at its own discretion or on the demand of one of the Union Republics. Each session lasts for about one week.

Dissolution. The Supreme Soviet can be dissolved by the Presidium either in the event of disagreement between the Soviet of the Union and the Soviet of Nationalities or on the expiration of its usual four years' term of office. In any case, elections must be held within two months of its dissolution. The newly elected Supreme Soviet is convened by the outgoing Presidium not later than three months after the elections.

In case of disagreement between the Soviet of the Union and the Soviet of Nationalities, the Constitution provides for the appointment of a Conciliation Commission with equal representation of both Soviets. If the Conciliation Commission cannot agree, the two Soviets reconsider the question under dispute, and if they still persist in their disagreement, the Presidium may dissolve them and order fresh elections. In practice, however, there is no possibility of disagreement. The policy is determined by the Communist Party and not by the Supreme Soviet and the controlling position of the Party in both the Chambers ensures that there is no disagreement.

POWERS OF THE SUPREME SOVIET

The Supreme Soviet of the USSR exercises plenary State power; it expresses the sovereignty of the Soviet people. Accordingly, its authority is all embracing and its range of activities is great and varied. These are divided and discussed as follows:

Legislative Powers. In the USSR legislative power is exercised exclusively by the Supreme Soviet, and its jurisdiction extends to all subjects over which the Union Government has the control, as listed in Article 14. Draft laws are submitted to the Supreme Soviet by the organs empowered to initiate legislation. This power is vested in equal measure in both Chambers of the Supreme Soviet and its Standing Commissions, in Deputies of the Supreme Soviet, the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet and the Government, i.e., the Council of Ministers of the USSR, and also in all the 15 Union Republics as represented by their higher organs of State power.

Laws are adopted in the Supreme Soviet "by open vote" following a debate. Laws are put to vote at first by parts or articles and then as a whole. A law is considered passed, if it is adopted by both the Soviets by a simple majority vote in each. Laws passed by the Supreme Soviet are published in the languages of the constituent units of the Union over the signatures of the Chairman and Secretary of the Presidium of the USSR.

There is no authority in the USSR empowered to veto laws passed by the Supreme Court. This is for two reasons. First, the Supreme Soviet is the highest organ of State power and if any other authority is vested with the power to veto its actions, the supremacy of the Supreme Soviet vanishes. Secondly, what the Supreme Soviet passes is determined and decided by the Communist Party and the Communist Party controls and directs the entire machinery of the Government. The Constitution, however, empowers the Presidium, either on its own initiative or on demand of one of the Union Republics, to conduct a referendum on proposed legislation (that is, proposed by itself). But no proposed legislation has ever been submitted to a referendum.

Laws passed by the Supreme Soviet are binding in all the Union Republics and in case of conflict between a law of the Union Republic and a law of the USSR the latter prevails.

Constitution-amending Power. The Supreme Soviet is the Constitution-amending power in the USSR. The process of amending the Constitution is simple. All constitutional amendments must be adopted by a majority of not less than two-thirds of votes in the Soviet of Union and in the Soviet of Nationalities. The Supreme Soviet also possesses the right to exercise control over due observance of the Constitution and to ensure that the Constitutions of the Union Republic and other constituent groups are in full conformity with the Constitution of the USSR. Whenever the Supreme Soviet introduces changes or amendments to the Constitution of the USSR it makes sure that the Supreme Soviets of the Union Republics soon introduce the corresponding changes and amendments to the Constitutions of these Republics.

Budgetary Functions. The Supreme Soviet adopts a consolidated State budget for the whole country and exercises control over its execution. The Supreme Soviet also determines the revenues and taxes which go to the Union, the Republican, and the local budgets. Contracting and granting of loans is its prerogative and determination of national economic plans is its constitutional right.

Power to Admit New Republics and to Create New Areas. The Supreme Soviet possesses the right to admit new Republics into the Soviet Union, and to create new Autonomous Republics, Autonomous Regions, and National Areas. All alterations in the boundaries of the Union Republics must be finally confirmed by the Supreme Soviet.

Power Over International Matters and Defence of the Country. The Supreme Soviet decides about the representation of the USSR in international relations and ratifies and denounces treaties with foreign States. It also determines general procedure governing the relations of Union Republics with foreign States. Defence of the country being a Union subject, the Supreme Soviet determines the organisation of the defence of the USSR and directs all the armed forces of the Soviet Union. The Constitution authorises each Union Republic to raise its military formations. But the Supreme Soviet of the USSR determines the directing principles governing the organization of such military formations. Questions of war and peace are also decided by the Supreme Soviet as well as the questions of foreign trade.

Direction of the Economic and Cultural Life. The Supreme Soviet decides all the most important questions pertaining to the home and foreign policy of the country. It approves the annual and long-term plans. In directing economic and cultural life of the country, the Supreme Soviet determines the basic principles of land tenure and also of the use of forests, mineral wealth and waters, all of which belong to the people. Besides, the Supreme Soviet establishes the fundamental principles concerning education and public health services, labour legislation, the judicial system and the legal procedure. Legislation concerning Union citizenship and the rights of foreigners, and determination of the principles of legislation concerning marriage and the family also come within its sphere.

Electoral Functions. The electoral functions of the Supreme Soviet are more impressive than any other Legislative Assembly among the major countries of the world. Its two Soviets in a joint session elect the Presidium of the USSR, the Council of Ministers, the Supreme Court, Special Courts, and the Procurator-General. The Supreme Soviet exercises guidance and control over all highest State organs of the USSR. The Presidium and the Council of Ministers are also responsible and accountable to the Supreme Soviet. But ministerial responsibility in the USSR becomes merely ideological when the Constitution does not admit the need of party struggles and parliamentary Opposition. The Soviets are proud of the fact that there are bodies of non-parliamentary and one-party type. The Council of Ministers is really made and unmade by the Presidium of the Central Committee of the Communist Party.

Criticism and Supervision of Administration. The Supreme Soviet is vested with powers of supreme control over all State organs and officials. In implementation of this right, it hears reports of its Presidium on the most important decrees issued in the intervals between sessions and confirms them. It also controls the activities of the Government of the USSR, through the Standing Commissions of each Chamber. The Deputies may direct question on any aspect of administration and it is the constitutional duty of the minister concerned to give a verbal or written reply thereto within three days. The Council of Ministers has also been made responsible to the Supreme Soviet. As control and responsibility go together, it is the constitutional right of the Deputies to criticise the Government and its policies.

But criticism is not possible in the USSR. The Constitution does not establish a government by criticism and criticism is deemed detrimental to national solidarity and to the cause of socialism. And criticism is possible only where there is Opposition. Opposition parties cannot exist in the USSR. There are, no doubt, non-party men in the Supreme Soviet and they carry an appreciable numerical strength; in 1958, there were 106 non-party men in the Soviet of the Union and 138 in the Soviet of the Nationalities and they approximate this number even now. Non-party men are not members of the Communist Party, but all of them must be Communists by faith. Then, they are not permitted to meet as a group or take a common stand. The Constitution permits the existence of only one party and it is the Communist Party. The only source, therefore, from which criticism can come is the Communist Party itself. Since the leaders of the Party determine the policy, direct and control both government and the Deputies in the Supreme Soviet, it is hardly feasible to visualise criticism of the government. Even if a reasonable plea can be made for it, it has no substance.

The dictatorship of the Proletariat does not permit criticism of the "party line" and, as such, on the policy of the Government. There may be criticism on administration, those who are actually concerned with the execution of policy, but not against the policy and the policy-makers. The Deputies do not discuss the principles involved, they simply discuss the application of principles already accepted. The centre of discussion and criticism is, accordingly, the actual working of the Ministry involved for execution of the policy. Such criticism is chiefly the work of the Budget Committee of the Supreme Soviet and there are cases on record when Ministers were replaced following such criticism.

